To prove this it is alledged, that he quotes Gerochus for some matters of fact, that are not to be found in the manuscript of that author. This seems to be a strong objection; but then Aventinus's favourers may say, that Gretser falsified his edition of Gerochus (58). It may be said in answer to Gretser, that it is not very likely Aventinus should have vented his own slanders under the name of an ancient author, since he might have found many ancient writers, who did not spare the court of Rome. It was but naming those authors: the zealous Papists take care to complain, that the enemies of the holy see, 'are daily busy in looking out for the proofs and calumnies, which they cannot find in good writers among the tombs and old shores of schismatics; and, as the civilian Michael Ritus has well observed *; 'Antiquos & manuscriptos libros in latebrosis lucis laboriose evolvunt, & ex fœtido pulvere auctores quosvis excitant, quos licentiose in ipsos Pontifices scripsisse deprehendunt. — They, with great pains, turn over ancient manuscripts in obscure holes and corners, and disturb the dust of old authors, whom they find to have written freely against the Popes. Witness the collection of Matthias Flaccius Illiricus, intituled, Catalogus testium veritatis, which cannot be better compared than with Poneropolis, a town built by Philip of Macedonia; for, as it was only inhabited by people banished for their crimes, and by villains, and in general by all the rascals of that country, so it may be truly said, that, excepting the passages corrupted out of the fathers and councils, that large catalogue is only stuffed with fragments and scraps of those, who formerly set up against the church, or were cut off from the body of it as rotten members; such as was, among a great many others, the false cardinal Benno (59).

(59) Naudé,
Apologie des Grands Hommes,
pag. 551.

[S] The author of l'Esprit des Cours de l'Europe pretends, that the Popes Conquests were not so difficult as I imagine.] His reflexion may be divided into two parts: in the first, he pleasantly and ingeniously jests upon the Popes power; and in the second, he plainly and seriously affirms, that it was an easy thing for them to aggrandize themselves. The ingenious ironies, contained in the first part, are such, that an Ultramontane doctor might well be deceived by them, and seriously make use of them as good proofs; and therefore it will not be improper to bring them to a discussion. 'Is it not said, that every knee shall bow before the invisible head? how can the visible head want power to overthrow all his enemies? how could he miss confounding all those, who durst oppose him? the visible head acts only by the power of the invisible one: if the master is always victorious, the vicar must needs be so too. This miracle is an article of faith, nay, it is the great spring of religion: religion ought to subdue the body as well as the mind; no body denies it: It has a power over the whole man: since rewards are proposed to the material substance as well as to the spiritual one, both of them ought equally to undergo the yoke of the laws, and threatenings concern both of them alike. This principle being once overthrown, what would become of the holy inquisition? that divine tribunal would then have no other foundation but a barbarous cruelty, and all the arms of that sacred arsenal would have been forged in the fire of hell. The Pope is therefore master both of the bodies and souls; and because his authority over the conscience is unlimited, his power over the body ought to be invincible. Besides, did not the oeconomy of salvation require, that power should be no less extensive than knowledge? what would it avail a head divinely established to know every thing, if he had not the power of disposing of every thing? It were to no purpose for that Hercules to crush the monsters of error, if he had not the right of destroying the monsters of impiety. This right takes in kings and princes, who, though they command whole nations, are nevertheless the subjects of the church. The Popes opposed those great subjects, whenever they revolted against that good mother: they made use of an infinite power against them; how then could they be worsted? this is the true unravelling of the glorious and wonderful success of the new Roman monarchy (60). This discourse, being seriously understood, would afford this argument, that as soon as the bishops of Rome were looked upon as the vicars of JESUS CHRIST, whose power over the body and soul is unlimited, they could not fail easily to establish their empire over the people, and even over the temporalities of sovereigns. A distinction will be sufficient to resolve this difficulty. Tho' it be supposed, that CHRIST established a vicar in his church; yet common sense and reason will teach us, that he established him, not as he is the supremum master and creator of all things, but as he is a mediator between God and men, or the founder of a religion, which shews men the way to salvation, and promises a glorious reward to the faithful, and threatens the impatient with severe punishments. If CHRIST had established a vicar upon earth, his power would be confined within those bounds; and the most that vicar could do, were only to determine which is the doctrine of salvation, and which is that of damnation. After having declared to men future rewards and punishments, after having instructed and censured them, he would be obliged to leave to God the execution of the threatenings, not only with respect to the torments of another life, but also with respect to the corporal punishments inflicted in this world. CHRIST himself acted in the same manner: he exactly conformed to the true spirit of religion, which consists in instructing and sanctifying the soul, and leading it to salvation by way of persuasion, without assuming the authority of corporally punishing the obstinate and unbelievers, who were so many; for it is not true, that in this respect the head and master of the church is always victorious (61). And therefore those, who were most fully persuaded, that the Pope is CHRIST's vicar, should have looked upon his pretending to a temporal jurisdiction, and to the authority of punishing the body, as an ill use he made of his vicarship. This should have naturally produced many obstacles to the conquests of the bishop of Rome. It is not useless to know every thing, tho' one has not the power of disposing of every thing. Religion needs only teach men what they ought to believe and practise: it needs only put them in a capacity of confuting error, and it is only in that sense that the authority of destroying the monsters of heresy and impiety belong to it. If men do not act according to the knowledge it affords them, it belongs to God to punish them for it as being without excuse: This is not the business of religion, nor part of the ministry established by JESUS CHRIST. I proceed to the second part of the reflexion of the anonymous writer.

(60) l'Esprit des Cours de l'Europe, Nov. 1699, pag. 663.

(61) See the remark [E] of the article XENOPHONES.

But, not to take such a high flight, and to speak more humanly, I find nothing that is very surprising in the Popes greatness. By the help of some passages of holy writ, they have persuaded the world of their divinity. Is this a new thing? Is it not usual with men to suffer themselves to be imposed upon in point of religion? above all things they love to deify their fellow-creatures, as Paganism makes it plain. Now if it be once supposed, that the Popes could easily establish the divine privileges of their office; was it not natural for people to declare for them against all other powers? for my part, I am so far from admiring their elevation, that I wonder they did not arrive at universal monarchy. The great number of princes, who have been greater, than that they have been so great. I shall say something of a book lately printed

'have shaken off the Roman yoke, confounds me: when I enquire into the reason of it, I can only think of these two causes, which are very general and well known, that men do not always act according to their principles, and that this present life makes a deeper impression upon them, than the future (62).'

(62) L'Esprit des Cours de l'Europe, ubi supra, pag. 665.

Suppose, as this ingenious writer will have it, that the Popes could easily make the world believe they were Gods upon earth, that is to say, that being the visible heads of the church, they might authoritatively declare what is heretical or orthodox, regulate ceremonies, and command all the bishops of the Christian world: will it follow from thence, that they could easily set up their authority over kings, and bring them under their yoke without any difficulty? I confess I do not see this consequence. On the contrary, it seems to me, that, in all appearance, their spiritual authority would run a great danger by their attempting upon the temporalities of kings. The Athenians were told one day, have a care that your concern for heaven do not make you lose the earth (63). The Popes might have been told in a contrary sense, have a care, that your great desire of getting the earth do not make you lose heaven: you will be deprived of the spiritual power, if you pretend to usurp the temporal.

(63) See the citation of Erasmus, in the remark [F] of the article OLYMPIAS.

It is well known, that the most orthodox princes are more tender of their sovereignty than of religion: a thousand examples ancient and modern prove it: and therefore it was not likely they should suffer the church to invade their demesnes and rights; and it was likely they would rather increase their authority to the prejudice of the church, than suffer the power of the church to increase to the prejudice of their temporal power. Princes, who understand the art of reigning, have generally the gentry and the soldiery at their command; and when that part of their subjects remain faithful to them, they need not be afraid of the clergy; their troops will fight for them against all sorts of enemies. The army of Charles V made war against Clement VII. The troops of France fought against Julius II, for Lewis XII, and would have done the same for Lewis XIV, against Alexander VII, not long before the peace of Pilsa (64) delivered the Pope from the storm ready to fall upon him. I was at Mr Jusse's at Paris, in the year 1675, when a novelist affirmed, that the count de Vignori, governour of Triers, made this answer to the monks, who represented to him, that the convents he pulled down, to fortify the town, had been founded by Charlemagne; I do but execute the king's orders, and, if he should command me to raise a battery against the holy sacrament, I would do it.

(64) It was concluded in 1664.

Francis Mendosa de Corduba was not so passionate in the answer he made to a letter of the emperor, the thirtieth of December 1598; but he did not want much of it. He wrote to him, that if his imperial majesty was with his power on the one side, and the holy father the Pope with his excommunication on the other, commanding him once more to retire, he would not do it, since he had a master who had ordered him to perform his exploits, unless he was obliged by force of arms to do otherwise (65). We may add, that kings and emperors are able to bestow so many favours and noble rewards upon so many people, that they may easily bring over to their party many prelates and monks, and put them upon writing against the pretensions of the court of Rome. This paper-war, in all appearance, must needs be very prejudicial to the pontiffs, who usurp a temporal authority; for it is easy to shew, by several express texts of scripture, by the spirit of the gospel, by ancient tradition, and the practice of the first centuries, that the Popes have no manner of ground to pretend to dispose of crowns, and to share, in so many things, the rights of sovereignty. Nay, this may serve to bring into question their spiritual authority; and, being thus upon the defensive, as to that point, they must needs be reduced to great straits. Nay, the very articles, which the people came to believe by degrees, will run a great hazard. Besides, the clergy, whom the court of Rome will force to abstain from marriage, will be thereby disposed to serve their princes, which is no inconsiderable thing. Those, who cannot bear that yoke, are innumerable: the honest clergymen, who cannot live in celibacy, are most fond of marriage; for those, who are not conscientious, do not scruple to keep concubines. Celibacy is intolerable to a vast many people: marriage is to them the dearest and most precious of all the sacraments; and whoever should write a book on this subject like that of the Frequent Communion, would become as odious as Mr Arnauld, when he published, under this title, but on another subject, a work, which has made a great deal of noise. Therefore one should have thought, that princes and emperors would find great numbers of bishops, priests, and monks, well-affected towards them, and ready to serve them against the Popes zealous promoters of celibacy. Now what may not a prince expect, who, besides great armies, has so many clergymen at his disposal, who cannot be without women, and are extremely desirous of having wives and children?

But, in order to know, whether such conjectures about the obstacles, the Popes would meet in their way, would have been well grounded, we must have recourse to experience, and consult history; whereby it will appear, that those conjectures would have been right as to the obstacles, though perhaps wrong in pretending that those obstacles would prove insurmountable. Read du Pleffis's book, intituled, Le Mystere d'Iniquité, or l'Histoire de la Papauté, and you will find, in every chapter, the progress, and the opposition. The Popes cannot go forward, and get ground, but by overcoming the obstacles they meet with at every step. Armies and books, sermons, libels, and prophecies, have been made use of against them; nothing was left unattempted to put a stop to their conquests, and at last every thing proved insignificant. Why? Because they used all imaginable means to succeed in their designs. Their excommunications have been supported with arms and crusades, and by the tribunals of the inquisition: craft, violence, courage, and artifice, have concurred to protect them. Their conquests have cost the lives of as many men, or near as many, as those of the commonwealth of Rome. Many writers apply to new Rome what Virgil observes concerning the old.

Multa quoque & bello passus dum conderet urbem,

Inferretque Deos Latio (66)

So arduous was the task the Roman name to found.

Zipporah told Moses, Surely a bloody husband art thou to me (68); but if the church of Rome were the spouse of JESUS CHRIST, he might tell her with much more reason, Surely a bloody spouse art thou to me.

(68) Exod. iv, 25.

I think this sufficient to justify the propositions, which I inserted in the first edition of this dictionary, in the remark [B] of this article. I am still persuaded, that the power, the Popes have attained to, is one of the greatest prodigies of human history, and one of those things, which never happen twice. If it had never happened, I believe it would never be. Future ages would not afford a time so proper for such an enterprise, as past ages have been; and if that great structure should be destroyed, it were in vain to undertake to raise it up again. All that the court of Rome can do now, with the greatest policy in the world, is to maintain herself. Her conquests are at an end (69). She dares not excommunicate a crowned head; and how often is she obliged to dissemble her resentment against the Catholic party, who deny the superiority and infallibility of the Popes, and burn the books that are most favourable to them? If there was now an anti-papacy, I mean a schism, like those, which have been so frequent in former times, when a Pope set up against a Pope, and a council against a council;

(69) This must be understood in the sense of the school distinction, interfectus, and not extinctus.

She would not come off with honour, she would be confounded, and at her wit's end. Such a contrast, in such an age as ours, would prove destructive. Observe by the bye, in order to have a right notion of the great obstacles above-mentioned, that the Popes were obliged to make themselves masters of many general councils. This was a very difficult task; for the more numerous a council is, the more it is like a ship tossed with contrary winds, and exposed to the violent storms, thus described by Virgil:

Unâ Euræque Notusque ruunt, creberque procellis Africus; & vastos volvant ad littora fluctus.
Insequitur clamorque virum, stridorque rudentum.

And the quick light'nings dart from pole to pole.

GREGORY (PETER), a native of Toulouse, taught the civil law first at Cahors, and then in the town, where he was born. He flourished in the XVIth century. He was a very learned man, and wrote some books full of great erudition [A]; but he does not appear very judicious in the choice of the things contained in them. What was said of his book de Republica, may be applied to all his works [B]. He was invited into Lorrain in a very glorious manner, to be professor of the civil and canon law at Pontamousson (a), where duke Charles had lately founded an university. See the margin (b). He discharged the duties of that place with great reputation, till the year 1527, in which he died [C]. He was buried in the convent of the nuns of St Clara (c). He understood the Hebrew tongue [D]. If Mr Colomiés had known it, he would have taken notice of it in his Gallia Orientalis.

(c) I make use of the Francfort edition, 1599.

(d) See Doujat, enot. Canonic. 638.

[A] He wrote books full of great erudition. This any one may be convinced of, that will peruse never so little his book, intitled, Syntagma Juris universi atque Legum pene omnium Gentium, & Rerum publicarum præcipuarum, in tres partes digestum, in quo divini & humani Juris totius, naturali ac nova methodo per gradus, ordineque, materia universalium & singularium simulque judiciorum explicatur. It is a large folio, which has been reprinted many times (1). His other works are, Syntaxis Artis mirabilis. De Republica, Libri XXVI. Two volumes upon the canon-law: the first contains Partitiones totius Juris Canonici, in quinque libros digestæ, Scholiis & Annotationibus illustratæ insar Syntagmatis totius Juris Ecclesiastici, quæ à methodo Partitionum Ciceronis Oratoriarum diversæ, Summam potius Hostiensis imitantur. The second volume contains, Commentaria & Annotationes in Decretalium præcæm. Ad Tit. de summa Trinitate & fide Catholica. De constitutionibus. De rescriptis. De electione enarratio. Ad Cap. conquirentes de officio & potestate Juris Ordin. Rei beneficiarum Ecclesiasticarum Institutione. Ad Tit. de Sponsalibus & Matrimoniiis. De Usuris libri tres (2). He wrote against Charles du Moulin (§a), to shew, that the council of Trent ought to be received in France.

[§a] Under the name of Ramundus Rufus, if I am not mistaken, and for the reception of the council of Trent in France, against what du Moulin had written to the contrary in his Consilium supra factio Concilii Tridentini. The work of Peter Gregory was inserted, in 1682, in one of the last editions of Charles du Moulin's works, to introduce, as it were, into the world, this little piece, which made it's appearance for the first time in the works of this civilian. REM. CRIT.]

[B] What was said of his book de Republica. Gabriel Naudæus made the following judgment of it,

The steering of such a ship requires the utmost art and skill; and if the best working is sufficient to bring it into the designed harbour, it is a wonder.

[T] I shall say something of a book . . . with this title, Histoire des Amours de Gregoire VII. The whole title runs thus: Histoire des Amours de Gregoire VII, du Cardinal de Richelieu, de la Princesse de Condé, & de la Marquise d'Urfé. Par Mademoiselle D. A Cologne chez Pierre le Jeune MDCC. Though the author uses the word romance in the first lines of the preface, he affirms, that these stories are all true, and might have been longer, if he had been willing to exercise his invention. This is the highest pitch of boldness: one may easily perceive it now by the meer reading of his book: but can any one say, that it will not be a difficult thing in future ages? Let us suppose, that such a book had been written in the time of Gregory VII; is it not very likely, that Aventinus or Flavius Illyricus, finding it in a library, would have made use of it as a true history? Would it not be quoted every day, as a genuine piece, in all controversial books? Do we know what will happen between the XVIIth and the XXVIIIth centuries? Perhaps ignorance and barbarity will prevail again, and then learning will be revived. Perhaps a thousand good books will be destroyed, and this will be preserved. Perhaps a curious person will find it out, and it will be accounted an invaluable piece of secret history, and a certain monument of cardinal Richelieu's amours, &c. People have been imposed upon by such books more than once, and it is likely will be so in future ages.

was a writer of more scope and art, as being a civilian, than Nicolas Biesius the civilian of Luuain:
yet the luxuriance of his erudition allowed him to set no bounds to his writing: he wants likewise dignity, which he no more consulted than judgment, crowding in every thing, and digesting nothing: however he is a very useful writer, and full of variety: upon which account he may be looked upon as a treasure, in which you may find whatever is most valuable in many authors.

[C] The year 1597 . . . was that in which he died.] This I find in Mr Doujat (4); and, because he was this author's countryman, I rely more upon him, than upon Konig, who says our Gregory died in the year 1585. The Francfort bookseller (5) is not exact, when he says, in his epistle dedicatory of the first of March 1599, that, thro' the misfortunes of the times, he could not enjoy the presence and assistance of the author (6), when he reprinted the Syntagma Juris universi. Would he have spoken thus of a man in the year 1599, if he had known, that he had died in the year 1597? He could not be fully excused, by saying, that this book was some years in printing.

[D] He understood the Hebrew tongue.] Feltman, a civilian of Germany, says so; for he calls him, not only virum omni studiorum genere excultissimum (7), but also, Hebræi Juris ac sermonis callentissimum (8).

GRENAILLE (FRANCIS DE), born at Uzerche in the Limousin, in the year 1616, wrote a great many French books [A], that are very indifferent. He turned monk at Bourdeaux, and then forsook the order at Agen (a). He was made historiographer to the duke of Orleans. See the Sorberiana [B]. He prefixed his print to his books with a proud inscription [C]. He informs us in a preface (b), that he was accused of a state-crime, and found himself in danger of death.

(a) See La Guerre des Auteurs, pag. m 160, and the remark [C].

(b) That of the second son of the Sage résolu contre la Fortune.

[A] He wrote a great many French books. He published one upon another, L'honnête Fille; l'honnête Garçon; l'honnête Veuve; l'honnête Mariage; l'honnête Maîtresse; la Bibliothèque des Dames; le Plaisir des Dames; le Sage résolu contre la Fortune (1), la Révolution du Portugal; le Théâtre du Monde; la Mode ou le Caractère de la Religion.

(1) It is a translation of Petrarch. See the remark [C].

(2) Pag. 105.

* It should be Chateaucier.

[B] See the Sorberiana. There you will find these words (2): 'At that time there was at Paris one Grenaille, Sieur de Chatonnieres*, a native of Limousin, of twenty six years of age, who all of a sudden put out a prodigious number of books, some of which he intitled, L'honnête Fille, l'honnête Veuve, l'honnête Garçon, and others, La Bibliothèque des Dames. What seemed to me commendable in his book, intitled, Le plaisir des Dames, was, that, in all likelihood, a man of his age had kept in his closet, and avoided many debaucheries, to write books: but then there were but few good things in them, and what was good in them had been so often printed, that he could expect no great glory by repeating them. His style was insipid, whereby it appeared that the author wrote only for the sake of writing. That book, concerning the pleasures of the ladies, is divided into five parts, Du Bouquet, du Bal, du Cours, du Concert, de la Collation. — Of the Nefgay, the Ball, the Ring, the Concert, and the Collation. At first he handles this question, whether the nosegay adorns the breast, or the breast the nosegay? And he decides it in favour of the breast; being of opinion, that a certain influence proceeds from the two hemispheres of a lady, which revives the nosegay, and makes it not only more beautiful, but also more lasting.'

[C] He prefixed his print to his books with a proud inscription. Sorbiere goes on thus: 'He hopes that these fine thoughts will make him immortal; and it is the sense of the motto under his print prefixed to his book, Hac mortales evadimus immortales.' Gueret is still more severe upon him. 'I will spare, says he to him (3), your resolute Sage out of respect for Petrarch. I will also spare your relation of the Revolution of Portugal, upon condition that you will take away your picture from it, whose inscription is too vain for such an author as you are. Had you only mentioned your birth-place, and added to it, that you turned monk at Bourdeaux, and then forsook your order at Agen; one might bear with it: But you add, that you have made yourself immortal at Paris; which is an article altogether false, and, by Apollo's leave, it shall be struck out.'

GRETSEUS (JAMES), a very learned man, born at Marcdorf in Germany, turned Jesuit at seventeen years of age, in 1577. He was professor in the university of Ingolstadt for a long time [A]. It is said, that, notwithstanding his application to study, he was very constant at prayers, and that his great learning was attended with a wonderful modesty. The inhabitants of Marcdorf were very desirous to have his picture, in order to place it in the town-house; but, when he came to know, that they had made an earnest application to his superiors about it, he was sorry for it, and told them, that, if they had a mind to get his picture, they needed only draw the picture of an ass (a). To make themselves amends, they bought all his works for the use of the public. He never used his interest to procure some mark of distinction to his nephew, who was a student. He died at Ingolstadt the twenty ninth of January, 1625 (b). He was continually engaged in disputes with the Protestant writers, and in defence of his order. He wrote somewhat sharply against them; but he was answered in the same strain. He composed, or translated, a prodigious number of books [B]. Some authors have commended him very much (c). Cardinal du Perron acknowledged, that he was a man of parts; but this commendation of his was attended with a very uncivil clause, since it reflected upon a most illustrious and learned nation [C]. A modern author carried this incivility farther than that cardinal, and was justly censured for it (d).

[B] He composed . . . a prodigious number of books. The catalogue of them was published at Munich in 1674, in 4to, by George Heferus a Jesuit. It is a very exact catalogue; and it was printed from the author's original (2). I shall only set down the titles of some of his books. *De Sancta Cruce Tomi III. That history was written by one Hasenmullerus. De Jure & More prohibendi Libros naxios Libri II. Controversiarum Roberti Bellarmini Defensio Tomi II, in folio. Basilicon doron, seu Commentarius exotericus in Serenissimi Magni Britanniae Regis Jacobi Praefationem monitoriam; & in Apologiam pro juramento fidelitatis. Many books against Goldast, and, among others, one intitled, Arnoldi Brixienfis in Melchior Goldasto Calvinista redivi-gera Descriptio & Imago (3). Notes upon Thuanus's history. A treatise upon Compelle intrare, an Heterodoxi ad fidem cogendi sint. An answer to du Pleffis Mornai's book, intitled, Le Mystère d'Iniquité. This answer is more close, and less instructive, than that of Coëffeteau; but it was easier to reply to Coëffeteau, than to Gretser. The latter has unmercifully scanned the quotations, and the least chronological faults. I have mentioned, in another place, what he wrote in vindication of Gregory VII (4). Some authors of his communion call him the scourge of heretics, and the terror of the calumniators of the Jesuits (5). He was well skilled in the Greek tongue, and published some grammatical pieces upon that language, and notes upon some Greek authors, as George Codinus Cuiopala, John Cantacuzenus, &c. I must not forget, that he procured the impression of several manuscripts.

[C] Cardinal du Perron allowed him . . . wit; but he added a very uncivil clause since it reflected upon . . . a nation. Gretser is very much to be commended; he has a great deal of wit for a German (6) (§ 2). They are cardinal du Perron's words. Father Bouhours alledged this testimony, when he called in question the wit of the Germans. There was a Frenchman, who took the part of that injured nation, and criticized Father Bouhours in the following manner. 'It is in the same discourse the author puts this question, whether a German can be a wit? I think the possibility of it was never yet doubted of; and it is likely, the author is the first, that ever asked such a question. His answer is to it, that it is kind of prodigy, that a German should be a very witty man; whereupon he cites cardinal du Perron . . . But it does not follow from all this, that the author should have carried the thing so far as to make it a question, whether a German can be a wit; and it is the way to be treated with very ill language in German (7). In another place (8) he speaks thus: this is no great ornament, no more than his question, whether a

'German can be a wit? I assure you, Sir, that some very wise persons have been offended at it, and told me, that, if the author of the Entretiens were more judicious, he would not have been so rude to a nation very much addicted to learning and war, by whom admirable discoveries have been made in the arts and sciences, as artillery, printing, and the sector; and who, besides, are most of them our friends, allies, and neighbours.' Cleanthes was not thought to have sufficiently vindicated the Germans; and therefore M. Cramer has published, upon that account, a fine apology for his nation, in a book (9) that came out last year. An extract of it may be seen in the Histoire des Ouvrages des Savans (10). [(5 a) I dare almost assert, that this expression of cardinal du Perron is not so uncivil as it appeared to Mr Bayle. What the French call de l'Esprit, (wit) is a certain talent for trifling things, or at most a kind of vivacity, which in general is little agreeable to the German gravity, and the serious character of that nation. When therefore this cardinal said of Grefter, that he had a great deal of wit (de l'Esprit) for a German, he seems to have meant no more, than that a German has seldom so much of this French vivacity, as Pather Grefter had, as much a German as that Jesuit was. I say as much of the question, whether a German can be a wit? no body denies the German nation the most refined good sense, the greatest sagacity, and the noblest fallies of genius; and, satisfied with this lot, she may look upon the French vivacity as no great prerogative. REM. CRIT.]

GREVIUS (JOHN), an Arminian minister, born in the duchy of Cleves, was deposed, and banished, for refusing to subscribe the canons of the synod of Dort; and because he did not keep in his exile, he was condemned to a perpetual imprisonment [A]; but, in the year 1621, he made his escape out of the prison. He began there a work, which he published afterwards [B], wherein he condemns the use of the torture. He pretends, that reason is for him [C], though the most general practice be against him. He gives an account of his deliverance in his letter to Vorstius (a). His imprisonment lasted a year and a half (b). He was admitted minister the tenth of May 1605,

[A] He was banished . . . and because he did not keep in his exile, he was condemned to a perpetual imprisonment. He says, that tho' he was separated from his flock, yet he continued to take care of it; and that his flock desiring he would give them the spiritual food, he thought himself more obliged to mind their salvation, than to obey the sentence of the magistrates, whereby he was forbidden to return into the country. He therefore returned into Holland, and had some private meetings at Campen, for the instruction of his flock. This thing came to be known; he was apprehended, and condemned to perpetual imprisonment. Thus the matter is related by him (1). I know no more of it: but I know, that, on this account, he must needs be looked upon as a truly honest man, who discharged his duty. I appeal to those, who maintain, that the ministers, who return into France, to instruct the Protestants privately, notwithstanding the prince's prohibition, do a very noble action. Observe, by the by, that persecution is inconsistent with the maxim, Quod tibi fieri non vis alteri ne feceris: you punish such a one, and you blame those, who do the same.

Revis observes, in his history of Deventer, that Grevius had been minister of Heulden; and that he came to Campen in November 1619, where he preached eleven times in the houses of the Arminians (2).

[B] He began there a work, which he published afterwards. The title of it runs thus: Tribunum reformatum, in quo junioris & tutoris justitie via iudici Christiano in processu criminali monstratur, rejecta & fugata TORTURA cujus iniquitatem, multiplicem fallaciam, atque illicitum inter Christianos usum libera & necessaria dissertatione aperuit JOHANNES GREVIUS Clivenf. quam captivus scripsit in Ergastulo Amsterodamensi. This work was published at Hamburg in the year 1624 (3). It turns upon a very nice subject; for it seems one cannot be for the negative, without condemning a practice authorized by the laws of the state. The torture is practised in most countries; but it ought to be observed, that the sovereigns, who authorize it, and even will have it to be a considerable part of the proceedings in criminal causes, do not impose upon private men the necessity of believing the lawfulness of it. Many learned men at all times, and in all countries, have taken the liberty to shew the injustice of it. Our Grevius is one of them: his treatise is worth reading. Such as have the spirit of persecution should learn from hence, that they are in the wrong to vex and harass their enemies, under pretence they do not approve all the usages of their country, or all the principles of their governors. Subjects are indeed bound to obey the magistrates, but not to believe, that they act justly and at all times; and that of two usages, they have not sometimes pitched upon the worst. Nay one may be allowed to write against abuses in a respectful manner, that the sovereign may reform them.

[C] He pretends, in condemning the use of the torture, that reason is for him. The author of the Philosophical Commentary upon these words, Compel them to come in (4), quotes a very fine passage of Michael de Montagne, wherein the two inconveniences of the torture are mentioned: one is, that those, who are able to endure the torments, do not speak the truth; the other is, that those, who cannot bear pain, confess things that are false. Montagne's words deserve to be set down here at length; however, I shall only direct the reader to the place, where they may be found (5). The same commentator observes, that Saintmar, who was beheaded at Lyons, in 1642, for high treason, 'died with great constancy, and expressed a great contempt for life; but, at the same time, seemed to be so afraid of the rack, that, if he had been put to it, it is very likely he would have confessed any thing.' It were an easy thing to collect many authorities and examples, to shew the injustice of the torture; for many modern authors have published collections upon that subject. See among others, Ramirez de Prado in the ninth chapter of the Pentecostarchos, Segla in thirty sixth annotation upon a decree of the parliament of Toulouse, and Rupert upon the fourth chapter of the seventh book of Valerius Maximus. I omit the civilians, who have wrote upon this subject, ex professo. Those authors do not fail to mention a passage of St Augustin (6), wherein the injustice of the torture is both strongly represented, and weakly excused. Ludovicus Vives, in his note upon that passage, openly declares against the use of the torture: but Leonard Coquæus, in his commentary upon the same words of St Augustin, condemns Vives's opinion, and says, that the fathers and the canon law approve, that the torments should be made use of, to extort truth from those, who are accused. Nor are these words of Quintilian forgotten: 'Sicut in tormentis quoque qui est locus frequentissimus, cum pars altera quætionem, vera fatendi necessitatem vocet, altera sapientiam caussam falsa dicendi, quod aliis patientia facili mendacium faciat, aliis infirmitas necessarium (7):

— As in the case of the torture, which is a very common topic, when the one side calls the rack a necessity laid on the accused of confessing the truth; the other, the occasion likewise of saying what is false; because patience makes some easily guilty of a lie, and infirmity lays others under a necessity of being so. Nor these of Ulpian (8). Statutum est non semper fidem tormentis, ne tamen nunquam adhibendam fore. Etenim re est fragilis (quæstio) & periculosa, & quæ veritatem fallat: nam plerique patientia, five duritia tormentorum, ita tormenta coactum, ut exprimi eis veritas nullo modo possit: alii tanta sunt impatientia, ut quævis mentiri, quam pati tormenta velint. Ita fit, ut etiam vario modo fateantur, ut non tantum se, verum etiam alios criminentur.

1605, and that very day he preached his first sermon at Arnheim. This I find in a letter, which he wrote, in 1620, to Balthazar Brantius (c), who intreated him to forsake the party of the Remonstrants.

'minetur. — It is agreed, that we are not always to believe what is extorted by the rack, but not that we are never to give credit to it. The torture is a dangerous thing, and which sometimes deceives the truth: for many persons are so hardened against pain, as to despise the torture, and can by no means be brought to confess the truth: others are so unable to endure pain, that they will tell any lie rather than suffer the torture: hence it is, that they say and unsay, and accuse, not only themselves, but others.'

I have observed in another place (g), that the Cappadocians could stoutly endure the greatest tortments: the same has been said of the (10) Egyptians and Spaniards (11). Observe, that the torture is not practised in England; no not against those, who are accused of high treason. Barclay makes this observation in the fourth chapter of his Leon Animorum. To conclude, Grevius had a copious subject; and as the materials were plentiful, he knew how to make a good use of them.

GRIBALDUS (MATTHEW), a learned civilian of Padua, left Italy in the XVIth century, in order to make an open profession of the Protestant religion; but, in imitation of some other Italians, who turned Protestants, he fell into the heresy of the Antitrinitarians. After he had been professor of the civil-law at Tubingen for some years, he left that employment, to avoid the punishment he had undergone, if he had been convicted of his errors. He was apprehended at Berne, where he would have been severely used, had he not pretended to renounce his opinions; and, because he returned to the mire, and openly favoured the heretics, who had been expelled from Geneva, and particularly Gentilis, whom he harboured in a feat he had not far from that town (a), he would have been sooner or later punished with death [A], if the plague, of which he died in September, 1564, had not prevented his being prosecuted for heresy. In a journey he took to Geneva, during Servetus's trial, he desired to have a conference with Calvin, but could not obtain it. Some time after, Calvin sent him word, that he would admit him to a conference; at which his colleagues, and three elders of the consistory, should be present. Gribaldus came to the appointed place, but went away hastily, when he saw that Calvin refused to give him his hand. He would not admit his excuse, that such a thing could not be done, till he and they should agree (b) as to the principles of religion, viz. the Trinity and the divinity of CHRIST (c). He was summoned to appear before the magistrates, to give an account of his faith; and because his answers were not satisfactory, he was ordered to leave the town. This is what may be inferred from the letter I quote (d). He wrote several books, which are esteemed [B].

[A] He would have been sooner or later punished with death. This is what I find in Beza: I shall set down his words, which prove many things I have advanced. 'Domi verò Serveti cineres pullulare cœperunt: cuius blasphemias favere deprehensus Mattheus Gribaldus, non incelebris Jurisconsultus quam Genevæ forte venisset . . . deductus ad Calvinum à quibusdam Italis, quos Patavii docuerat, recusante Calvino dextram illi porrigere, nisi prius de primario Christianæ fidei articulo, id est de sacra Trinitate & Deitate Christi inter eos conveniret, nullum postea locum ullis admonitionibus vel argumentis reliquit. Itaque quod ei jam tum prædixit Calvinus, grave nimirum Dei iudicium pertinaci ipsius impietati imminere; hoc reipsa postea expertus est, Tubinga primùm profugus, quò fuerat Vergerii favore introductus: Bernæ postea captus, simulatque abnegatione liberatus, ad ingenium postea rediens, & Gentilis illius de quo mox dicemus fautor & hospes, superveniente demum peste correptus, paratam sibi in terris supplicium anteverit (1). — At home, the ashes of Servetus began to spring up: for Matthew Gribaldus, a famous civilian, who was found to favour the blasphemies of that man, coming by accident to Geneva . . . was introduced to Calvin by some Italians, whom he had taught at Padua; but, upon Calvin's refusing to give him his hand, till they should agree upon the principal article of the Christian faith, the sacred Trinity, and the divinity of CHRIST, he left no room for any farther admonitions or arguments. This man afterwards experienced the judgment of GOD on his obstinate impiety, as Calvin at that time foretold him, being first banished from Tubingen, whither he had come by the favour of Vergerius; afterwards, being apprehended at Berne, and set at liberty upon a pretended recantation, but returning to the same sentiments, and

'openly favouring and entertaining Gentilis, whom I shall speak of presently, he was seized with the plague, and prevented the punishment prepared for him in this world.' It does not appear from these words, in what year Gribaldus died; but it is known, that he was no longer alive when Valentinus Gentilis went in quest of him into the territories of the canton of Berne, in 1566 (2), and it may be proved, that he died in September, 1564 (3). See, above, a passage of Languet at the end of the remark [E] of the article GOVEA.

[B] Gribaldus wrote several books which were esteemed. Here follow the titles of them. Commentarii in legem de rerum misfura, & de jure filii: they were printed in Italy (4). Commentarii in Pandectas juris, printed at Lyons. Commentarii in aliquot præcipuos Digesti, Infortiati novi, & codicis Justiniani titulos atque leges utilissimis conclusionibus illustrati, Francfort 1577 in folio. Historia Francisci Spira (cui anno 1548, familiaris aderat) secundum quæ ipse vidit & audivit, Basil 1550. De omni genere homicidii, Spire 1583, in 8vo. De methodo ac ratione studendi in iure civilis libri tres, Lyons 1544, & 1556. Probably it is in this last book he maintained, that a civilian ought to understand history; and that he shewed the mistakes into which some civilians are fallen through ignorance (5). He spent only eight days in writing that book (6).

Note, that Sledian confirms, that he was one of the spectators of the dismal condition the unhappy Spiera was reduced to, and that he wrote and published an account of it, Multi præterea Spieram in eo statu viderunt magni omnis viri, & in his Mattheus Gribaldus, Jurisconsultus Patavinus, qui & rem omnem, quam ipse coram vidit & audivit, scripto complexus in lucem edidit (7).

GROPPER (JOHN) archdeacon of Cologne in the XVIth century, and raised to the purple by Pope Paul IV. See his article in Moreri's dictionary, and add to it, that he took it extremely ill, that Sleidan should endeavour to render him suspected of having once inclined to Lutheranism [A].

always very strongly recommended Martin Bucer to Herman de Wida, archbishop of Cologne, who made use of the ministry of the same Bucer to establish the reformation in his dominions in the year 1543. But, as Gropper threw obstacles in the way of it, Sleidan would make him pass for a deserter, who, after having had an intimacy with that minister, strongly opposed him. Hujus libri (2) fuit auctor, ut aiunt, & archiepiscopus Gropperus. Nam is, etsi Bucero fuerat admodum familiaris ante biennium in comitis Ratisbonae, quamquam inde domum reversus, vehementer eum non Archiepiscopo tantum, sed possum apud omnes prædicaverat, licet crebras ad eum dedisset & amicissimas literas; tamen, quum res esset in eum deducta casum, ab ejus amicitia se totum avertit, & principe relicto, cui fortunam omnem debebat, in adversariorum castra transiit (3). As to the resentment of Gropperus, I am going to cite a copyist of Surius. 'Sleidan . . . would make us believe, that . . . John Gropper was an heretic, and that he had always greatly esteemed and recommended Martin Bucer. But this so valuable a man did plainly shew, that, what was said of him was meer calumny, in a book, which he dedicates to Charles V; and again in another place he witnesses, that Sleidan (whom he represents as maliciously ignorant of the affairs of the empire) has falsely lied in his history full of untruths when he says such a thing of him, and that Martin Bucer insinuated himself by little and little in the diocese of Cologne, not only without his knowledge, and that of all the Catholics, but even in despite of them; and in the same place he expressly calls Bucer a detestable wretch. In truth Sleidan would not have said so injurious a thing, without receiving an answer 'had he not died before Gropper could answer him in writing, as he had resolved to do (4).'

Maimbourg does not deny, that Gropper, who was one of the three Catholic doctors, that conferred with Bucer and with two other Protestants, at the conference of Ratisbon, in the year 1541, had corresponded after that time with Bucer; but it is, adds he (5), 'because, this preacher of Strasburg, convinced by the reasons, which that excellent man produced in that conference, gave him room to believe, by the letters, which he wrote to him, that he was prepared to renounce Luther, as he had already done Zuinglius, and to return to the Catholic church.' However it be, the copyist of Surius observes, that Gropper, in his return from this conference of Ratisbon, 'cast his eyes on the books of Bucer, and, to prove the constancy of the man, he compared them with the articles, that had been agreed upon in the said conference. Then he met with an immense number of points directly opposite to those, which Bucer had admitted and approved in that conference; and nevertheless he remarked some villainous repugnancies of the said Bucer, errors, lyes, and blasphemies so great, that the Manicheans never uttered the like, that if any one desires farther information in this matter, he must read what the learned Eberard de Billy (6), has written, in defence of the judgment of the university and clergy of Cologne, against the calumnies of Melancthon, Bucer, and others, in which he will find this matter fully handled (7). Surius and his copyist alledge this, in order to have an opportunity of saying that Sleidan is a liar. They express great rage against him in this and an hundred other places.

GROTIUS (CORNELIUS), in Dutch, de Groot, that is the Great, was born the 25th of July 1544, at Delft, where his family had been illustrious for the space of four hundred years [A]. He went there, through his school-learning; and then he was sent to Louvain, where he studied philosophy four years. He applied himself chiefly to that of Plato [B]. He learned also Greek and Hebrew, and even Mathematics. At twenty years of age he went to Paris, where he continued to study the belles lettres and philosophy, and was very well beloved by John Daurat, Regius professor. From thence he went to Orleans to learn the civil law; and when the professors thought he deserved to be admitted doctor, he was contented to take his licentiate's degree, to which he kept all his life-time. Being returned into his country, he betook

[A] He was born at Delft, Where his family had been illustrious for the space of four hundred years.] Here follow the words of the author I have quoted in the text of this article. 'Patrem habuit Hugonem

Grotium virum antiqua virtute & opibus pollentem, ex patricia Grotiorum familia quæ in repub. Delfensis totis quadringentis annis continuis illustris, etiam hucusque consulatibus & summis reipub. honoribus decoratur (1). — His father was Hugo Grotius, a man of great probity, and wealth, descended from the noble family of the Grotii, which, having been famed in the republic of Delft four hundred years, still continues to shine in the most distinguished posts of the common-wealth.' That author is not exact, and wants to be explained. His words do manifestly imply, that the ancient family of the De Groot's continued in the male line down to our Cornelius Grotius; which is not true: for about the year 1430, Dederic de Groot, burgomaster of Delft, and illustrious by many deputations, had but one daughter, who, marrying Cornelius Cornetz, stipulated, that her children should go by the name of de Groot. Which began to be executed in the person of Hugh de Groot, the father of our Cornelius. The Cornetz descended from a French gentleman, who settled in the Low-Countries in the time of the dukes of Burgundy. See the passage quoted by me in the remark [E].

[B] He applied chiefly. . . to the philosophy of Plato.] The author of his elegy expresses it in this manner: (2) 'Philosophiam Platoniam, quippe quam solam inter humanæ sapientiæ sectas magis divinam (ut revera est) judicavit, adeo avide amplexus est, ut omnia Platoniorum scripta persecutus fuerit, memoriarum infixerit, ac per totam vitam manu ac mente volutaverit. — He was so fond of the Platonic philosophy, which he thought (as indeed it is) the most divine among the sects of philosophy, that he read over all the works of the Platonists, got them almost by heart, and was perpetually meditating upon them.'

betook himself to the bar. The city of Delft made him counsellor and échevin at the same time; and because he gave several proofs of his virtue and learnings, prince William conferred upon him the office of master of the requests. He worthily discharged the duties of that office till the year 1575, when he was made professor in the university of Leyden, newly founded, where he taught philosophy for some years, and then the civil-law. He was so well pleased with that employment, that he would not leave it to be counsellor in the great council, though that office was offered him several times. He died in the year 1601, without issue. He left behind him some books concerning the civil-law, that have not been printed (a) [C]. He had a brother, whose name was JOHN DE GROOT [D], who was the father of HUGH DE GROOT, who makes the subject of the following article. They were both the sons of HUGH DE GROOT, the first of his family who went by that name [E], and who died in the year 1567 (b), being burgomaster of Delft the fifth time.

[D] He had a brother, whose name was JOHN DE GROOT. Who, after he had gone through his school-learning at Delft, studied philosophy and the civil-law at Douay. He returned into Holland, as soon as the university of Leyden was founded; and lived, till the year 1582, in the house of his brother Cornelius de Groot, professor of the civil-law in that university. Afterwards he was made successively Schepen and Burgomaster of Delft, and curator of the university of Leyden (5); and did not scruple to be admitted doctor of law after he had been curator (6). *There are some of his works written with great politeness, if we may believe Moreri; but he is mistaken: He too much enlarges what Meursius had already too much amplified. These are Meursius's words (7): Pater (Hugonis) erat Joannes Grotius cujus exstant carmina, & Lipsii ad ipsum literæ, Doujaque versus, nec pauca aliorum monumenta ipsius inscripta nomini. The plain meaning of which is, That John Grotius had made some verses, which had been published. But since the whole passage of Meursius, is to be found in the life of Grotius, except these words, cujus exstant carmina (8), it is very probable that Meursius was mistaken upon that head. Besides, it is certain, that John Grotius understood poetry: Lipsius says so. *Negas agnoscere te Deas, idque carmine quod agnoscant ipse Deæ. . . . Carmen torum approbum, nec critica illi à me nota (9). — You deny, that you acknowledge goddesses, and that in a poem which goddesses themselves might acknowledge. . . . The whole poem is perfectly good, nor will I offer to criticise it.

[E] HUGH DE GROOT, was the first of his family, who went by that name. This I find in the life of Grotius, prefixed to his works, and among the lives collected by Dr Bates. The passage deserves to be set down at length. Avus ei fuit ille Hugo de Groot qui ex illustri Cornetiziorum gente prognatus, primus Grotianum nomen in familiam suam transulit. Quippe cum circa annum trigessimum seculi decimi quinti in Diderico de Groot ejusdem itidem civitatis consule, & non paucis deputationibus satis claro, defecisset stirps masculina, filia ejus Ermgarda de Groot, domus satis opulentæ hæres, viro Nobilissimo Cornelio Cornetio, qui genus sum ex ea Cornetiziorum prosapia ducebat, qui sub Ducibus Burgundiæ ex Gallia in Belgium migraverant, nuptura, matrimonium non iniit, nisi factâ conditione, ne, qui ex eo nascerentur masculini sexus liberi, alio quam Grotiano nomine nuncuparentur; ita natus Hugo de Groot, ejus Hugonis, de quo loquimur, avus, vir supra quam ea tempora serebant, Latinarum, Græcarum & Hebræarum quoque literarum sciens. — His grand-father was that Hugh de Groot, who, being descended from the illustrious family of the Cornetiz, first introduced the Grotian name into his family. For the male line failing in Dideric de Groot, chief magistrate of the same town, and well known by his many deputations, about the year 1430 his daughter Ermgard de Groot, a rich heiress, being to marry the most noble Cornelius Cornetiz, descended from that branch of the Cornetiz, which, under the dukes of Burgundy, transplanted itself from France into Holland, articulated with him, that their male issue should bear the name of Grotius: from this marriage sprung Hugo Grotius, grand-father of that Hugo we are speaking of, a man of uncommon skill in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, for the times he lived in. It appears from the sequel of this passage, that this Hugh was burgomaster of Delft, and married Elselinge Heemskerck, a woman of a very noble extraction.

GROTIUS (HUGO), one of the greatest men in Europe, was born at Delft the tenth of April 1583. He made so early a progress in his studies, that he wrote verses before he was nine years of age; and at fifteen he had great skill in philosophy, divinity, and the civil-law: But he was still better skilled in the belles lettres, as he made it appear by the commentary he wrote at that age upon a very difficult author (a). In the year 1598, he accompanied the Dutch ambassador (b) into France, where Henry IV gave him several marks of his esteem. He took there his degree of doctor of laws; and, being returned into his country, he applied himself to the bar, and pleaded before he was seventeen years of age. He was not twenty four years old, when he was made advocate-general. He settled at Rotterdam in 1613, and was syndic of that town (c); he would not accept of that employment, but upon condition that he should not be deprived of it; for he foresaw, that the quarrels of divines about the doctrine of grace, which formed already a thousand factions in the state, would occasion many revolutions in the chief towns. He was sent into England in the same year, on occasion of the misunderstanding between the merchants of both nations, about which he had written something [A]. He found himself so far engaged in the affairs, which which ruined Barneveldt, that he was arrested in August 1618, and condemned to a perpetual imprisonment, the 18th of May 1619, and to forfeit his estate. He was confined to the castle of Louvestein the 6th of June, in the same year. Every body knows how he made his escape [B], after he had been severely used above a year and a half (d). He retired into France, where he met with a kind reception at court, and had a pension assigned him. The Dutch ambassadors endeavoured to prepossess the king against him; but that prince did not mind their artifices, and gave a glorious testimony to the virtue of that illustrious refugee [C]. Grotius applied himself very much to study, and to compose books. The first he published, after he had settled in France, was an apology for the magistrates of Holland, who had been turned out of their places [D]. He left France, after he had been there eleven years, and returned into Holland full of hopes, by reason of a kind letter he had received from prince Frederic Henry; but his enemies prevented the good effects of it [E]; and therefore he was forced once more to leave his country. He resolved to go to Hamburgh, where he stayed till he accepted the offers of the crown of Sweden in the year 1634. Queen Christina made him one of her counsellors, and sent him ambassador to Lewis XIII. Having discharged the duties of that employment about eleven years, he set out from France to give an account of his embassy to the queen of Sweden. He went through Holland, and received many honours at Amsterdam. He saw queen Christina at Stockholm; and, after he had discoursed with her about the affairs he had been intrusted with, he most humbly begged of her, that she would exile his countrymen to undertake those things with courage, he wrote a book, Of the right of commerce to the Indies. That tract was intitled, Mare liberum, sive de jure quod Batavis competit ad Indiana commercia dissertatio, and was printed in 1609. See Colomies's Bibliothèque Choisie, pag. 157.

[B] Every body knows how he made his escape. It was by the advice and artifice of Mary de Regelsberg (2) his wife, who having observed, that the guards, being weary of searching a large trunk full of books, and linnen to be washed at Gorcum, a neighbouring town, let it go without opening it, as they used to do, advised her husband to put himself into it, having made some holes with a wimble in the place, where the fore part of his head was, that he might breathe, and not be stifled. He followed her advice, and was in that manner carried to a friend of his at Gorcum; from whence he went to Antwerp in the usual wagon, after he had crossed the public place in the disguise of a joyner, having a rule in his hands. That artful woman pretended all the while, that her husband was very sick, to give him time to make his escape into a foreign country: but, when she thought that he was safe, she told the guards, laughing at them, that the bird was flown. At first there was a design to prosecute her; and some judges were of opinion, that she should be kept in prison instead of her husband: but by a majority of votes, she was released, and praised by every body for having, by her wit, procured her husband's liberty (3). Such a wife deserved not only to have a statue erected to her in the commonwealth of learning, but also to be canonized; for it is to her we are indebted for so many excellent works, published by her husband, which had never come out of the darkness of Louvestein, if he had remained there all his life-time, as some judges, appointed by his enemies, designed it (4).

[C] Lewis XIII gave a glorious testimony . . . of this illustrious refugee. Grotius preserved still an affection for his country, though he had been so ill used. This Lewis XIII admired; and doubtless it was one of the reasons, which moved that prince to reject the ill counsels of the Dutch ministers, who hated him, and endeavoured to make him odious to the court of France. Semper intentus patriæ & popularibus suis ubi quid negotii illis apud aulam eam esset, consilio, operâ, & quâ pollebat apud nonnullos Ministros regis gratiâ interfervire ac prodesse; quamvis non ignoraret, eos, qui ibi res Federatorum curabant, nihil intentatum relinquere, quo Regis animum ipsi infestum redderent, sed frustra laborabant apud Principem nihil ignorantem eorum, quæ annis cl. loc. xviii & cl. loc. xix in Hollandia acta erant; quin dixisse non semel fertur, mirari se virtutem hominis, qui tam malè in patria habitus, non desineret tamen ei, subditique ejus bene velle, imò quocunque etiam posset modo benefacere (5). -- Always ready to assist his countrymen, who had any business at court, by his advice, and his credit with some of the king's ministers; tho' he was not ignorant, that the States envied him no stone unturned to alienate the king's affection from him; tho' they laboured to no purpose with a king, who knew every thing that had been transacted in Holland, in the years cl. loc. xviii and cl. loc. xix: nay he was often heard to say, that he admired the virtue of the man, who, notwithstanding the ill usage of his countrymen, ceased not to wish well to them, and even to serve them when ever he could. Grotius shewed, by his conduct, that he had made a good use of the noble examples he had read in the ancient Roman authors (6). See what I have observed in relation to Camillus (7).

[D] The first book he published was an apology for the magistrates of Holland who had been turned out of their places. The contrary party was very much displeased with that book. They thought Grotius made it appear, that they had acted against the laws, and they endeavoured again to ruin him; but the protection of the French court secured him against their attempts. Which may be seen more at large in the following passage (8). Primum operum, quod post receptam libertatem edidit, fuit Apologeticus sive defensor, non tam sua, qui non potuerat peccare in exsequendis iis, quæ sibi à Superioribus suis mandata erant, quam eorum, qui legitimo modo creati, legitimo jure Reip. Hollandicæ annis decimo octavo & nono præfuerant. Quo comperto Federatorum Delegati, neque ignorantes suas in eo libro artes, illatamque Hollandiæ vim (9) detegi, cum nihil haberent, quo expressam in eo veritatem redarguere aut refutare possent, usitatâ jam diu violentiâ utentes, proscriptionibus eum persecuti sunt: quod brutum fulmen, cum per Christianissimi Regis tutelam, qui eum in fidem suam receperat, evanisset, nihil aliud eo actum est, quam quod, &c. -- The first work he published, after he was set at liberty, was an apology, or defence, not so much of himself who could not offend in the performance of those things, which his superiors required of him, as of those who, being legally created, presided legally over the commonwealth of Holland, in the years eighteen and nineteen, which being known, the delegates of the States, conscious that their arts, and the violence offered to Holland, were detected in that book, and not being able to deny the truth of what he had said, had recourse to their old violence, and pursued him with proscriptions: which impotent malice being disappointed by the protection of the most Christian King, nothing farther was done than that &c.

[E] His enemies prevented the good effects of it. Prince Frederic Henry wrote a letter to Grotius in the year 1622, wherein he offered to serve him. It is printed at the end of Grotius's life: and, in all probability, that prince would have gladly restored that great man, had he not been told there was some danger in it. Here follows a Latin passage, wherein the whole matter is explained. Mortuo Mauritio Araufionensium Principe, frater ejus Fredericus Henricus ad gubernaculum Reipublicæ admotus, non mitioris tantum regiminis, sed & pristinæ in administranda Republica libertatis spem dederat, ipsique jam pridem Grotio animi sui affectum per literas testatus erat, cre-

(9) We are told, pag. 423, in what that violence consisted. Delegates illi iudices dare, illegitimo modo accusare, indefensa damnare; Oldenbarneveldium septuagimum secundum ætatis annum agentem capitali supplicio plectere, reliquos duos ad perpetuos carceres mittere, & omnia eorum bona publicare: nitenibus contra vim auctoritatis sue inferri frustra clamantibus ipsæ Hollandiæ Ordinibus, donec optimis quibusque à numeribus suis dimittis, novissime in eorum loca contra leges impostis omnia pro libidine eorum agi cœpere qui istius novitatis auctores erant. -- The delegates appointed them judges, accused them illegally, and condemned them without board: they put to death Oldenbarneveldt, at seventy two years of age; the other was they sent to perpetual imprisonment, and confiscated all their effects: and this notwithstanding the States of Holland opposed them, and cried out, that their authority was abused; till having removed the best part from their employments, and substituted others, contrary to law, in their places, every thing began to be at the beck of the authors of these new proceedings.

grant him his dismissal. He had much ado to obtain it; and that prince gave him several marks of her great esteem for him. He had many enemies in that court [F]. The ship, on board which he embarked, was violently tossed by a storm, and cast away on the coast of Pomerania. Grotius, being sick, and uneasy in his mind, continued to travel by land; but his illness forced him to stop at Rostock, where he died, in a few days, on the 28th of August 1645. His body was carried to Delft, to be buried among his ancestors (e). Notwithstanding his embassy, he published many books upon several subjects [G]. He engaged in an unpleasant dispute, having undertaken to reconcile theological controversies. A divine of Leyden (f), who was a native of France, wrote against him upon that account, and left nothing unattempted to make him suspected by the Protestants, and to exasperate the court of Sweden against him. That dispute afforded an instance of the truth of this maxim, That the mind is deceived by the heart. Grotius, being desirous to re-unite all Christians, looked upon it as a thing that might be effected; his desire did not permit him to see the unformidable obstacles, which the obstinacy of some private persons would easily raise, though there had been debataturque à non paucis, quæsiturus sibi gloriam ex tanti viri tam injulæ damnati in integrum restitutione: sed ut plerumque apud animos eorum, qui Principum consiliis præstant, utilia honestis prævalent neque desistent qui ipsi ante oculos ponent, quam periculosum rebus suis foret, hominem, tam pertinaciter libertatis ac patriæ suæ amantem, iterum ad Republicam admittere, potentia suæ quàm exilium consilium maluit, & Proceribus super mansione Grotii, in Hollandiam reversi circa finem anni cl. lxxxi. deliberantibus, iis accessit, qui interdicendum illi in patria habitationem opinabantur (10). — Maurice, prince of Orange, being dead, his brother Frederic Henry, being at the helm of affairs, gave hopes, not only of a milder government, but also of restoring the ancient freedom in the administration of affairs, and soon expressed his friendship for Grotius by letter; and many thought that he aspired to the glory of restoring so great a man so unjustly condemned: but, as those, who manage the affairs of princes, have generally more regard to profit, than honour, and there were some, who represented to him how dangerous to his affairs it would be, to admit into the common-wealth one so fond of liberty and his country, he consulted his power rather than his reputation: and, when it was debated, whether Grotius, upon his return to Holland in the year cl. lxxxi. should be allowed to reside there, he sided with those, who voted, that he should be forced to settle in his own country.

[F] He had many enemies in the court of Sweden. The queen gave him no positive answer, when he asked leave to retire; which displeased some great men, who were afraid that she would keep him in her council. He perceived their discontent, and was so pressing to obtain his dismissal, that it was granted him at last. Neque dubitavit hoc unum sufficere ad irritandam invidiam illam, quam à principio adventus sui in nonnullis Regni Proceribus animadverterat. Quare, cum nihil minus propositum ei esset, quàm in ea terrarum parte habitationis suæ sedem figere, ubi non minus cum ingenio hominum tam male sibi volentium, quàm cum aëris inclementia luctandum quotidie foret, non destitit coram Regina, quoties ad eam accederet, dimissionem suam & veniam ad suos reverendi efflagitare (11). — Nor did he doubt that this would increase that envy, which he had observed in some of the nobles from his first arrival. Wherefore, as he designed nothing less than to fix his residence in that country, where he must daily struggle, not only with the tempers of men, who wished so ill to him, but also with the inclemency of the air, he perpetually solicited his dismissal, and leave to return to his own country, as often as he had access to the queen. Du Maurier says (12), that chancellor Oxenstern would have taken care to get Grotius deprived of his embassy much sooner, had he not been willing to vex cardinal Richelieu. This cardinal (13) struck off the pension of three thousand livres, which had been paid to Grotius for the space of ten years, which obliged that illustrious refugee to leave France. The author of that affront being informed, that Grotius was coming again with a noble character, was very sorry for it, and earnestly desired the court of Sweden to recal that ambassador, who did not love him, and whom he did not love. Oxenstern who was resolved to mortify the cardinal, refused to grant him his request; but, as soon as he heard that the cardinal was dead, he ceased to protest the ambassador and even proved so unkind to him, that he was obliged to ask leave to retire, which was granted him. Du Maurier adds (14), that Grotius being not at all regarded in Sweden, left Stockholm without taking leave of the queen, or of any of her ministers, and was already come to the Dalles to take shipping; but the queen, having sent for him, presented him with twelve thousand Rixdollars. This does not agree with Grotius's life. See in the margin a passage out of the Menagiana (15). 'Mr Arnauld produces a letter, importing, that Grotius, being dissatisfied with the court of Sweden, tho' very well pleased with queen, left it, to return into France, where he was to be ambassador of Poland; that before he was far advanced in his journey, the queen urged him to come back; that he did it; and being set out again, &c (16).'

[G] Notwithstanding his embassy he published many books. Here I shall speak of the works of that author, in whatever time they were written or published.

During his stay at Paris, before he was ambassador of Sweden, he translated into Latin prose his book concerning the truth of the Christian religion, which he had writ in Dutch verse, for the use of the seamen, who travel into the Indies, that they might have some diversion in singing such a pious poem. Thus Du Maurier speaks of it (17). He is very much to blame for giving such a mean notion of the author's design; for Grotius aimed at a nobler end: he had a mind to enable the Dutch, who travel into the Indies, to promote the conversion of the infidels. Proposui enim mihi erat, omnibus quidem civibus meis, sed præcipue nauticis, operam navare utilem, ut in longo illo marino otio impenderent potius tempus, quàm quod nimium multi faciunt, fillerent. Itaque sumto exordio à laude nostræ gentis, quæ navigandi solertia ceteras facile vincat, excitavi eos, ut hac arte, tanquam divino beneficio, non ad suum tantum quantum, sed & ad veræ hoc est Christianæ religionis propagationem, uterentur (18). — My design was to write a work, which might be of use to all my countrymen, but especially our sailors, that, during their leisure of a long voyage, they might employ their time, rather than, as many do, mispend it. Beginning therefore with the praise of our nation, which excels all others in the art of navigation, I exhorted them to employ this science, as a favour from heaven, not only to their own profit, but to the advancement of the true, that is the Christian, religion. It is an excellent work, and the notes upon it are very learned. It was translated into English, French, Dutch, German, Greek, Persian, and Arabic; but I do not know whether all those translations have been published. The Greek was not printed in the year 1637 (19). In the year following Grotius mentions the Persian translation only, as a book, which the Pope's missionaries had a mind to publish. Liber meus de veritate Religionis Christianæ . . . qui Socinianus est Votianis adeo hic pro tali non habetur, ut studio Religiosorum Pontificiorum vertatur in sermonem Persicum ad convertendos, si Deus cepto annuat, ejus imperii Mahumetistas (20). — So far none in the causes of the division. The calumnies, maliciously dispersed by his enemies, about his death, are irrefragably confuted by the relation of the minister, who attended him, when he was dying [H]. Those false reports are nevertheless revived from

'san tongue, in order to convert, by the grace of GOD, the Mahometans of that empire.' In the year 1641, an Englishman, who had translated that book into Arabic, was desirous, that his translation should be printed in England 'Fuit apud me his diebus Anglus vir doctissimus, qui diu in Turcico vixit imperio, & meum librum de Veritate Religionis Christianæ in Arabicum vertit sermonem; curabitque si potest, typis in Anglia edi. Is nullum librum putat esse utiliore aut instruendis illarum partium Christianis, aut etiam convertendis Mahometitis, qui sunt in Turcico imperio, aut Persico, aut Tartarico, aut Panico, aut Indiano (21). — A very learned Englishman was lately with me, who resided long in the Turkish empire, and translated my book of the Truth of the Christian Religion, into Arabic; and will, if he can, get it printed in England. This man thinks no book more useful, either for instructing the Christians of those parts, or even for converting the Mahometans of Turkey, Persia, Tartary, Barbary, or India.' That translation made by the famous Dr Edward Pocock, was printed at London in the year 1660, in 8vo. We shall see, in the article HENICHIUS, that Grotius has been taxed with plagiarism. There are three German translations of that work (22), two in prose and one in verse, and two French translations in prose. The last was made, and published at Utrecht, in the year 1692 (23); the other came out long before. I have seen two editions of it; one in 12mo, in the usual character, and the other in 8vo, in a letter like that of a writing-master: and therefore it is said in the title, that it was made at Paris, in the printing-house of the new letters invented by Peter Moreau, a writing-master at Paris. There is no date, neither in the title page, nor at the end of the epistle dedicatory. The author of that version dedicated it to Mr Bignon, counsellor of state, and put only an M to it to denote his Name: I have been told, that his name was Mr de Courcelles.

The incomparable work, De Jure Belli & Pacis, was published at Paris in the year 1625 (24). I shall speak of it at large in the remark [O].

As for the commentary, De imperio summorum pontificum circa sacra (25); the treatise, De satisfactione Christi contra Fastum Socinum (26); the notes upon the gospels (27); the Pietas Ordinum Hollandiæ (28); the dissertation, De Cæne administratione ubi Passores non sunt, & an semper communicandum per Symbola (29); the Epistolæ ad Gallos (30); I refer my readers to a book of Colomies, quoted in the margin, where they will find some curious particulars. Concerning the edition of the letters in folio, consult the first volume of the Bibliothèque Universelle and Morbosius's Polybistor (31). But as to the Historia Belgica, I refer to the remark [P]. Note that there is in the fourth volume of the Bibliothèque Universelle (32), a large abstract of the treatise, De Cæne Administratione ubi Passores non sunt, &c. which was reprinted at London, with some other pieces, in the year 1686.

There are several mistakes in the following words of du Maurier: 'during that embassy, which lasted twelve years, Grotius published several books; among others, a Latin dissertation against la Peyrere (33), who had written a piece concerning the Pre-Adamites: that dissertation is intitled, De origine gentium Americanarum Dissertatio, wherein he says, That the nations of America are not very ancient; and that they came from Europe, either by a land-passage or being driven thither by a Storm: Nisi, says he, quis Præ-Adamitas esse dixerit, ut nuper quidam in Gallia somniavit. But one Læcius of the Low-Countries having written against him, he put out a second dissertation, intitled De origine gentium Americanarum Dissertatio altera, wherein he confutes Læcius at large (34). It is not true that Grotius wrote his dissertation de Origine gentium Americanarum against la Peyrere; nor is it true, that the book concerning the Pre-Adamites was then printed. The words, quoted by du Maurier, are not in that dissertation; but the following passage is to be found in his reply to Læcius: 'Cui conse-

quens est ut credatur . . . aut aliquos ante Adam fuisse conditos homines, ut nuper quis in Gallia somniavit. — The Consequence of which is, that we must believe . . . or that there were men created before Adam, as a certain person in France lately imagined.' I believe la Peyrere is hinted at in those words; but I maintain still, that the book concerning the Pre-Adamites was not yet published (35). Grotius was acquainted with that man's opinion; and therefore he said something of it occasionally. But this cannot be called a confutation.

[H] The calumnies of his enemies . . . concerning his death, are irrefragably confuted by the relation of the minister who attended him when he was dying.] That minister, named John Quistorpius, was professor of divinity at Rosloc. His relation (36) imports, that he went to Grotius, who had sent for him, and found him almost dying; that he exhorted him to prepare for death, in order to enjoy a more happy life, to acknowledge his sins, and repent of them; that, having mentioned to him the publican, who confessed himself a sinner, and begged God's mercy, the sick man answered, I am that publican (37); that he went on, and told him, he should have recourse to JESUS CHRIST, without whom there is no salvation; and that Grotius replied (38), I place all my hopes in JESUS CHRIST alone; that he repeated with a loud voice, in High-Dutch, the prayer, which begins thus: Heer Jesu waabrer Mensch und Gott, &c. (39); and that the sick man said it softly after him with his hands joined; that having ended, he asked him, whether he understood him; and his answer was, I understood you very well (40); that he continued to repeat to him some passages of the word of God, which dying people are usually put in mind of, and to ask him, Do you understand me? and that Grotius answered, I hear your voice, but I do not understand every thing that you say (41); that, after this answer, the sick man lost his speech, and expired soon after.

It would be ridiculous to call into question Quistorpius's sincerity: no reason of interest could move him to tell a lie; and every body knows, that the Lutheran ministers were no less displeased, than the Calvinists, with the particular opinions of Grotius (42); and therefore the testimony of the professor of Rosloc is an authentic proof; and, if such a proof is not sufficient in matters of fact, we make way for Scepticism, and it will be a hard matter to prove any thing. It is therefore an undeniable matter of fact, 1. That Grotius, being a dying, was affected like the publican mentioned in the gospel; he confessed his faults; he was sorry for them; he implored the mercy of his heavenly father. 2. That he placed all his hopes in JESUS CHRIST alone. 3. That his last thoughts were those that are contained in the prayer of dying people, according to the liturgy of the Lutheran churches (43). Now I do not think there is any prayer that contains more pious thoughts, such as a true Christian ought to have, when he is preparing to appear before God's tribunal, than that prayer.

The result of this is plainly; 1. that those who say he died a Socinian (44), would be too gently used, if they were only told, that they are guilty of a rash judgment; they deserve to be called calumniators. 2. That these words of du Maurier contain a fabulous story (45): 'I have been told, says he, that during his sickness, a Catholic priest, and several Lutheran, Calvinist, Socinian, and Anabaptist ministers, came to him, to persuade him to die in their belief: But whilst they discoursed of controverted points, and each of them endeavoured to prove that his religion was the best, his only answer was, non intelligo; and when they had done speaking, he told them, bortare me ut Christianum morientem decet; exhort me, as a dying Christian ought to be exhorted.' 3. That the report that was spread immediately after his death, that he refused to hear a minister, who had a mind to speak to him, is another lie (46). 4. That it is not true, that, when a Lutheran minister began to speak to him of his religion . . . the sick man answered only, non intelligo, giving him to understand by those words, that he did not like his discourse, and

'and that accordingly the minister went away (47).'
5. That there is a falsity in a little English book (48), wherein it is affirmed, 'that Grotius, being a dying, said, multa agenda, nihil egi, though I have undertaken many things, I am not a jot the better for it.'
6. That those, who 'soon after the death of that great man . . . spread a report that he had been 'thunder-struck (49), gave out a falsity more ridiculous still, than malicious.

I shall conclude this remark with a passage, wherein Andrew Rivetus, one of the most zealous adversaries of Grotius, is concerned. He gave out, that Grotius was dead, breathing out threatenings, and full of anger and bitter gall, without shewing any sign of repentance. However, says he, we will not judge another's servant. The caution contained in these last words seemed ridiculous to an Arminian professor, because good sense does not permit us to admit a principle, without admitting the consequences necessarily resulting from it; but eternal damnation is an infallible consequence of a final impenitence; so that it is but a silly artifice to say, such a one is dead without repenting of his heinous crimes; nevertheless I will not decide about his fate. This is what that professor says about it (50): I do not examine whether he is in the right. But here is the passage I have promised:

'Paulo apertius egit A. Rivetus, de illustri viro Hugone Grotio loquens: ἐμπνέων ἀπειρίας, inquit, & totus in fermento jacens, imo in felle amaritudinis, videtur ad plures abissos, nullo poenitentiae, quod sciamus, signo exhibitio, &c. Ubi nihil aliud superfluit, nisi ut adderet, Aeternum est deus salutis. Licet ad emolliendum tam inclementem sententiam, ita concludat: Sed tamen non judicamus servum alienum, qui Domino suo servit & cecidit. Sed quorum moderationis speciem praese ferre circa consequens, cum tota difficultas sit in antecedente? Ego contra, si mihi constaret, vel Grotium, vel Blondellum, in aliquo gravi delicto sine poenitentia obisse, non vereretur, est dolens, dicere, damnatus est. Non enim ipse sententiam ferrem, sed Deus in verbo suo, quod coelo & terra firmius est. — Andrew Rivetus dealt

'a little more openly, speaking of Hugo Grotius: Breathing out threatening, says he, and being wholly in a ferment, even in the gall of bitterness, he seems to have died, without shewing any sign of repentance, that we know of, &c. To which he had nothing to add, but that his salvation was desperate; though, to soften so harsh a sentence, he concludes; Yet we judge not another man's servant; to his own matter he standeth or falleth. But to what purpose this shew of moderation as to the consequent, when the whole difficulty lies in the antecedent? I, on the contrary, if I were certain, that Grotius, or Blondel, had died in some heinous sin, without repenting of it, should not scruple to say, though with grief, he is damned. For it is not I who pass the sentence, but the word of GOD, which is firmer than the heavens and earth. I have seen, in a book of Mr Arnauld, a like stroke against Mr Duill's regard for St Ambrose (51). But this is foreign to my purpose. I shall only say, that Rivetus advances a thing, concerning the pretended impenitence of Grotius, that is contradicted by the relation of the Lutheran minister. Marenius, who refutes the passage I have quoted, does not in the least disapprove Rivetus's conduct.

[I] No one was so excessive in his accusations, as the author of the book, intituled, L'Esprit de Mr Arnauld. He is not contented to say, that Grotius is a passionate Arminian, a Socinian, a Papist (52), things which are inconsistent in one and the same person; but he adds (53), 'that Grotius died without professing any religion, and without giving any answer to the person, who exhorted him upon his death-bed, but, non intelligo, I do not understand you (54), turning his back to him.' His only authority for it is Mr Arnauld, a man of whom he gives so hideous a character in that same book, that no equitable judges would fine a person, charged with murder, by twenty witnesses like him. Can there be a more strange blindness? Must we not confess, that of all passions, the desire of slandering is most proper to make one act against common sense? But, laying aside such moral reflections, I shall only say, that it is manifest, the author of L'Esprit de Mr Arnauld affirms, that Grotius died an Atheist. To reject all manner of religion at the point of death, to die without professing any religion, and to die an Atheist, are three synonymous propositions: and therefore, if the accuser was to be prosecuted, the matter should be reduced to this question, DID GROTIUS DIE AN ATHEIST? The accuser does plainly assert it: he must therefore prove it; and it were to no purpose for him to prove, that Grotius was neither a Lutheran, nor a Calvinist, nor a Papist, nor an Arminian. Now is it not a horrid thing, that a man, who died in the manner mentioned by Quistorpius, should be accused of dying an Atheist? Is not the impudence of such a calumniator prodigious? Can any one that reads his book believe it, without calling to mind what he knows of the great corruption of men, and thinking of these words of the scripture, The heart of man is desperately wicked (55)? I have already said (56), that there is no reason to doubt of Quistorpius's sincerity; and I add, that the thing he witnesses is of such a nature, that he could not be deceived in it. He heard what Grotius answered him; he saw the motion of the lips and hands of his penitent, whilst he was repeating an excellent prayer. The ears and the eyes are authentic witnesses in such matters of fact. I confess, he did not know whether Grotius spoke with a low voice other things than those he (Quistorpius) spoke aloud: it is an objection, Mr Arnauld was not ashamed to propose (57): it does not deserve an answer: for, at this rate, one might doubt of the faith of all dying people.

[K] Very wise persons highly approve their waving all juridical proceedings. The example of Janfenius's relations, which some wished Grotius's family had followed, is one of the things that can best justify their contempt of that calumny. The Janfenists hoped to mortify Father Hazart, a famous Jesuit, who had said in one of his books, that Janfenius's father was a Protestant, and that Janfenius had been a professed Calvinist till he came to a certain age. They published very fine cases (58), to shew, that this Jesuit was a downright calumniator; and he was summoned with all the usual forms to give satisfaction for that injury by a solemn retraction. They applied themselves to the tribunals, to which it belonged, to decide that difference; but after many writings, and a great stir, they miscarried in their design. Father Hazart had such an interest, and invented so many cavils, that the proceedings of the plaintiffs came to nothing. This instance shews, that Grotius's descendants did well in not prosecuting the author of the calumny; for he would have invented as many cavils as Father Hazart, and would have been as powerfully supported, to avoid the punishment he deserved. He might have been prosecuted before the secular courts by the law, Si quis famulum. Complaints might have been made also to the ecclesiastical judges: But he would have had such powerful patrons, and so great an interest in the secular courts, that all the proceedings would have come to nothing. It had been worse still, if the ecclesiastical courts had been applied to: in which he never wants cavils to justify himself, and his friends use a thousand artifices to secure him from the least censure. The author of the Thoughts on Comets, could he obtain any satisfaction for a calumny very like this relating to Grotius? The accuser, heaping frauds on frauds, did he not always elude the just demands made on him by the accused, before their proper judges? What success had the ministers, who charged him with a false doctrine? Did they not find him superior to the laws of discipline, tho' they took never so much pains, and made his errors manifest? This is a new reason why Grotius's relations ought to be glad, that they did not prosecute him juridically.

to that passage of l'esprit de Mr Arnauld [L]; and since the accuser made no reply to it, it is a plain sign that he has been convicted of calumny. Now this is a scandalous thing upon two accounts; for on the one side, he made no step in order to give satisfaction for so great an injury; and on the other, his ecclesiastical superiors never censured him for so plain a calumny, and never intimated to him, that they did not approve his publishing such books as l'esprit de Mr Arnauld. Caspar Brand, an Arminian minister of Amsterdam, is writing a life of Grotius (b): It will be large and very instructive: It is pity he does not write it in a language more generally understood than the Dutch. He will not fail to praise him for his memory, which was so good, that, being present at the muster of some regiments, he remembered the names of every soldier (i). A letter of Salmasius has been printed within these few days, wherein he is ill used [M]. He left behind him three sons, and one daughter

[L] We have seen a very solid answer to that passage of L'Esprit de Mr Arnauld. The apologist begins thus. 'But, Sir, what that author, and Father Simon, say of Grotius, is nothing, if compared to what the nameless author of the scandalous libel, intitled, L'Esprit de Mr Arnauld, says of him. It is true, he slanders every body in that book, and that the manifest lies, that are in it, ought to make one disbelieve every thing else. But, because some are so weak as to be imposed upon by his bold way of speaking, and because some of those, to whom you shew my letters, entertain an ill opinion of Grotius upon that account, you will give me leave to undeceive them here. Perhaps, they will not be displeased to find an author, for whom they have so great an esteem, guilty of the most horrid calumny that ever was. This will teach them, that one ought to suspect those, who appear so zealous for truth; and that sometimes a prodigious malice and detraction are concealed under that zeal, upon pretence of defending the church of God (59).' Afterwards, the apologist examines the four accusations one after another. I shall not dwell on what he says upon the first head (60): What he says upon the second runs thus (61):

Grotius, says our satirical author, in the second place 'a Socinian, as it appears from his enervating ALL the proofs of CHRIST's divinity. Sir, desire your friends to read Grotius's annotations upon the passages of St Mark and St John, which I have mentioned to you; and if they do not say, that it is an abominable calumny, I am willing to be accounted a most wicked calumniator. See also the DXLVIIIth letter among the Litteræ Ecclesiasticæ & Theologicæ (62). I should be too long, should I mention what he says upon the third head, both against the author of L'Esprit de Mr Arnauld, and Mr Arnauld himself. I shall only set down this passage out of it. 'When Mr Arnauld says something that is injurious to the reformed, the author of the libel exclaims violently against him, and Mr Arnauld is then an insincere man, an unfair accuser, an infamous calumniator; but, when he says something that may serve this satirical writer to inveigh against those, whom he hates, every thing is then right; it serves him to fill up his page, and to prevent his being placed among the little authors (63).'

I must not forget, that Mr Arnauld blames the Lutheran minister for not asking Grotius in what communion he would die (64). This is a material thing, says Mr Arnauld, 'with respect to a man, who was known to have had no communion for a long time with any Protestant church, and to have confuted, in his last books, most of the doctrines that are common to them.' Whereupon the apologist says (65), that Mr Arnauld, and the author of the libel, do wrongfully fancy, that a man has no religion, when he joins with none of the factions that condemn all mankind, and each of which pretends to be the only church of CHRIST. Grotius obtained from communicating with the Protestants, as well as with the Roman Catholics, because the communion, which was appointed by CHRIST as a symbol of peace and concord among his disciples, is accounted in those societies a sign of discord and division. . . . (66). Quistorpius acted the part of a wise man, in not asking him what communion he would die in, since he saw him dying in the communion of JESUS CHRIST, by virtue of which we are saved, and not by virtue of that of the bishop of Rome, or of the several Protestant societies.'

Without inquiring whether Quistorpius was in the right or the wrong, not to ask him such a question, I observe, that a man, who believes the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, but forbears receiving the communion, because he looks upon that action as a sign that one damns the other Christian sects, cannot be accounted an Atheist, but by an old dotting fool, who has forgot the notions of things, and the definitions of words. Nay, I go farther, and I maintain it cannot be denied, that such a man is a Christian. I allow you to say, that his believing all the sects, that receive the gospel, to be in the way to salvation, is an heresy; I allow you to maintain, that it is a pernicious and dangerous doctrine: notwithstanding which, can it be said, that those, who believe that JESUS CHRIST is the eternal Son of GOD, co-essential and consubstantial with the Father; that he died for us; that he was raised from the dead; that he sits at the right hand of GOD his father; that men are saved by faith in his death and intercession; that one ought to obey his precepts, and repent of one's sins, &c. I say, can it be affirmed, that such persons are not Christians? No man of sense can affirm it; but none would be more unreasonable, in asserting such a thing, than the author of L'Esprit de Mr Arnauld, since he published another book (67), wherein he shews, that all those, who believe the fundamental points, belong to the true church, whatever sect they may be of. I omit several other maxims advanced by him, whereby it appears, that one may be saved in all religions; as an anonymous writer (68) has demonstratively proved to him. I only mention such doctrines as he cannot deny, and according to which he ought to acknowledge, that Grotius, who believed the fundamental doctrines, without approving Calvinism, or Popery, &c. in every thing, was a member of the true church.

For the rest, we need not wonder, that Grotius was abused by a man, whose book is looked upon as a satire upon all mankind. 'Homo iste procacissimus in illo suo ARNALDI SPIRITU, universum genus humanum impetit, nec Sacris parcens nec profanis, nec Ecclesiastico, nec Civili Statui; Regem suum, Regem Christianissimum, singula Regiæ familiæ capita, familiares Ministrosque Regis tam sanctæ, tam impudenter carpit: ut vel in suo Hollandiæ asylo vix tutus ipse (69), tutum præstare id libri monstrum nequiverit (70). — This most slanderous author, in intitled, Catholici Esprit de Mr Arnauld, falls foul of all mankind, sparing neither things sacred nor profane, the church, nor the state: he attacks his prince, the most Christian king, every branch of the royal family and the king's favourites and ministers, so basely and impudently, that where it is affirmed, that this author speaks ill of all mankind, (71), and judge whether such an author could fail to meet Grotius in his way, there being some particular reasons, which made him angry with that great man: those, who know Rotterdam, understand me.

[M] They have published a letter of Salmasius . . . wherein he is ill used. Mr Crenius has published that letter in the first part of his Animadversiones Philologicæ & Historicæ, printed at Rotterdam in 1695. Salmasius wrote it to Sarrauius, the twentieth of November 1645. Not contented to prefer Vossius to Grotius, he undervalues the merit of the latter as much as he can: he hardly allows him to have an indifferent skill in philosophy, and makes him inferior to every body, as to the reasoning part. A professor of Transilvania, adds he, who is writing against the book De Jure Belli & Pacis, pretends to shew gross mistakes in every page of it; adfirmavit se ostensurum esse nullam paginam vacare insignibus erratis. Grotius, says he, is a mean critic; many of his notes upon the Old Testament are extremely childish; I would not put my name to such a work. Scimus etiam in Critica quam infelix fuerit & ἀσχετος vir aliquin summus Grotius . . . Nollem meum nomen adscriptum esse adnotatis in Vetis T. nihil bis in multis puerilius invenio, & tanto nomine indignus. How shall we reconcile this with Salmasius's letters to Grotius? There is one, in which he calls him supereminentissimus; and says, he had rather be like him, than enjoy all the wealth and glory of the sacred college. Non solum Cardinalibus, sed etiam mihi rem minime gratam facis, qui me donec eo titulo, quo tu dignior, supereminentissime Groti. Quid enim te non sic appellem, cujus me multo similem malim, quam omnes purpurati illius gregis divitias & honores possidere (72)? See the passage of Justus Pacius in the margin. I was asked not long ago, whether the letters, written by great men to an author, are like those, wherein they speak of that author to other persons? I answered, that they seldom spoke the same things in those two sorts of letters. When they write to an author, they commend his book; but when they write to others, they praise it but little, and sometimes find fault with it. If they themselves published their own letters, they would endeavour to suppress their double-dealing; but most times they come out after their death. If Salmasius had published the letter of the twentieth of November 1645, he would have suppressed those wherein he bestows high encomiums upon Grotius. He was no friend to him, as he made it appear when he wrote against him under the disguise of Simplicius Verinus (73).

to be sent ambassador into France (76).⁴ Colomiés says (77), 'it is believed, that Grotius exhausted his parts upon that book, and that he might have said of it what Casaubon said of his own commentary upon Persius, in a letter to Mr Perillau his kinsman, which is not printed, in Persio omnem ingenii conatum effudimus; and indeed that work of Grotius is an excellent piece; and I do not wonder that it has been explained in some German universities. . . . Here follows the judgment, which Mr Bignon, that unblameable magistrate, makes of that book, in a letter to Grotius, dated the fifth of March 1632. I had almost forgot, says he, to thank you for your treatise De Jure belli, which is as well printed as the subject deserves. I have been told, that a great king had it always in his hands; and I believe it is true, because a very great advantage must needs accrue from it, since that book shews, that there is reason and justice in a subject, which is thought to consist only in confusion and injustice. Those, who read it, will learn the true maxims of the Christian policy, which are the solid foundations of all government. I have read it again with a wonderful pleasure.' They did not make the same judgment of it at Rome, where it was placed among prohibited books, the fourth of February 1627.

(77) Colomiés, Biblioth. choisie, pag. 128.

The memoir, which M. Chauvin has inserted in his journal (78), concerning the fate and importance of that work, is so fine and so curious, that I cannot forbear transcribing several things out of it. It informs us, that Grotius undertook to write that book at the solicitation of the famous Peireskian. He himself says so in a letter he wrote to him, when he presented him with a copy of that work. 'The subject of it was thought to be so important and useful, that it gave occasion to make a particular science of it; for the explication of which, some professors have been appointed on purpose in the universities.' Charles Lewis, elector Palatine, 'did so highly value that book, that he thought fit it should serve as a text to the lectures, concerning the law of nature, and the law of nations; and in order to expound it, he appointed Mr Puffendorf in his university of Heidelberg; and, in imitation of that prince, the like settlements have been made in other universities. . . . It does not appear that any body criticised or wrote against that book of Grotius, during his life. Some indeed are of opinion that Mr Selden wrote his book De Jure Naturali & Gentium juxta disciplinam Ebraeorum out of emulation. . . . The first author, who criticised Grotius, was Joannes à Felden, doctor of the civil law, and professor of the mathematics, at Helmstadt. He closely follows the three books of Grotius, and dwells upon such subjects as concern the civil law and morality. . . . He contradicts him every where.' His work came out in 1653, and was confuted the next year by Theodorus Grafwinckel. The public law, in 1663, Boeclerus's commentary upon the first book of Grotius, which he continued afterwards upon the seven first chapters of the second book; and besides, he has published five important subjects of the same book. . . . He does not follow all the opinions of that author, but differs quite from him upon several subjects. . . . In 1664, John Philip Mullerus, a civilian, reduced the three books of Grotius into tables. . . . In 1665, Janus Klenkian (79) published his institutions De Jure naturali & gentium, taken out of Grotius's book. In 1666, Gaspar Zieglerus . . . professor of the civil law at Wittemberg, put out his notes on the three books of Grotius. . . . He does not appear to be acted by a spirit of contradiction; nevertheless he departs from Grotius's opinions in a great many things. Grotius's younger brother (80) published, in 1667, Enchiridion de Principiis Juris Naturalis: that book is properly an introduction to the work De Jure Belli & Pacis, and was illustrated with notes, in 1675, by John George Simon, professor of the civil law at Léna (81). About the year 1668, David Mevius, vice-president of the supreme court of Wolfmar, undertook to compose a just system of the doctrine concerning the law of nature and the law of nations, and

and published an introduction to it in nine considerations. He highly commends Grotius in his preface, and gives him the glory of being the first, who introduced the study of the law of nations, and explained it more solidly and learnedly than any one before him. His great work was to be made up of three parts: the two first were finished, and ready for the press; but he knew not, whether his great age, and his affairs, would permit him to make an end of the other. John Adam Osiander, professor of divinity in the university of Tubingen, published his observations upon the work of Grotius in 1671, and affected to criticize him, almost every where. The year following, Mr Puffendorf published his book De Jure Naturæ & Gentium, wherein he fully explains what had been omitted or lightly touched upon by Grotius: and some look upon his work as a large supplement to Grotius, and others, as a continued commentary upon Grotius. The observations of Henry Heniges upon Grotius came out in 1673. He follows the opinions of that author, and maintains them against those who wrote against them. About the same time, John George Simon reprinted Grotius's book with notes, particularly concerning the civil-law, and the law of nations. Sometimes he takes part with John à Felden against him. In 1676, Samuel Rachelius published his treatise De Jure Naturæ & Gentium, and Valentinus Velthem put out his introduction to Grotius's work in three volumes. John George Kulpis published also his remarks upon the same Grotius in 1682. Gronovius made learned notes upon the same book of Grotius in the year 1680. Mr de Courtin translated it into French in 1687. Mr Becman published it in 1691, cum notis Variorum, which he took out of the most famous authors who had written upon it, as Boeclerus, Zieglerus, Osiander, Puffendorf, Simon, Gronovius, and some others. It is further said, in Mr Chauvin's memoir, that in the year 1696, there came out a new edition of that book of Grotius in folio, with Mr Vandemeulen's commentary (82). It is to be observed, that this memoir serves as an introduction to an abstract, published by Mr Chauvin, of a commentary of Job. Tesmarius in Hugonis Grotii de Jure Belli ac Pacis libros 3, printed in folio at Francfort, in the year 1696, with the notes of Ulric Obrecht upon the same work of Grotius. Mr Tesmar, who died in the year 1693, had been twenty years upon that commentary (83). Mr Becman's work abovementioned was reprinted at Francfort on the Oder in 1699, in 4to. It is intitled; Hugonis Grotii de jure belli & pacis libri tres, in quibus jus naturæ & gentium, item juris publici præcipua explicantur cum Annotationis Autoris ex postrema ejus ante obitum cura. Accesserunt excerpta annotationum variorum virorum insignium in totum opus. Edente Job. Christoph. Becmano. Thus Grotius, fifty years after his death, obtained an honour, which was not bestowed upon the ancients till after many ages: I mean, that he has appeared cum Commentariis Variorum. I have just now read in a book of Mr Crenius (84), that Theodore Grafwinckel wrote the original of that book of Grotius, who dictated it to him, ex ore dictantis Grotii se excepisse, eoque in ordinem demum redegit. Christopher Arnoldus had this particular from Grafwinckel himself, and inserted it in a letter printed with those of Richter.

[P] I shall say something of Grotius's book, concerning the history of the Low-Countries. It contains an account of what happened in the Netherlands from the departure of Philip II. till 1608. It is divided into annals, and history: the annals comprehend five books: the history contains eighteen, and begins in the year 1588. Casaubon, who had read something of it in the year 1613, speaks well of it in a letter written from London to Thuanus (85). He observes, that there were twenty one books in that work: he did not reckon well; but perhaps the two last books were added to it since. The author did not publish that history; he only shewed the manuscript copy to Casaubon. It did not come out till after the author's decease, Grotius having had some reasons to keep it by him during his life. . . . (86). His wife refused the manuscript of that history to Sarrauius, though he offered her two thousand livres for it (87). It was printed at Amsterdam for John Blaeu, in the year 1657, in folio, and in the year 1658, in 12mo (88).

Mr L'Heritier translated it into French (89). The French translation was reprinted at Paris in the year 1672, in folio. See the extract Mr Denys gave of it, in his seventh memoir concerning arts and sciences (90). Here follows the judgment of the author of the Parrhasiana. 'We may add to Polybius, a famous historian among the moderns, who, tho' he had been a great sufferer by the injustice of a great prince, relates his noble actions as carefully as any other historian, and speaks of him according to his merit, without saying any thing, whereby it may appear that he had reason to complain of him. I mean, the incomparable Hugo Grotius, who speaks, in his history of the Netherlands, of prince Maurice de Nassau, as if he had never been ill treated by him. This is a remarkable instance of impartiality, which shews, that it is not impossible to overcome one's passion, and speak well of one's enemies, as several people fancy, who judge of others by themselves (91).' The author, who observes this fine passage in Grotius's history, did it not out of flattery; for he blames him afterwards for a thing that deserves to be blamed: he does not approve Grotius's style; and shews thereby, that he is a man of a good taste. 'None, says he, (92), of those, who spoke well at Athens, and at Rome, expressed themselves so obscurely in conversation, as Thucydides and Tacitus did in their histories. Doubtless, they had a mind to raise themselves above common use, and thereby they fell into that obscurity, for which they are justly reprov'd. It cannot be denied, that they have an affected stile, and that they hoped to recommend their histories, as it were, by a manly eloquence, whereby it seems that many things are expressed in few words, and raised above the capacity of the vulgar. I cannot apprehend why some learned men undertook to imitate them, as Hugo Grotius, and Dionysius Vossius in his translation of Rheide's history, and how they could relish such a stile. For certainly good thoughts need not be obscure to be approved by good judges; and when a reader is obliged to stop continually, in order to look for the sense, he does not think himself in the least obliged to an historian, who gives him that trouble. This is the reason why some histories, though excellent as to the matter, are read by few people; whereas if those historians designed to write for the instruction of those, who have a sufficient knowledge of the Latin tongue, to read a history with pleasure, they should have endeavoured to make themselves easily understood, and useful to as many people as ever they could. The more a history deserves to be read by reason of the events contained in it, the more it deserves to be of a general use. The authority of the ancients, who neglected the clearness of the stile, cannot justify the moderns, who have imitated them, contrary to the reasons, I have mentioned, or rather contrary to good sense. There is nothing in Tacitus that less deserves to be imitated, than his too concise and consequently obscure stile; and yet that very fault has been most imitated. I am sorry Grotius is one of those who did not avoid it. The great Bignon, who did not approve that stile, had almost persuaded the author to alter it. 'Amavit (Grotius) ubique orationem pressam, & quadam dignitate gravem. A qua nec in historia sibi temperavit. Satis constat, virum nostri sæculi summum, omnique doctrinæ & auctorem & censorem gravissimum, Hieronymum Bignonium, cum ineditis adhuc Grotii historias & Annales legisset, non probasse brevitate orationis, obscuritatem obnoxiam, in illo genere scripturæ, quod à perspicua venustate potissimum commendationem caperet; peneque Grotio persuasisse, ut referiberet (93). — Grotius was every where fond of a concise and majestic stile; which he could not forbear using in history. It is well known, that one of the learnedest men of our time, Jerom Bignon, having read the histories and annals of Grotius in manuscript, disapproved the brevity of stile, which made it liable to obscurity, in a kind of writing, whose greatest recommendation is perspicuity; and that he had almost persuaded Grotius to write it over again.' Mr de la Neufville, in the preface to his history of Holland, affirms, that Grotius had begun to mould his work anew.

GRUTERUS (PETER) was born in the Palatinate. His father, THOMAS GRUTERUS, who fled thither (a), because the Protestants were persecuted in the Netherlands; was professor at Duisburg [A], and had three or four sons who were men of letters [B]. Peter Gruterus, who makes the subject of this article, practised physic in several towns of Flanders, at Dixmuyde, at Ostend, &c. and was not very well pleased with the Flemish (b). He published, at Leyden, in the year 1609, a century of Latin letters, that were very ill used by the printers and the critics [C]. He affected, in those letters, a style, full of old words and obsolete phrases. He left Ostend in 1620, and retired to Middleburg. I know not whether he made a long stay in that town; but I think he endeavoured to make his fortune in several places, before he settled at Amsterdam, where the magistrates proved bountiful to him (c). He published there a new century of letters in the year 1629 [D], and died in the same place, in the year 1634 (d). Swertius (e) says, he was born at Ziriczée in Zealand, and that he spent some years in Italy.

[A] His father Thomas Gruterus was professor at Duisburg (1). This appears from some letters printed at the end of the second century of Peter Gruterus, his son, some of which were written by that Thomas Gruterus. He wrote several books (2), and, among others, the history of David George, and a confutation of his heresies.

[B] . . . and had three or four sons, who were men of letters.] JAMES GRUTERUS, the son of Thomas, was professor of history in the illustrious school of Middleburg in the year 1604. Some of his letters have been printed at the end of the second century of Peter Gruterus, his brother, with a catalogue of some books written by him, which were never printed. REINIER GRUTERUS, the son of the same Thomas, was principal of Casimir college at Heidelberg. Some of his letters to his brother Peter are to be found at the end of the second century, just now mentioned, with a list of his manuscript works. JOHN GRUTERUS, another son of Thomas, left his studies, and took a journey into Italy, which did not prove lucky; for, being so imprudent as to dispute about the eucharist, he was obliged to run away, for fear of falling into the hands of the inquisitors. He fled to Naples in the night, and soon after fell out to return into his own country; but he died of a sickness before he made an end of his journey (3). Some of his letters have been published with those of his brothers.

(3) Petri Gruteri, Epist. Centuria 2. pag. 234.

[C] His Latin letters were very ill used by the printers and the critics.] He complains of the printer at the beginning of his second century (4): 'Externa quoque fata saepe eas involunt; Typographo alibi stertente, & correctoris ignavia vacillante: quæ fors meas certe obruit, nusquam prælo magis famæ autoris invidente, quibus si desidiâ illius associo, cujus fidei typorum curam adscripseram, omnem exculationis cumulum confeci. — They likewise suffer thro' the negligence of the printer and corrector: This was certainly the fate of my letters, no author's fame having suffered more by the press; to which if I add the carelessness of him whom I intrusted with the care of the impression, I shall have fully apologized for myself.' The same complaint is to be seen in many other places in that work. His resentment against those, who censured the first century, does also frequently appear in it, and he expresses it with the same earnestness. His son hopes that the second century will meet with a better reception. 'Vario fato prima Centuria fluctuavit, iniqui subinde Cenforis aciem experta, prout rudi manu libram hanc vitio-creati judices versarunt. Sed qui felices adolescentie tui primitias non benigne ventilarunt, secundæ virilitatis messiem admirari discant (5). — The first century of letters was variously fated, meeting now and then with an ill-natured critic, as it happened to fall into the hands of bad judges. But let those, who censured the first fruits of your youth, learn to admire the harvest of your fertile manhood.' The truth is, that those, who ridiculed those letters, had good reason for it; and yet many persons complimented the author upon that work in a very high strain: he took care to prefix those compliments to his second century. Which shews, that whoever writes to a vain author, whose books are not good, ought duly to consider his words. It is to be feared, that such a man will publish the encomiums bestowed upon him, if he has the originals in his hands. Peter Gruterus foresaw, that the affectation of his old language would not be approved, and therefore he made an apology for it before hand, and printed it with the first letters (6).

(5) Ibid. pag. 184.

[D] He published a new century of letters.] Valerius Andreas is mistaken, when he says, that Isaac Gruterus, the author's son, published it. It plainly appears from the epistle dedicatory, and the preface, and from a letter of Giles Snouck prefixed to the rest, that it was Peter Gruterus who put out the second century. The same appears from a letter of his son Isaac, printed at the end of the book, with a Carmen gratulatorium, which he made upon that edition, and with some other letters written by him to several persons.

GRUTERUS (JANUS), a learned philologist, and one of the most laborious writers of his time, was born at Antwerp the 3d of December 1560. He was but a child, when his father (a) and mother, being proscribed on account of the Protestant religion by the dukes of Parma, governors of the Low-Countries, removed him into England. His mother, who was a learned woman [A], was his chief tutor. He spent some years in the university of Cambridge, from whence he went to that of Leyden [B], in order

(a) I speak of him towards the end of the remark [B].

[A] His mother . . . was a learned woman.] She was an English woman (1), and her name was Catherine Tishem (2). She understood Greek so well, that she could read Galen in that language, which very few physicians can do. 'Is sicut rebus duris constantiæ doctores utrumque parentem, ita matrem præcipue studiorum magistram, votum simul Agasicles consecutus est, ut eorum discipulus diceretur, quorum & filius esset. Mater enim præter Gallicam, Italianam, Britannicam linguam, Latinas litteras optime, Græcæ ita callebat, ut & Galenum, quod millesimus Medicus vix solet, linguâ Galeni legerit. — In adversity, he was taught constancy by both his parents; but his mother had the chief direction of his studies; in which he had, what Agasicles wished for, the happiness of being both pupil and son to the same person. For his mother, besides French, Italian, and English, was so well acquainted with Greek and Latin, that she could read Galen in his own language. 'which scarce one physician in a thousand can do.' I doubt this woman has been too often forgotten by those, who have published catalogues of learned women.

[B] He passed some years in the university of Cambridge, from whence he went to that of Leyden.] He studied there for the space of seven years, if we believe Valerius Andreas (3), who quotes a preface of Gruterus himself; and adds, that Gruterus had been in England ever since he was four years of age, till he came to be nineteen; and that, intending to settle at Antwerp, his birth-place, after he had been admitted doctor of the civil-law, he immediately left it, being informed, that the duke of Parma was ready to besiege it. His father, who was a considerable man, and had order to study the civil-law. He took there his doctor's degree; but afterwards he wholly applied himself to the belles lettres, and soon published some critical books [C]. Though it is known in general that he travelled, one cannot give an account of the circumstances and order of his travels. He was in Prussia, when Christian, duke of Saxony, offered him the professorship of history in the university of Wittenberg. He accepted it, but kept it only a few months, because Christian died soon after; and those, who governed after him, obliged all the professors to subscribe a formulary, or to resign their places. Gruterus chose rather to resign his, than to subscribe any confession of faith against his conscience [D]. I find, that he read publick lectures in the university ome employments in that town during the siege, being unwilling, that his son should stay in it at that troublesome time, sent him to travel into France. These computations are wrong; for they suppose, that the duke of Parma besieged Antwerp in the year 1586, which is not true; he besieged it in 1584; and therefore, if Gruterus had left Leyden, to retire to Antwerp, before the siege, he could not have studied in England till he was nineteen years of age, and then at Leyden for the space of seven years. But to go on, our Gruterus's father's name was Gualtherus; he was a burgomaster of Antwerp (4), and subscribed the famous petition, that was presented to the dukes of Parma, and which gave rise to the name Gueux, Beggars. Being proscribed, he went through many hardships, before he got to Norwich in England, where he stayed a considerable time; afterwards he came to Middleburg, from whence he removed to Antwerp, when the States were masters of it. He demanded of the senate that he might be exempted from all offices; which was granted him, till they were threatened with a siege, and then he was not only appointed captain of his ward, but also one of the four overseers of the provisions. Gualtherus vici sui Magister delectus est; cui muneri minus gravi succellit deinde gravius, cum Parmensis obsidionem fecisset. Rei namque frumentarie quatuorvir, collegis Aldegondio, Lefdale & Resa, adscitus in partem gloriæ illius mittendus est, quod annonæ conscientiam sic inter paucos septem tenuissent, ut citra dedicationem nec civi nec hosti constare posset, tantum tridui frumentum superfuisset (5).

[C] He soon published some critical books. He published first of all some Latin verses, being about twenty years of age. Famae suæ immortalis janua circa annum vigesimum aperiens versibus quos Ocellus vocabat (6). Afterwards he put out, at Wittenberg in the year 1591, Suspicionum libri IX. in quibus varia scriptorum loca emendata & explicata; and then he printed, successively, notes upon most of the ancient Latin authors, upon the two Senecas, Martial, Cicero, Livy, Florus, Velleius Paterculus, &c.

[D] He chose to resign his place, rather than to subscribe any confession of faith against his conscience. They required from him, that he should sign the book of the concord: he answered, that he knew not what it was, that he had never read or seen that book, and that it would be great rashness for any one to approve a thing, that he has not examined (7). Whereupon he was dismissed, with two others, who refused to subscribe; but they came off cheaper than he. They received half a year's salary as a gratification, as is usually practised in that country, in favour of those, who are honourably dismissed. Gruterus was so far from being gratified in the same manner, that he had not so much as the charges of his journey paid him. He was the worst courtier in the world; he minded nothing but his books, and did not care to trifle away his time in visiting and cringing to the court favourites, in order to insinuate himself into their good graces; and he thought, that, all things duly considered, it would be better for him not to think of that gratification, than to engage in long and troublesome solicitations about it. Causa superius indicata, quod purpurae Aulicæ adorare nescierat, Principi verò tormentum, aut supplicationis continuæ fideculas adhibere sibi interdixerat. Minus enim molestiæ ineffe videbatur impendio expedito, quam stipendio aut præmio intercato (8). This is the true character of a man, who is a meer scholar. But perhaps it may seem strange, that a man, who had read so much, should not have known what the book of the concord was. I do not think that Gruterus had a vast genius; but his extraordinary application, his great desire of knowing a world of things, and his prodigious diligence in making large collections, gave him a kind of universal knowledge, for which he was not naturally qualified. How comes it then, that he neglected to inform himself of a thing, which divided the churches, and made a great noise among divines? In all likelihood, he had no inclination for the study of controversies. To speak more positively, he did not approve the disputes of divines (9); he would never meddle with them; he never had any quarrel about religion with the Roman Catholics; and therefore he was suspected of being inclined to change his religion. Venator, his panegyrist, is a little angry with those, who entertained such suspicions. There are his words (10): 'Huc accedit quædam alia demencia, quæ frigere eos dicit in Religione, quos in contentiones non vident ardescere. Pontificis non oblocutus es? Pontificius habetis. Lutheranus non reluctatus? Lutheranus audis. Calvinista non insultasti? Calvinista es. Istis enim nominibus invicem discimus. Novi qui de GRUTERO propter hanc ipsam causam Transitionem sperant. Sicut & David Chytræus, quod in Academia Rostochiana GRUTERO, qui tunc ibidem Suetonium legebat, conjunctior erat, & studium rixandi averfabatur, Calviniani nominis invidiam sustinuit. — To this may be added another piece of madness, which calls those cold in religious matters, who are not heated with controversy. Have you never reviled a Papist? You are a Papist. Have you never struggled with a Lutheran? You are called a Lutheran. Have you never insulted a Calvinist? You are a Calvinist. For these are the names, that alternately divide us. I know some, who, for this very reason, spread a report, that Gruterus was gone over. In like manner David Chytræus, because he was intimate, in the university of Rostoc, with Gruterus, who then read lectures on Suetonius, and hated contention, was branded with the name of a Calvinist.' This panegyrist had been speaking very judiciously against those, who love disputing, and concerning the ill effects of controversies. Men do not grow the better for them, says he, but more spiteful against their neighbours. 'Certamina talia semper ferè istis eventibus finiuntur, ut acerbius fiat odium inter partes, & nemo per illa melior. Mira res est, quod commissionibus sectionum, argumentorum versutis, clamoribus, convitiis, mutuis execrationibus Deo nos gratiores fieri putamus, cum amor & pax, & mansuetudo, & præcedendum mater Fides nobis rem conficiant, quorum tamen postrema cura habetur, & inter disceptandum nulla. Hæreses odisti? Dicam quæ maxima sit, Hypocrisis. Hanc prius exuamus. Quotus enim quisque de gloria Dei prius cogitat, quam de sua? Quotusquisque melius vivit, quam disputat (11)? — Such kind of disputes generally end in such a manner, that the parties are still more exasperated against each other, and no one is the better for it. It is strange, that we should think to render ourselves acceptable to GOD, by factious disputes, by clamour and mutual reviling; when love, peace, mildness, and faith, the mother of them all, do our business, yet are last taken care-of, and amidst disputation not at all. Do you hate heresies? I will tell you which is the greatest; Hypocrisy. Let us first divest ourselves of this. For how seldom do we consider the glory of GOD before our own? How few of us live better, than we dispute.' I must acquaint the reader, that one ought not hastily to believe what Venator advances upon this subject; for he seems too angry with the divines, and makes an odious description of them; and therefore the following words ought to be read with caution (12). 'Multas inauspicatas, inimicas & arcenes aves mortales illi ubique fere nanciscuntur, nullas tamen infellores hominibus, quàm quæ de suggestu diris omnibus regnant, & populares animos odiis asperant, quos vetus Augu-versity of Rostoc (b), but I do not know when, nor how, he left that university. The place, where he appeared as a professor with the greatest lustre, was Heidelberg, where he had also the direction of that famous library (c), which was removed to Rome some time after. He was very fit for such an employment, which very much helped him in writing a great many commentaries. One of the most useful works, he published, is a large collection of inscriptions [E]. Nothing could be more deplorable for a man of his character, than the loss he sustained, when his fine library was plundered [F], with the town of Heidelberg, in the year 1622. Before that town was taken, he retired to his son-in-law at Bretten, from whence he removed to Tübingen. He returned to Bretten, when the affairs of the Palatinate began to be in a better posture; but,

* about it, his house was set on fire, and all his goods
* and inscriptions, except fifty sheets he had laid by in
* a closet, were burnt. Laurinus encouraged him, with
* entreaties and promises, to restore that work to its * first perfection, which was done; and thus that fine * collection was delivered to Laurinus, who, preparing * to retire into France by reason of the civil wars,
* took those inscriptions along with him, as also the
* treasure of ancient medals, which Hubert Goltzius * had collected with great pains and vast charges. The * whole was taken from him by the English garrison * of Ostend. No application could be made again to * Smetius; for, being minister of the Reformed at Brussels, he had been hanged there by the soldiers.

Goltzius married his widow. Whereupon Janus Douza, being sent into England by the States, bought the manuscript inscriptions of an English soldier, and gave it to Lipsius, who had it printed with some supplements. Gruterus took those inscriptions, to which he added as many as he could get, with prodigious pains, and, putting them in order, published them at Heidelberg, in the year 1601, being so happy as to prevail upon Scaliger to make twenty four Indexes, upon which that great man bestowed ten months. Hic Gruterus tandem noster agnino pro-sus labore ex lateritio marmoreum imo aureum fecit, nam & illas pauciores primo servavit, & omnes quæquot unquam in toto orbe superfuissent collegit inscriptiones, & eadem in ordinem coegit, & denique Cæsari Rudolpho pa-renti publico perpetuæque Augusto dedicatam publicavit.
Cui ipsemet Josephus Scaliger in senecta ætate, solo amore atque studio quo Gruterum prosequatur compulsus, viginti quatuor Indices decem mensibus continuo illis insudando adiecit (14). The emperor commended that work very much, and left it to Gruterus's choice what reward he should bestow upon him. The author answered, he left it to the discretion of the emperor, provided the reward should not consist in money:

and, when he came to hear that there was a design to give him a coat of arms, in order to set off his noble extraction in the empire: he gave to understand, that he was so far from desiring a new coat of arms, that he found that, which he had from his ancestors, a burthen to him. Whereupon the emperor was advised to grant him a licence for all the books he should publish (15). That prince approved of it, and, besides, thought fit that Gruterus should have a character whereby he might have a right to grant licences (16): he designed to make him count of the sacred palace; but, because he died before he could sign the patent, the business came to nothing.
Gruterus was too hasty in expressing his acknowledgement. 'Decreta res apud Principem, approbata in Senatu Augusto, relata ad principem iterum, ut subscribendo firmaret, quod præscripserat communicando.

Sed Cæsarem occupavit morbus, deinde fatum, quod bonas actiones plerumque cum authoribus finit. Literæ itaque quibus superiora Privilegia continebantur, sicut ejus generis mille alia, more quodam differendi, relicta sunt absque manu Imperatoris, absque signatione, nec postea unquam productæ, quia nova Potestas faciliùs sua beneficia orditur, quàm aliena abolvit, & novis curis occupata rarò succedit in obligatione veteris promissi. Itaque GRUTERUS luculentissimum mu-nus nunquam accepit, & laudes Cæsaris optimi sic ce-lebravit, quasi integrum accepisset (17). — The thing was consented to by the emperor, approved by the Aulic council, and returned to the emperor, that he might confirm, what he had directed, by his sign manual. But it was prevented by the emperor's death, a fatality, which generally puts an end to good actions with their authors. Therefore the letters patent, which contained the above privileges, together with many others of the same kind, by being deferred, were left unsigned by the emperor, nor were ever after produced; for a new prince is more inclined to begin with conferring his own favours, than with completing those of others, and, being taken up with new cares, thinks itself under no obligation to make good an old promise. Therefore GRUTERUS never received this noble privilege; yet he celebrated the praises of the best of emperors, as if he had been put in full possession of it.

twelve thousand crowns (18). Oswald Smendius, his son-in-law, endeavoured in vain to preserve it: to that end, he wrote to one of the general officers of the Ba-

but, being molested there by the Roman Catholics [G], he retired to a country-house, which he bought near Heidelberg. He went to that town now and then, and set out from it, on the day that he fell sick of the illness of which he died. He set out from it the tenth of September, 1627, to go to Berhelden (d), where he ended his life ten days after. He was buried at Heidelberg in St Peter's church. Just at the time of his death, the news came, that the university of Groningen offered to make him professor of history, and of the Greek tongue (e). He had been invited to several other places [H]. As I have already said, he was a most laborious man [I]. He had a very uncommon quality;

varian troops; but the licentiousness of the soldiers prevailed over the good intentions of that officer. Smendius, being informed, that Gruterus's house was plundered, repaired to Heidelberg, and saw the books pillaged. He endeavoured to save at least those, which the amanuensis of Gruterus had removed into the electoral library, and desired the Pope's commissioner to give him leave to take them out. He was answered, that the Pope would have all the manuscripts to be carefully preserved, and carried to Rome; but that the printed books might be restored to Gruterus, provided Tilly approved of it by a note signed with his own hand. This pretended civility proved insignificant, because Tilly could not be spoken to (13).

[G] He was molested there by the Roman Catholics. I have already said (20), that he never loved controversies, or disputes about religion; and therefore, being importuned by some young Jesuits, who were mightily for disputing, he quickly left Bretten. The first time he gave them a gentle answer, and set them right upon a passage of St Augustin, which they had quoted wrong; but, when they renewed the attack, he grew somewhat angry, called them presumptuous young men, and told them how civilly he was used by Andreas Schottus and James Sirmond. 'Ipsum quoque juvenes quidam ex familia Jesuitarum disputando sollicitabant, quibus ille primum placide respondit, & semel etiam sententiam Augustini, quam non satis memoriter ipsi meminerant, ex libro præfenti ostendit, docuitque aliis verbis, & alio loco extare, quod ab illis & pro illis fuerat allatum. Deinde cum nec dum desisterent, quin ipsum talibus obtunderent, libertate resumpta, mirari se dixit, ubi frontem reliquissent semibarbatuli juvenes, ut spernent docere senem sexagenarium, qui plures patres in vita legerit, quam ipsi saltem vidissent. Jesuitas senes & primarios (SCHOTTUM nominabat & SIRMONDUM) sibi mutuo honore litterarumque commercio coli: nullam tamen ab ipsis de religione sibi molestiam exhiberi. Erat enim noster alienus ab istis velitationibus, quas nec in aliis probavit (21).

(21) Id. pag. 208, 209.

— Some young Jesuits likewise teased him with offers of disputation; whom he at first answered with mildness, and even once pointed out to them, upon the spot, a passage of St Augustin, which they had not sufficiently remembered, and showed them that it was extant in other words, and in another place, than as they had produced it. At last, when he found they continued to importune him in the same manner, he assumed a freedom of speech, and said, he wondered where they had left their modesty, that such half fledged boys should pretend to instruct an old man of sixty, who had read more fathers in his life, than they had seen: that men of years and distinction among the Jesuits (particularly SCHOTTUS and SIRMOND) did him the honour to correspond with him, but never troubled him about religion. For Gruterus was averse himself to those squabbles, and disapproved of them in others. It was not the business of such a critic, as Gruterus, to dispute about controverted doctrines with young Jesuits, bred up in the subtilties of the schools; and he found, that the only way of avoiding their importunity, was to live at some distance from them.

(22) Id. Venator, ibid. pag. 239.

[H] He had been invited to several other places. The most considerable invitation was that of Padua. They offered him (22) the chair of Riccoboni, who was lately dead, with a noble salary, and a promise that he should enjoy liberty of conscience; but he refused all those advantages, notwithstanding the solicitations of Pinellus and Velsus to the contrary. He was afraid of exposing himself to envy by so honourable and profitable an employment, and would not deprive himself of the public exercise of his religion. 'Erat ei religioni religio, sed & erat religioni ipsa pecuniæ summæ, quæ cæteroqui paucis nimia est, & multis opportuna ad impietatem merces. . . . Cultus enim divini libertatem publicam (quamvis privatam recepturus) pro quibuscunque divitiis sibi negabat esse venalem; præterea tam humanum sciebat esse invidere alienæ felicitati, quam alienæ virtuti, & hanc quidem propter invidiam non esse deferendam, illum verò feliciorum esse, qui non sit infelix, quam qui cum invidia felicissimus (23). — He made a conscience of religion, as he did likewise of the salary, which to a few is too great, and to many an occasion of impiety. . . . for he declared nothing should bribe him to quit the public exercise of his religion, tho' he might have been allowed it in private; besides, he knew men are as apt to envy another's happiness, as another's virtue, and that the latter is not to be forsaken on account of envy; but that he is more happy, who is not unhappy, than he who is most happy, with envy. This is more meritorious in a critic, than it would be in many others. I find, that Gruterus was invited to Denmark; and that the constable d'Elziguieres wrote to him, and desired him to enter into his service; and that Claudius d'Expilly, and Charles Perinet, lord of Maugarnac, exhorted him to comply with the constable's desire (24). The curators of the university of France offered him, in 1624, the professorship of history (25).

[I] He was a most laborious man. How many learned men might be called idle, if their labours were compared with Gruterus's? Cum quo etiam doctissimi bujus ævi, si laboris emenji respectu comparantur, desidiosis vocantur (26). Spizelius, who says this, had it from Flayder, who adds: 'Cum etiam illi qui tota sua vita literis assident huic collati, quasi somno ac inertia dediti erubescere cogantur, nisi Gruteri labores callidius dissimulare velint, quam candidius æstimare. — When even those, who spend their whole lives in study, if compared to him, are forced to blush for their want of industry, unless they more cunningly dissemble, than candidly reckon up the labours of Gruterus.' Spizelius observes, that Gruterus published a book almost every month: 'Nullus ferè author five Græcus five Latinus extabat ex antiquis, quem non notis ac commentariis suis aut illustravit, aut illustrare potuerit; nemo plura veterum recensuit monumenta & restituit, imò singulos suæ vitæ annos, ac propemodum menses, libris singulis à se editis distinxit. — There was scarce any ancient author, Greek or Latin, extant, whom he did not either comment upon, or could have done it: no one revised and restored more remains of antiquity, inasmuch that he distinguished each year, almost each month, of his life by the books he published.' He studied all day, and a great part of the night, and always standing: Die toto maximam sæpe noctium partem stans literis operam navabat. . . . stans scribebat, stans legebat, stans studebat (27). Any one that considers the many books he wrote, or collected into one body, will easily believe this extraordinary application. His Theſaurus Criticus (28) is a work of the last sort, wherein he collected into six large volumes, in 8vo, a vast number of tracts of the most excellent critics, which could hardly be met with, if he had not collected them. He did the same service to many modern poets, whose works he collected, with this title: Deliciae Poëtarum Gallorum, Italorum, Belgarum, in nine volumes (29). He called himself, in that compilation, Ranutius Gerus, which is the anagram of his own name (§2). He published two Florilegiums. The first, in three volumes in 8vo, contains a great collection of proverbs of most nations, and notes. The second is a continuation of Langius's Polyanthea. The first volume of that continuation was printed at Strasburg in the year 1624, in folio. 'Composuit (30) quoque Polyantheæ tomum tertium & quartum nondum tamen editos, qui si referantur ad Langiaquality; for he was not intent upon gain. He did not care to increase his income. He was very charitable to the poor, and lent money, without much inquiring whether it would be paid him again [K]. He patiently bore adversity; and, if he was not insensible upon the death of his four wives, it appeared at least that it was no very difficult thing to comfort him [L]. His most violent quarrel, about learning, was with Philip Pareus: I have mentioned it in another place (f). That which he had with Dionysius Gothofredus, was like a torrent [M]; violent, but of no long continuance.

‘num sunt Oceanus ad guttulas. - He composed likewise the third and fourth volumes of the Polyanthea, not yet published, which, if compared with that of Langius, are as an ocean to a few drops.’ He published a Chronicon Chronicorum Ecclesiasticum & Politicum, in four large volumes in 8vo, at Francfort, 1614, and, instead of putting his own name to it, he put that of Johannes Gualterus, in honour of his father's memory (31). He was too fond of writing many books; which is the reason why choice and judgment do not prevail in his works. Non curat, says Scaliger (32), utrum charta sit cacata, modo libros multos excudat. . . . quod fecit Gruterus in Senecam, is a school-boy's or a printer's work. Mr Amelot de la Houffaye (33) speaks with great contempt of this critic's performance upon Tacitus, and Badius had passed the same judgment upon it long before. ‘Vidi quæ J. Gruterus ad eum auctorem annotavit. Diligentiam ejus in colligendis varie sententiis improbare nefas sit. Sed (quod libere liceat) commissiones meræ sunt, & ut flagitiosissimi Caligulae non absonum dictum in re simili usurpam, arena sine calce. his diligence in collecting the opinions of different authors. But I must say they are meer patch-work, without coherence, and, to use an apt expression of the wicked Caligula on a like occasion, sand without lime. . . . he seems to have proposed to himself for imitation the method which Lipsius followed in his excellent work De civili doctrina. But, Good GOD! how greatly does he fall short of that author.’ You will see another passage of the same author in the remark [M].

His excessive application to books was probably the cause of some starts of fancy, which made Commenlinus say, that Gruterus ‘was a mad man. When he meets with something, that he does not understand, he frets, and throws the book upon the floor (35).

[§ a.] Mr Bayle should have said Gruterus; for so it is in the title page of the books he speaks of. Father Vavasseur has written with an b, but erroneously, Gruterus, p. 209, de Epigrammate Liber & Epigrammatum Libri tres, Parisiis 1609 in 8vo. REM. CRIT.]

[K] He lent money, without much inquiring whether it would be paid him again.] Tho’ he had been caught, he was still willing to lend his money, and thought himself happy, that he was not a woman; for, said he, by way of jest, I should have denied no body. ‘Et egenis benignè dedit, & indigis promptè credidit; utrumque virtute indolis, cum tam crudele putaret non dare esurienti, quam inhumanum negare mutuant. Et quamquam ipsius argentum non semel in mala nomina inciderat, & obliviosam fidem, facientibus ex commodato donum, quibus dignum erat ultra sortem etiam usuræ loco reddere gratias; non tamen desistebat ille, quoties rogaretur, pecunias promere auxiliares, cum interim subinde confiteretur damnosam facilitatem suam, dicere per jocum solitus: Bene secum actum, quid puella non esset natus, haud dubie enim nemini se fuisse negaturum (36). — He was both charitable to the poor, and ready to lend his money to those who wanted it; and in both he followed his natural inclination, whilst he thought it as cruel not to feed the hungry, as inhuman to refuse a borrower. And tho’ he often met with bad debts, those who borrowed of him, looking on what he lent as a gift, who, besides the interest, ought to have repaid him with thanks; yet he ceased not to lend his money, as often as he was asked, at the same time acknowledging that he suffered by his rashness, and saying jestingly of himself: that it was well for him he was not born a girl, since he should undoubtedly have refused no body.’ The ingratitude or unfairness of some of his debtors did not make him more cautious for the future, by requiring security, or a bond. Nay, he neglected those formalities, when he paid the portions of his daughters. ‘In se itaque potius facere lusi, quam ingratos asperè perstrinxit, aut propter hos inhumaniter alios rejectit, aut eisdem sponsoribus, testibus, aut scriptis publicis stipavit, ut & ipsi in ære essent, & fides in custodia. Quem morem vulgò receptum noster ne tunc quidem adhibuit, cum majoris etiam momenti pacta forent condenda, cum filiabus generos daret & dotem, nulla testium conscientia, nulla Formulariorum curiositate, nulla cerâ, quam fœderi generique opus esse censebat (37). — Therefore he rather jested upon himself, than reflected upon the ingratitude of his creditors, or inhumanly rejected others upon their account, or even required proper security of them. This usual precaution he neglected even when he was to enter into contracts of much more importance, I mean when he was to marry and portion his daughters; for he thought there was no need of witnesses, of writings, of signing and sealing, between father-in-law and son-in-law.’

(37) Id. ibid.

[L] It was no very difficult thing to comfort him.] This may be inferred from the words of his panegyrist; and it is likely, he did not say all that he knew about it, thinking that insensibility was not a commendable thing. He says, that one of Gruterus's four wives died a violent death; she fell from the top of the house and was killed: nevertheless her husband bore it patiently, tho’ the circumstances of his wife's death should have increased his grief. ‘Doluit ille quidem magnopere morte uxoris, doluit ipsa specie mortis, doluit inopinâ viduitate; sed post amissionem tamen uxoris multum abuit ab amissione sui, multum ab impatientia vulgari, quæ plerumque cum corrigere non possit mala sua, corrigere vult Deum (38). — He grieved indeed greatly for the death of his wife; he lamented the particular circumstances of it; he was afflicted at his sudden widowhood; but the loss of his wife was far from making him lose himself; nor did he shew that usual impatience, which, when it cannot remedy it's misfortunes, is apt to quarrel with GOD.

(38) Ibid. pag.

[M] The quarrel he had with Dionysius Gothofredus was like a torrent.] That learned civilian corrected some passages of Seneca differently from him; whereupon Gruterus immediately put out a book with this title; Confirmatio suspicionum extraordinariorum contra Dionysii Gothofredi conjecturas & varias lectiones in Senecam Philosopherum. He published it at Francfort in 1591. The heat of youth carried him too far, and he was very sorry for it afterwards, when Gothofredus became his colleague (39), and they were reconciled. The panegyrist will have it that this dispute is of such a nature, that, considering the learning it contains, we should have been sorry that those two critics had not quarrelled; and that one would wish they had never had any quarrel, by reason of the great passion that appears in it. ‘Quod certamen inter ipsos certatum vix possis nolle, quin velis, vix velles, quin nolis. Adeo multum excidebat inter disceptandum humanioris doctrinæ, adeo multum rursus inhumanioris censura. GRUTERUS ipse calorem illum juvenutis sæpe postea detestatus est. Cum enim optimus & doctissimus Ille, quem GRUTERUS paulo vehementius ante tetigerat, Heidelbergam ipse quoque docendi causa venisset, reconciliatio primum inter ipsos facta est, deinde secuta propior notitia, & tandem apud GRUTERUM penitentia scriptiois, ut ita loquar, piperatæ. Nam si mihi constitisset, inquebat noster, Dionysium virum esse tam bonum, nunquam quicquam mihi tanti fuisset, ut contra illum manum tam seriò misissem (40). — The quarrel between them was such, that you would wish, and would not wish, it had happened; so much learning

(g) With this title: Bibliotheca Erulana, five Enchiridion divine humanaque Prudentiae.

(b) See the remarks [D] and [G].

He made a very good use of his misfortunes in the last years of his life; which appears by the moral reflexions he published (g). His curiosity, though never so great, went no farther than learning: he did not mind the town news, as so many other learned men do [N], who never go to bed without being informed of all the flying stories. Nor did he mind controversies (b); and doubtless this was one of the reasons why one of his antagonists accused him of having no religion. Nevertheless, he gave such proofs of his attachment to the Protestant church, that many passionate and reviling controversialists are not pious enough to do the like [O].

learning fell from them during the dispute, and at the same time so much severe censure of each other. GRUTERUS himself afterwards detested that heat of youth. For when that best and learnedest of men, whom Gruterus had before a little too vehemently attacked, came likewise to Heidelberg to teach there, they were first reconciled, then grew more intimate, till at last GRUTERUS repented of the sharp invectives he had thrown out against him. For had I known, said he, that Dionysius was so good a man, nothing would have provoked me to have fallen upon him so earnestly.

To shew that he was sincerely reconciled to Gothofredus, I shall mention a thing, which I find in Baudius's letters. Baudius desired him to present his service to that civilian; but Gruterus would not do it, because he thought Baudius had not praised Gothofredus according to his merit; and he wrote to him, that it was not enough, for such a man, to say, that he was laborious, and had done no small services to the civil-law; but that he should have commended him for having done very great services to that science, or rather that he should have used more emphatical words. Baudius was offended at this advice, and spoke very unkindly of Gruterus, in a letter which he wrote to a learned man of Hamburg. 'Quemadmodum Grutero non fuit animus salutandi meo nomine Dionysium Godofredum, quia nimis parca manu laudes & virtutes ejus eram persecutus: quod & significavit per literas adjuncto nostro elogio, si forte me ratio fugisset. Erat autem tale, vir laboriosus, & non male de jure meritis. Dicere debueras, inquit, optime, aut si quid aliud efficacius. Vide quid oneris nobis injungatur, ut fasces submittamus scilicet tuis, quibus ex istis vix appropinquemus. Omnes hominis dotes abunde complexus esse videor, si dicam Sarcinatorem esse probum suere centones optime. Ego malim in aeternum egerare omnem scribendi copiam, quam tali pacto me posteritati estimandum proponere, uti haec via & ad opes & ad aeternitatem ducit. ἀλλὰ μάλλον ἀισχύνουμαι καὶ ἐμαυτὸν, καὶ τὰς τῶν ἐσομένων δόξας. Quamquam bonum illum Gruterum (est enim vir minime malus, imo vix capax malitiae) profus habeo excusatum, si id aetatis homo non potest alegare vanissimam illam gloriae cupiditatem, quae nunquam beneficit, & (ut incomparabilis meus Tacitus ait) sapientiam professis, novissima exiit (41). — In like manner as Gruterus was unwilling to make my compliments to Dionysius Godofredus, because I had been too sparing in reciting his praises and virtues; which he signified also by letter, adding my Elogium, lest I should have forgot it. It was as follows: an industrious man, and not ill deserving of the law. You ought, says he, to have said most deserving, or something still stronger. Behold what task is imposed upon me, to submit, forsooth, to those, who are not proper judges. I think I comprehend all the qualifications of the man, if I say, He is a good compiler, and patches up cento's admirably. For my own part, I had rather forswear writing for ever, than be transmitted to posterity under such a character, tho' this way leads both to riches and fame. Tho' I entirely excuse Gruterus (who is indeed a man of no guile) if, at that age, he cannot get rid of that most empty desire of glory, which never decays, and (as Tacitus admirably expresses it) is the least thing which a philosopher speaks off. I think no body will be displeased to know upon what occasion Baudius wrote this. He had been saying: 'If any body enquires after me, be pleased to give him my service, tho' I do not mention him to you; for I do not think that people mis- trust you to such a degree, or that they are so ridiculous in our country, as to believe nothing but what they read (42). Whereupon he tells his friend, that Gruterus refused to give his service to Gothofredus, being not willing to do it without shewing

(41) Baudius, Epist. ix, Centor. 2, pag. m. 164, 165.

(42) Quæro te quoties in quæpiam incidereis cui veniat in mentem nostris, ne graveris cum verbis nostris impartiri salutem, tamen nihil ea de re nominatim caveam. Non enim arbitror aut tibi tam parum esse fidei, aut vestros homines adeo ineptire, ut nihil nisi inspectis signis & tabellis credere sufficient. Id. ibid. pag. 164.

Baudius's own words. This piece of servitude has no place in the epistolary correspondence of men of figure.

[N] He did not mind the town news, as so many other learned men do. The author, I quote, blames the learned men who have such a curiosity, whereby, says he, a man must be willing to hear a thousand flanders and to know the ill designs of step-mothers, and the temptations of widows: temptations do I say? the Latin has it Big-bellies (43). Gruterus was to be praised for not minding such news (44). 'Quamquam in omni artium ac scientiarum indagine curiosissimum semper se exhibuerat, alienissimum tamen fuerat ab omni reliqua curiositate, five πολυπραγμοσύνη, quæ haud raro doctissimis quibusdam nimis est familiaris ac domestica, ut ubique tibi obvium est nil nisi novitates aut rumulculos aniles ad innocentium ac simplicium, ut vocant, mortalium vitam macula inurendam fabrefactus, aucupentur, & impetuosum instar ventorum atque turbineum, non modo vestes hominum, sed ædium quoque parietes atque facta intima supinent, nec prius in dulcem, &c (45).

Tho' he had ever shewed himself most curious in all enquiries of arts and sciences, yet was he a perfect stranger to all other kind of curiosity, such as that impertinent one, which too often is to be found in the most learned men, who run after news and idle reports, which injure the characters of innocent persons, and, like impetuous winds, or storms, lay bare, not only the garments of men, but their very houses, and most secret actions, nor can sleep, &c. The sequel of this passage may be seen in the margin.

[O] He was accused of having no religion. Nevertheless, he gave such proofs of his attachment to the Protestant church, &c. It is said, that Philip Pareus (44) charged him with setting a greater value upon a sentence of Apuleius or Petronius, than upon all the precepts of JESUS CHRIST: he added, that his atheism, and unconcernedness for religion, were very well known. Unum Apuleji ac Petronii effatum pluris facit, quam infinita servatoris nostri παραγγελία. Notus quippe est ejus ἀθεϊσμός, & in sacra religione ψυχρότης frigus (46). I cannot at present verify whether James Gretserus, a Jesuit, who is quoted for this, does faithfully cite Pareus's words; but I am sure, that the following passage is to be found in the index of one of Pareus's books (47): Gruterus scurriliter illud religiosissimis Salvatoris mysteriis; and this other, Gruterus ἀθεῖα & Theologica sacræ ignorantia. The reader is referred to Pag. 334. where these words may be seen: 'Abi, Grutere; & Theologica mitte, quæ nihil ad Criticum tuum umbonem. Tuum est, conficari cum blattis ac tineis: non scurrilari mysteria sacra, quæ nunquam didicisti, immo quæ adspernari solitus es, Critico planè & asinino supercilio. — Go, Gruter, and lay aside divinity: it has nothing to do with criticism; your business is to combat with moths and worms, not to search into sacred mysteries, which you never learnt, nay always despised, with the supercilious contempt of a dull critic.' We have seen that Gruterus refused to subscribe a formula (48), out of a principle of conscience, tho' he lost his place by it: and, being offered a professor's chair at Padua (49), he would not accept of it, because he could not there have the public exercise of his religion: how great therefore was his boldness, who charged him with atheism? besides, this pretended atheist answered those, who put it to his choice, either to leave his country, or to change his religion, I had rather leave my country: if I am not allowed to live in a town, I shall live in the fields or in woods: God will supply me with herbs or roots the remaining part of my life, which will not be long. Cum juberetur ad aliam Religionem transire, aut exire foras, hoc malo, inquit, quam illud. Si non licebit vivere in urbe, licebit in agris aut in silvis. Aliquid semper Deus suppeditabit radicis aut herbæ, quod spiritum hunc alat, non diu moraturum (50). Do these things betray a man guilty of atheism or indifferency for religion? do they not rather shew, that Gruterus had a true zeal, preferable to all the clamours and bitterness of violent controversies, who damn all other communions?

GRYNÆUS (SIMON) a countryman's son of Suabia, was born at Veringen in the county of Hohenzollern, in the year 1493. He studied at Pfortsheim at the same time with Melanchthon, and this gave birth to a friendship of long continuance between them. He continued his studies at Vienna in Austria, and received there the degree of master in philosophy, and the professorship of the Greek tongue. Having embraced the Protestant religion, he found himself exposed to many dangers, and especially in Baden, where he was for some years rector of the school. He was imprisoned at the instigation of the monks; but, by the recommendation of the nobility of Hungary, he was set at liberty, and retired to Wittenberg, where he saw Luther and Melanchthon, and had a conference with them. Upon his return to his own country, he was sent for to Heidelberg, to be professor of Greek, in the year 1523. He discharged this employ till 1529, when he was invited to Basil, to teach there publicly. There he explained several authors, and even the epistle to the Romans. He was employed with several others, in the year 1534, to reform the church and school of Tübingen. He returned to Basil in 1536, and was associated, in 1540, with Melanchthon, Capito, Bucer, Calvin, &c. for the conferences of Worms. He died of the plague at Basil, the first of August 1541 (a). He had taken a journey into England, in 1531, and had received, from the lord chancellor Sir Thomas More, to whom Erasmus had recommended him, all imaginable civilities [A]. He was a learned and industrious man, and did great service to the Republic of Letters [B]. See his Elogium in Verheiden's collection (b), and in Joachim Camerarius's preface to Theophrastus. His son SAMUEL GRYNÆUS, born at Basil in the year 1539, obtained there the professorship of rhetoric at the age of twenty five years, and afterwards that of civil-law. He died the third of April 1599 (c).

[A] He received from the lord chancellor, Sir Thomas More . . . all imaginable civilities. This particular is not found in Melchior Adam; for which reason I am the more careful in relating it. I have taken it from the epistle dedicatory to the works of Plato, printed in Greek at Basil, apud Joannem Valerium, 1534, in folio. It is there that Grynæus, to testify his gratitude, thus addresses himself to John More, son of the chancellor

(1) Simon Grynæus, Epistola ad Jo. Morem, Operibus Platonis præfata.

(1): 'Annus est (ut nostri) tertius jam, cum in Angliam . . . veniens, ac Erasmi nostri commendatione velut venio secundo ad illas musis totas sacras aedes vestras delatus, humanitate mira acciperer, majori tractatus, maxima dimitterer. Non solum enim amantissimus vir pater tuus, ac tum quidem condicione, per cetera vero rebus omnibus egregiis, facile toto regno princeps, privatum hominem ignotumque me, literarum tanto ergo, ad colloquium inter tot publica privatque negotia admisit: mensæ suæ sceptræ regni gerens, adposuit: in aulam abiens rediens secum traxit: laterique adjunxit suo: sed omnem meam de religione sententiam locis non paucis diversam ab ipsius esse haud difficulter præstentis placide benigneque cognovit: ac cum ab illa non parum tum discreparet opera consilioque sic juvit nos tamen, ut omne mihi negotium sumptibus etiam suis confecerit. Nam & itineri comitem Harrisium doctum juvenem addidit, & Oxoniensis Gymnasii Proceribus sic literis insinnavit, ut ad earum conspectum omnes nobis collegiorum omnium non solum bibliothecæ, sed studiorum etiam animi velut mercuriali quadam virgula tacti patecerent. — It is now three years (as you know) since, coming into England, and being recommended by my friend Erasmus to your house, the seat of the muses, I was received with wonderful humanity, entertained with greater, and dismissed with the greatest. For that great man your father, distinguished both by his rank and noble actions, not only admitted me, a private and obscure person, to converse with him (so great was his love of learning) amidst the hurry of both public and private affairs, not only set me at his table, tho' the first man in the kingdom, carried me with him to and from court, and made me his constant companion; but, with great affability and good nature, informed himself wherein my religious principles differed from his, and even defrayed all my expenses himself. He sent me likewise to Oxford, accompanied by Mr Harris, a learned young gentleman, and recommended me so strongly to the heads of that university by letters, that, at the sight of them, I had access to all the public libraries, and met with the most friendly treatment from the students. They communicated to him at Oxford some manuscripts of Proclus, and he was permitted to take them away: Sir Thomas More added another favour; he made him a present of them (2). The passage of Erasmus, which I am going to cite, makes mention of this journey of Grynæus.

[B] He was a learned man . . . and did great service to the republic of letters. See here the good opinion Erasmus had of him, which he thus testified in 1531: 'Simon Grynæus . . . est homo Latine & Græcæque ad unguem doctus, in Philosophia & Mathematicis disciplinis diligenter versatus; nullo supercilio, pudore penè immodico. Pertraxit hominem isthuc Britannia visendæ cupiditas, sed præcipue bibliothecarum vestrarum amor (3). — Simon Grynæus . . . is a compleat master of Latin and Greek, Epist. xxxix, lib. xxvi, pag. mæ. a good philosopher and mathematician, of no pride, and modest to excess. The desire of seeing England brought him thither; but the chief inducement was, the libraries you have there.' We are obliged to him for editions of several books of the ancients. He was the first, who published the Almagest of Ptolemy in Greek (4): he added to it a preface concerning the use which is to be made of that author's doctrine. He likewise published Euclid in Greek with a preface (5), and the works of Plato, with some commentaries of Proclus (6). He retouched in some places the Latin version of Plato made by Marsilius Ficinus. See the edition of Plato, 1539, at Basil, for Frobenius. Whoever would see a particular account of his translations, prefaces, and other writings, need only consult the abridgment of Gellner's Bibliothecæ, at num. 1534, pages 755 and 756 of the edition of Zurich, 1583.

The Oxford catalogue ascribes to him some works, which cannot be his: de Cometa qui fuit annis 1577-78; de inusitata magnitudine & figura Veneris annis 1578-79. We have seen that he died in 1541. I make no question but the treatise, de ignitis Meteoris & de Cometarum causis ac significationibus, which the same catalogue ascribes to him, is, as well as the other two, the production of SIMON GRYNÆUS, physician and mathematician at Heidelberg, and son of THOMAS GRYNÆUS, nephew of him we are speaking of. The other works, which the Oxford catalogue attributes to Simon Grynæus, really belong to the Grynæus of this article.

256 GRYNÆUS. GRYPHIANDER. GRYPHIUS.

GRYNÆUS (THOMAS) nephew of the preceding, was born at Veringen in Suabia, about the year 1512. He studied under his uncle at Heidelberg and Basil; and he taught the Latin and Greek languages in the city of Berne during eleven years; after which the love of ease, and a dislike for disputes, induced him to retire from this employ, because they drew him into the controversies, which divided the ministers. He returned to Basil, where he became one of the professors, in 1547. He read public lectures, and preached sometimes in the villages. The marquis of Baden, having introduced the reformation in his dominions, made him minister of Rotelen (a). He acquitted himself honourably in this employ, during eight years, to his death, that is to the second of August, 1564. He left four sons, famous for their learning, THEOPHILUS, SIMON (b), JOHN-JAMES, and TOBIAS (c).

GRYPHIANDER (JOHN), born in the county of Oldenburg, was professor of poetry and history in the university of Iëna, after Elias Reufnerus, who died in the year 1612. He was admitted doctor of the civil-law in the same university in the year 1614, and, four years after, returned into his country, to take possession of an office of judicature. He died in December, 1652 (a). There are some books of his writing [A].

(a) Taken from
trum, pag.

[A] There are some books of his writing. A treatise of islands. The whole title runs thus: Joannes Gryphianderi Icti de INSULIS Tractatus ex Ictis, Politicis, Historicis, & Philologis collectus, ut omnibus hise usui esse possit, in quo plurimæ cognatæ quæstiones de mari, fluminibus, lacubus, littoribus, portubus, aquæ dulcis, aggeribus, navigationibus, alluvionis, atque in-erementis &c. excutuntur. It was printed at Frankfurt in 4to, in the year 1624. Nothing can be more instructive than a particular treatise upon a certain question, when a learned man sets about it, and undertakes to exhaust his subject. There are a vast number of quotations in that book of Gryphiander. He wrote one about the Phoenix in 1618. He published another in 1625, which is very curious, in which he treats of a certain right of some towns in Saxony, viz. that of erecting Roland's statues of a gigantic size. That book is intitled, Commentarius de Weichbildis Saxonici, sive Colossis Rulandinis urbium quarundam Saxoniarum. König ascribes to Gryphiander a tract, de Oeconomia legali: Freherus says nothing of it.

GRYPHIUS (SEBASTIAN), a famous printer of Lyons in the XVIth century, was a German. He performed the duties of his profession with so much honour, that some learned men bestowed public praises on him upon that account. And among others Julius Cæsar Scaliger, and Conrad Gesner. The latter dedicated to him one of his books [A]. Some will have it, that the other dedicated to him his work De causis Linguae Latine; but it is a mistake [B]. One of his best editions is a Latin bible, which he published in two volumes in folio, in the year 1550. He made use of the largest letter that had been seen till then (a). It is inferior to none, but the bible printed at the Louvre in the year 1642, in nine volumes in folio (b). His many editions are esteemed by all those, who know wherein the art and perfection of printing doth consist. He dealt very fairly

[A] Gesner dedicated to him one of his books. Viz. The twelfth of his Pandects. He bestows the following encomium upon him: 'Tu inter primos, humanissime Gryphi, minime prætereundus in mentem mihi venisti πολλῶν ἀντάξιος ἁλλῶν, cui non potestremus inter eximios ætatis nostræ chalcographos locus deberetur: idque eo magis, quoniam non solum inter externos in Gallia innumeris optimis libris optima fide summaque diligentia elegantiaque procusis, maximam tibi gloriam peperisti: sed nostras etiam-nam esse videris, qui Germanus in Galliam veneris' (1). — Nor can I forget you, most humane Gryphius; you, who deserve not the last rank among the printers of our age; for this reason in particular, because you have not only acquired the greatest reputation, of any foreigner in France, by the many beautiful and correct editions you have published of the best books; but seem to be one of our own countrymen, since, though a German, you came into France. Next to his epistle dedicatory, there is a catalogue of the books printed by Gryphius.

(1) Gesner, in

[B] But it is a mistake. 'It is not true, that Julius Scaliger dedicated his book, De causis Linguae Latine, to Sebastian Gryphius, a printer at Lyons. He only wrote a letter to him on occasion of that book, which he was to print, wherein he tells him: 'Tuam vero, mi Gryphi, veram pietatem, excellentem eruditionem, insignem humanitatem, his nostris lucubratiunculis & præesse volui, & moderari: si id tibi ita collibuisse: ut Posterius intelligerent, ejus frugis proventum, si qua ad eorum commoda per nos exulta esset, a nobis tantum commendari, quantum ex diligentia tua, atque auctoritate gratæ consequi potuisset. — I was willing, my Gryphius, that a man of such true piety, excellent learning, and remarkable humanity, should have the care and direction of my works, if you think fit to undertake it; that posterity make know, that I transmit the fruits of my labours to them, if my abilities can be of any service, recommended by your diligence and authority.' Can this be called a dedication? Julius Scaliger likewise wrote a letter to the printer Vascolan, to recommend to him the edition of his book De Subtilitate. Not to say, that Julius Scaliger was too proud to dedicate his book to a printer, how could he dedicate his book, De causis Linguae Latine, to Gryphius, since he had inscribed it to his eldest son Silvius Cæsar Scaliger, to whom he also inscribed his Ars Poetica? Julius Scaliger wrote to Sebastian Gryphius, in the same manner as Quintilian wrote to Trypho, a bookseller, to recommend to him his Institutiones Oratoriae, which he had dedicated to Marcellus; and in the same manner as Scævola Sammarthanus inscribed some Hendecasyllabic verses to Mamert Patiflon, to recommend to him the edition of his works (2). This is what Menage observes in a book printed in 1688. If the curious Mr Chevillier had known it, he would not have said, that Julius Cæsar Scaliger dedicated to Gryphius (3) 'his treatise De causis Linguae Latine, printed in 1540, in 4to, wherein he passes this compliment upon him: that if his works have been kindly received by the learned, it is no less owing to the beauty and charms of the impression, than to their own merit. Cum plerique librorum meorum . . . tuis opibus atque apparatus ea gratia esset (4) sint, ut non minus tuum ob beneficium quam propter suam meritum eos doctissimus quisque exceperit & probavit.' It was an easy thing to commit the fault censured by Menage; for Scaliger's letter to Gryphius is prefixed to that book. You will find the same fault in the supplement to Moreri's dictionary.

fairly in his errata [C], and had excellent correctors [D]. He also printed Hebrew perfectly well (c) [E]. I must not forget, that he was a learned man [F]. He died the seventh of September (d). ANTONY GRYPHIUS, his son, worthily followed his steps in the same town. Both of them have been praised by Du Verdier Vau-Privas [G]. There was, at Venice, in 1557, a printer, called JOHN GRYPHIUS.

(9) In his Apology for changing the name of Antinous Maria Comes, into that of Marcus Antonius Majorianus, apud Menagium, ibid.

[C] He dealt very fairly in his errata. 'To shew that his bible was correct, and at the same time to give an instance of his fairness, he did a remarkable thing. It was an usual thing to place the errata in the less visible part of the book; but Gryphius put it in the most obvious place. The first page contains the title of the book, the printer's mark, and the year of the impression; the second contains the errata; and the third the epistle dedicatory (5).

[D] He had excellent correctors. Here is an instance of their exactness. The Errata of Stephen Doleus's Commentarii de Lingua Latina contains only eight errors, tho' that work is made up of two volumes in folio. Since the errors of the prefs were so few, Gryphius was in the right to affirm, that the proofs had been very carefully corrected (6). One of his correctors was a physician of Cologne, called Adam Knouf (7).

[E] He printed Hebrew perfectly. Mr Chevallier adds: 'there is, in the library of the Sorbonne, Bagin's Thesaurus Linguae Sanctae, which is a very fine edition in folio, printed in the year 1529 (8).

[F] I must not forget, that he was a learned man. Majorianus calls him, Vir insignis ac litteratus (9), and John Vulteius says, in one of his epigrams (10), and John Vulteius says, in one of his epigrams of the first book, that Robert Stephens corrected books very well, that Colineus printed them very well, but that Gryphius knew very well both how to print and correct them.

See the letter which Sadolet wrote to him (11).

[G] Sebastian and Antony Gryphius have been praised by Du Verdier Vau-Privas. Sebastian Gryphius says he (12), a native of Reutlingen in Suabia, near Augsburg, restored the Art of Printing at Lyons, which had been corrupted, and adorned it with new and very fine Hebrew, Greek, and Latin characters, being very well versed in those three languages. . . . The poets of his time called him the excellent Trypho of our age mentioned by Martial. Learned men resorted to him. He was diligent and curious in searching every where for the good books, that were almost lost, to procure such a rare treasure to posterity. Antony Gryphius, his son, has still many of them that remain to be printed; and, as his father spared nothing to recover and publish them, he freely bestows his money and his pains to make them public. He died in the year 1556, at sixty three years of age.

GUADAGNOLO (PHILIP), reader of Arabic and Chaldee at Rome, in the college Della Sapienza, in the XVIIth century, was one of the first that was made use of to translate the scripture into Arabic, when the congregation De propaganda fide resolved to comply with the desires of some Eastern prelates, who presented a petition to Pope Urban VIII upon that subject, about the year 1624. The archbishop of Damascus, and Father Guadagnolo, were put upon that translation; but, some time after, only the latter undertook that task. He was very much eased under the pontificate of Innocent X; having nothing to do but to correct that version. He died at Rome the twenty seventh of March, 1656 (a). A book, published by him against a Mahometan, is very much esteemed [A].

(a) Taken from the Giornale de Letterati of the 20th of January, 1671, where mention is made of that translation of the bible, which came out at Rome, in 1671, in three volumes in folio.

[A] A book published by him against a Mahometan is very much esteemed. It is an apology for the Christian religion against the objections of Ahmed Ben Zin Alabedin. He published it at Rome in Latin in the year 1631, and then in Arabic in the year 1637.

Theodorus Hackspan (1) declares, that he never saw a better book against Mahometism. Note, that Father Guadagnolo published Linguae Arabicae Institutiones, in folio, in the year 1642.

GUAGNIN (ALEXANDER) a native of Verona, naturalized in Poland, made himself illustrious by his sword and pen. He had considerable offices in the Polish armies; and after he had given several proofs of his valour, both in the wars of Livonia and Moldavia, and in those of Muscovy, he was not only honoured with the Indigenate (a), under the reign of Sigismund Augustus, but also made governour of the fortrefs of Witebsk. He continued in that post for the space of fourteen years. At last, he applied himself to study, and wrote a history of Poland [A]. He died at Cracow in 1614, aged seventy six years. He never was married. His titles were, Comes Palatii Lateranensis, & Eques Auratus (b).

(b) Taken from Starovolcius, pag. 101, 102. Εκατοντάτος Σcriptorum Πολωνικorum.

[A] He wrote a history of Poland. The title of it, according to the Francfort edition 1584, in 8vo, for John Wechel, runs thus: *Rerum Polonicarum tomus tres: quorum primus omnium Poloniae Regum, à Lecho primo gentis Duce, ad Stephanum Batboreum, etiamnum Regem: tum Principum Lituanie, chronologicam recensioem, ac singulorum res gestas complectitur: adjecta recens Historiarum in nostram aetatem incidentium continua narratio. nino, equite aurato peditumque praefecto auctore. Sigismund Feyerabenus, a bookseller, who was at the charges of the impression, dedicated the work to Marc Fugger, lord of Kirchberg and Weissenhorn; and mentioned to him the great services Antony Fugger, his father, and John-James and George Fugger, his uncles, had done to the imperial city of Augsburg, when Charles V was ready to punish the inhabitants for an insurrection. Starovolcius observes, that Guagnin composed that chronicle of Poland in the year 1578, Puro & nitido sermone Latino, and got it translated into the Polish language, by Martin Pascowski, in the year 1611 (1).

GUALDRADA,

(a) He reigned about the beginning of the XIIIth century.

GUALDRADA, a Florentine lady, illustrious for her chastity, of which she gave for a seasonable a proof before the emperor Otho IV (a), that she had immediately, for a reward, the satisfaction of being married very advantageously [A], as will be seen below. Dante makes mention of her in a very glorious manner; for, speaking of a famous warrior [B], he calls him, Nepote della Gualdrada.

[A] She had immediately, for a reward, the satisfaction of being married advantageously. To comment upon this, I shall make use of the old French commentator upon Dante. 'That lady, says he (1), was in her younger years a very handsome and genteel maid, the daughter of Belnicio Barti des Ravignans, an ancient family of Florence, and a branch of that of the Ademares. It happened one day, that the emperor Otho IV, being at Florence, in an assembly of ladies, on account of the festival of St John the Baptist, was wonderfully moved with the beauty of that maid; and asking whose daughter she was, Bellincio, her father, being near the emperor, answered before the company, that she was the daughter of a man, who would get him to kiss her. The maid, hearing this, got up merrily, and told him, out of a principle of virtue, pray, father, do not be so liberal of a thing, wherein I am so nearly concerned: for you will give me leave to tell you, that no man shall ever kiss me, unless he be my lawful husband. The emperor was surprised at such a virtuous and prudent answer, and immediately sent for one of his barons, called Guido, and ordered him to marry her upon the spot. He gave her for her portion the Cassentin, and part of Romagna, and conferred the title of count upon her husband, from whom the counts Guido's are descended. The said Guido and Gualdrada had two sons, viz. William and Ruggier.'

[B] Dante . . . speaking of a famous warrior . . . calls him nepote della Gualdrada. It is in the sixteenth canto of his Inferno, wherein we find these words:

Questo, l'orme di cui pestar mi vedi,
Tutto che nudo, e dipelato vada
Fu di grado maggior, che tu non credi:

GUARINUS, a native of Verona, and scholar of Emanuel Chrysoloras, was one of the first, who revived the Belles Lettres in Italy, in the XVth century [A]. * Janus Pannonius in ejus Paneg.

[A] He was one of the first, who revived the Belles Lettres in Italy, in the XVth century. Leander Albertus (1) bestows this encomium upon him; and the following passage of Jovius confirms the same thing: 'Ab hoc insigni viro, Græcæ Latineque literæ obscuris illis temporibus antiqui seculi normam, quadratæque structuræ ordinem & diu quæsitum decus receperunt (2). — From this famous man, the Greek and Latin languages, in those obscure times, received the long sought for ornaments of antiquity.' Poggius acknowledges, that the Italians were very much indebted to Guarinus: 'Vir doctissimus, says he (3), speaking of him, atque humanissimus, cujus studia & præstant doctrina plurimum Italiam profuerunt. — A most learned and humane man, whose studies and excellent erudition were of great service to the Italians.' Laurentius Valla (4) calls Guarinus and Leonard Aretin, the most learned men of their age. Philophus (5) calls Guarinus a most eloquent man. Gabriel Naudé affords me a very good addition. He says (6), that Boccace, endeavouring to revive good literature, did so well succeed in it, that, when he came to die in 1375, he had for his successor in that design, one John of Ravenna, who was the first that re-established the schools of Venice, out of which came Gasparinus, who did the same at Milan, and Guarinus Veronensis.

Guidoguerra hebbe nome: e in sua vita
Fece col senno assai, e con la spada.

This shade, whom you see me treat so contemptibly, tho' he wanders naked and stript, was of greater rank than you think: he was grand-son of the fair Gualdrada; his name was Guidoguerra, famed, in his lifetime, for his prudence and his valour.

The French commentator upon Dante (2) tells us also, that Ruggier Guidoguerra, nephew to the fair Gualdrada, was a valiant knight, and a man of great prudence; so that in the battle of Benevento, between Charles I, and Manfred, he was accounted the chief cause of the victory obtained by the said Charles, because he happened to be colonel of four hundred Florentine knights, who had been banished for being Guelfes, and some time after returned to Florence, from which they expelled the Ghibelins by Charles's assistance. I must observe, that Grangier contradicts himself, when he explains that degree of kindred in the following page. 'The said Guido and Gualdrada had two sons, William and Ruggier, and the latter had Guidoguerra, who is therefore Gualdrada's nephew (3).' How can a man be so grossly mistaken? is it not plain, that the son of Gualdrada's son is the grand-son, and not the nephew of that lady? I think the word nepote in Dante ought to be taken in the same sense as nepos in the good Latin authors: Father Paul (4), and cardinal Pallavicini (5), use it to denote the grand-sons of Paul III. One may therefore say, that nepote or nipote signifies sometimes a grand-son in Italian: Francesco Alunno should have taken notice of it in his dictionary of the words used by Dante, Petrarch, Boccace, &c. (6).

'For it was he, properly speaking, who began to revive eloquence and philosophy, as well by the journeys he made to Constantinople, where he learned the Greek tongue, as by his precepts of rhetoric, translations, and other books; but much more by his great number of scholars, who went from Ferrara, where he taught, all over Italy, to run down the fooleries of former times, and make the youth sensible of

What he says afterwards is also very remarkable (7). 'Whoever had been at Constantinople to learn the Greek tongue, came home as it were in a triumphant manner, and was accounted a kind of prodigy, as it appears from what Johannes Ungheretius, or Pannonius bishop of the five churches, says of Guarinus's return into Europe.'

late Strabo (b) [B]. It was a good translation for that time; and the same may be said of his other versions; for he translated some lives, and some tracts of Plutarch. He died at Ferrara the fourteenth of December 1460 (c). All his writings are not translations [C].

[B] Pope Nicholas V ordered him to translate Strabo. Others say, that Guarinus set about it thro' emulation: he was unwilling to be inferior to Gregory Tiphernas, who had translated Strabo's Asia; and therefore he translated the description of Europe wrote by the same geographer (8).

GUARINUS (BAPTIST), son of the foregoing, trod in his father's steps, and made himself very famous for his skill in the learned languages. He taught them for a long time at Ferrara with great reputation, and published some books answerable to the glory he had acquired [A].

He was still living in the year 1494, and he had been then thirty three years professor of the Belles Lettres, having succeeded his father in his professorship (a). The passage, wherein Gesner informs us of this particular, was not well understood by Henry Stephens [B].

A treatise De Sella Epicuri, another De Ordine docendi (1), another De Regno administrando, notes upon Ovid's Fastis, upon Catullus, several orations, letters, verses, and a translation of some orations of Demosthenes and St Gregory Nazianzen, &c. (2).

[B] Was not well understood by Henry Stephens. Let us compare his words with those of Gesner. 'Mini me in Bibliothecographia Gesneri legere, Guarinum patrem (nam fuit & Baptista Guarinus ejus filius, quem Gesnerus, etiamnum se de illo scribente, claruisse Ferrariae ait, ubi patris successor jam per annos tres & triginta linguam utramque florentissime doceret) scripsisse canonisimata in lingua Græca (3). I remember to have read in Gesner's Bibliotheca, that Guarinus the father (for there was also Baptist Guarinus, his son, of whom Gesner, at the time he wrote of him, tells us that he flourished at Ferrara, where, being his father's successor, he had already taught both languages, for thirty three years, with great success) had written rules for the Greek tongue.' They are Henry Stephens's words. The passage in Gesner runs thus: 'Claret usque hodie Ferrariae, ubi patri succedens, jam per annos tres & triginta utramque linguam florentissime docet & varia conscribit (4).'

(4) Gesner, ubi

— He is famous to this day at Ferrara, where, succeeding his father, he has already taught both languages, for thirty three years with great success, and writes on various subjects. Can you find two passages that agree better than these two, you will say: I will answer, yes; for the words used by Gesner are Trithemius's. It is not Gesner, who says claret usque hodie, as Henry Stephens will have it, wherein he is grossly mistaken. He should have referred the word hodie to the year 1494, which Gesner placed in the margin of his book at that place. It is not true, that our Guarinus was alive in the year 1545, in which Gesner's Bibliotheca was printed.

GUARINI (BAPTIST), was born at Ferrara, in the year 1538. He is more known by his tragi-comedy, called Pastor Fido, than by all his other works, and by the honourable employments [A] bestowed upon him by the duke, his master. That piece was his favourite work; and he made it appear by his great passion against a critic [B], who had only reflected upon it indirectly. He has expressed the mysteries of love so much to the life, in that piece, that it is thought the reading of it has been very prejudicial to the chastity of many persons among the fair sex. This seems to confute a maxim of Mr de la Fontaine [C]. I cannot tell whether Guarini would have alledged such [A] By the honourable employments. See Moreri's dictionary, to which you may add, that Guarini, being sent to Venice by Alfonso II, duke of Ferrara, made an Italian speech before the senate, which was admired; and that, after the death of Alfonso, he was sent by the city of Ferrara to Paul V, to congratulate him upon his accession to the pontificate (1).

thraeus, Pinac. 1,

[B] His great passion against a critic. Jason Denores (2), a native of the isle of Cyprus, and originally descended from a gentleman of Normandy, and professor of morality at Ferrara, wrote a treatise concerning poetry, wherein he reflected upon a kind of dramatic poetry, that was very much in vogue, I mean tragi-comic pastorals (3). He called them monsters, produced by men wholly unacquainted with antiquity, and contrary to the rules of ancient poetry. Guarini, being persuaded that this criticism was levelled at him, wrote an apology against Denores. The latter replied, and died whilst Guarini was writing so sharp a rejoinder, that it is thought it might have occasioned the death of that critic. Thuanus speaks of it in the following manner: 'Baptista Guarinus lectissimus eques Ferrariensis, qui sub id Pastorem fidum magno plausu ubique in Italia exceptum ediderat, eum sermonem ad injuriam suam pertinere existimans, defensionem sub nomine Verati publicavit, quam apologia contraria statim Denores refutavit. Sed dum alteram defensionem meditatur Guarinus, morte minime fatali Denores concessit, quæ nisi dilectissimi filii calamitate fuisset præcipitata alterius Verati lectione accelerari potuisse credita est. simul & asperitate ac verborum amaritudine in Jasonem invecus est Guarinus, ut Archilochum ipsum in Lycamben iambos stringentem eo scripto superasse passim jactaretur (4). — Baptist Guarini, a knight of Ferrara, who about that time had published his Pastor Fido, a work received with great applause all over Italy, thinking those words reflected upon him, published a defence under the name of Veratus, which Denores presently refuted by a contrary apology. But whilst Guarini was preparing another defence, Denores died, not unluckily, since his death, if it had not been hastened by the calamity of his dearest son, might, it is thought, have been brought on sooner by a second reading of Veratus. For Guarini inveighed against Denores with so much eloquence, and at the same time in such sharp and bitter terms, that it was generally said he had outdone Archilochus himself, who wrote iambics against Lycambes.

(4) Ibid.

[C] This seems to confute a maxim of Mr de la Fontaine. Nicus Erythraeus having said, that the Pastor Fido is reprinted almost every year, and that all nations, tho' never so barbarous, have it translated into their language, adds, that perhaps that book is prejudicial to chastity (5), and he gives this reason for it: 'Etenim in ejus dulcedine suavitæque tanquam in infesto Sirenis mari in quo etiam Ulysses erravit, virgines nuptæque complures pudicitiae naufragium fecisse dicuntur. — For many virgins and married women are said to have made shipwreck of their modesty by its allurements, as in a sea infested by Sirens, in which even Ulysses went astray.' Let us see Mr de la Fontaine's maxim (6).

such a maxim in his vindication; perhaps he would have had recourse to a more common thought [D]. I do not think there is any part of his work so remarkable as that scene, which has been so well translated into French by the countess de la Suze; wherein

Trois il après tout s'allarmer sans raison
Pour un peu de plaisanterie ?
Je craindrois bien plutôt que la cajolerie
Ne mît le feu dans la Maison.
Chassez les Soupçons, Belles, prenez mon livre,

Is there any reason, after all, to be alarmed at a little pleasantry? I should sooner fear, that a lover's courtship would set fire to the house. Banish your suitors, ye fair, and read my book: I will answer for you, body for body.

Thus that author extricates himself out of a great difficulty. It was complained that his tales raised a thousand leud desires in the minds of his readers: his answer is, that if the women, who read his book, will not suffer any gallant to come near them, they will not lose their honour. This is a sophistical answer; for it requires a condition, the practice whereof is made very difficult by the very book complained of. You will have us read your book, and banish our lovers; you are unjust in requiring such a thing from us, since your poems deprive us of the power of banishing our lovers. They fill us with love, they inflame us, they raise in us a violent desire to see those gentlemen: how then can you say, with any shew of reason, that if we banish them, we shall be safe. Another difficulty may be objected to Mr de la Fontaine, viz. that, tho' a woman should banish her lovers, she would be exposed to many leud passions, excited by the reading of his tales; which is no small mischief. In order to make a good apology for that author, it should be supposed, that his book cannot be prejudicial to chastity, and that nothing but the sight of the beloved objects, and actual courtship can be contrary to that virtue. But such a thing cannot be supposed, if it be true, as it is said, that the reading of Pastor Fido has undone many women and maids. This is a sufficient commentary upon my text.

Tho' what we are told of the ill effects of that poem should be false, yet it would be true, that the reading of certain books is very pernicious to young people of both sexes. Some physicians have prescribed the reading of the Priapeia to those, who are not well disposed for love-sports (7); and I have observed, that the emperor Ælius Verus, a very leud prince, had always the amorous poems of Ovid in his bed, and that he set a great value upon Martial: Idem Ovidii libros amorum in lecto semper habuisse: idem Martialem Epigrammaticum Poëtam Virgilium suum dixisse (8). I remember to have read in Tassoni, that study raises leud thoughts, among other reasons, because it discovers a thousand obscenities that are in books: he alleges that as a reason, why many learned women, mentioned by the ancients, were very leud. These are his words (9). 'Che similmente le lettere sieno cagioni d'eccitar la libidine, e di parturire molti atti osceni, non è ne da dubitare; poichè col leggere accidenti, e stratagemmi amorosi, e libri lascivi, e particolarmente nelle solitudini, e ne gli ozi, che richiegono le lettere, s'appresentano fantasmi osceni, e pensieri, e voglie di cose illecite sotto apparenza di gusto e di diletto; e l'ingegno facage vi s'abbandona sopra. E quindi è (cred'io) che in Euripide, e Giuvendale (10) leggiamo notate d'impudizia le donne di lettere antiche, le quali leggendo libri di cose lascive, e conversando sotto quel pretesto di lettere più liberamente con gli huomini, che si conveniva alla debolezza del sesso, si fecero ardite, e la libidine loro s'infervorò nell'ozio e la sagacità dell'ingegno s'offerse di ricoprire gli eccessi. — That this book likewise may be the occasion of exciting lust, and of producing many obscene actions, cannot be doubted; because, together with the reading of adventures, stratagems of love, and wanton books, and especially in solitude and at leisure, obscene images present themselves, thoughts, and desires after unlawful things, under the appearance of pleasure and delight; and the sagacious mind gives itself up thereupon. And thence it is, I believe, that in Euripides, and Juvenal, we read of learned women among the

'books on wanton subjects, and conversing, under this pretence of learning, with men, more freely, than suits the weakness of their sex, have grown bold, and their lust has been inflamed in idleness, and all the sagacity of their wit employed in excusing their excesses.'

[D] Perhaps he would have had recourse to a more common thought. He might have said, that his readers learned nothing by his Pastoral but what they knew before; or if young people found something in it that was unknown to them, they would have learned it elsewhere; so that the suppression of Pastor Fido had been of no advantage to the public. A friend to Mr de la Fontaine has nicely touched this sort justification.

Those, says he (11), who are entrusted with the education of youth, ought to prevent not only their reading (12) of them, but also their learning a great deal more than there is in them, by frequenting bad company. Men do not always learn from books what they should be ignorant of. This author plainly intimates, that, as the world goes, those, who should not learn from la Fontaine's book what it is fit they should be ignorant of, would learn it several other ways. The same kind of thought has been made use of (13), in answer to the unjust complaints of those, who do not approve, that the obscenities of Juvenal and Martial should be left out. This apology is more tolerable than la Fontaine's Maxim, and yet it is not a good one; for, tho' disorders be ever so unavoidable, even when we do not contribute to them, every body ought to be more willing that they should proceed from others than from himself. It is to be observed, that what I say concerns those, who invent obscene stories, or translate them with new flourishes of their own, and not those, who quote a passage of Martial &c. to prove a fact, which the nature of their work, or their character of historian, commentator, &c. requires they should mention. Upon the whole, it must be granted, that all the leud things, that may be read in some books, may be learned, without books, by conversation. It is almost incredible how many things of this nature are known to people, who are still in their younger years, and never learned to read. The progress of this science is surprising, and does not require many years. Let us see what Montaigne says about it (14).

'When women are free in their discourse, we are but children, if compared to them in that respect. When they talk of our courtships and conversations, they plainly discover that we tell them nothing but what they knew before. Shall we say, that they were formerly disorderly boys, as Plato will have it? I happened one day to be in a place, where I could hear what they said among themselves, without being seen. It is pity I cannot tell it. Faith, said I to my self, we need not learn phrases from Amadis, and study Boccaccio and Arétin, in order to fit our selves for their conversation: it is all time lost. They know every thing better than those, who read books for that purpose. It is a science that grows in their veins, Et mentem Venus ipsa dedit; nature, youth, and health, three excellent masters, do continually infuse it into their minds: they need not learn it; they produce it.

Quantum præcipue multivola est mulier *.

Not with more ardour bills the milkwhite dove,

Than woman, raging in excess of love.

Women learn those things one from another; the old instruct the young; and, if the ignorant are greedy of knowledge, the learned are no less desirous of imparting it to them. One would think they look upon this axiom as a canonical one, viz. That knowledge is insignificant, unless others know that we have it (15). And therefore the Italian education, the great care that is taken in Italy to keep girls from the company of boys, does not remove the evil. Besides, women, in the countries, where they are kept under restraint, have the liberty to be at a wedding promiscuously wherein he touches upon one of the most incomprehensible mysteries of nature [E]. The number (a) of the editions and translations of Paſtor Fido is incredible (b). Guarini died at Venice in an inn, in the year 1613 [F]. His funeral pomp, by the academy of humorists, shews, that he was in great esteem (c).

He was great-grandson of Guarini of Verona, and taught moral philosophy in the university of Ferrara. Notwithstanding the great reputation he had acquired by the above-mentioned poem, he could not endure the name and title of a poet; for he thought that such a title does no honour to those who have it, and exposes them to contempt. One would think by reading his verses, that he made them with the greatest facility; but it is mistake; they cost him a great deal of pains [G], and many alterations and rasures. He was not fond of getting riches; and, because he was a little fond of pomp, he found himself in no good circumstances, when fortune forsook him, having taken but little care to husband the gratifications of Alphonso II, his master. That prince ceased miscuously with men. Now can there be a more scandalous school of lewdness, than the assemblies, sports, and entertainments of weddings? how many foolish and obscene things are spoken upon such an occasion (16)? St. Cyprian was in the right, not to approve, that virgins should go to a wedding; he tells them, that they will come home with a maimed virginity (17). 'Quædam non pudet nubentibus interesse, & in illa lascivientium libertate sermonum colloquia incesta miscere; audire quod non licet dicere: observare & esse præsentem inter verba turpia & temulentia convivia, quibus Libidinum fomes accenditur, Sponsa ad patientiam stupri, ad audaciam sponsus animatur. Quid illic discitur? quid videtur? Quantum à proposito suo virgo deficit, quando, pudica quæ venerat, impudica discedit? Corpore licet virgo ac mente permaneat; oculis, auribus, lingua, minuit illa quæ habebat (18). — Some are not ashamed to be present at a marriage, and to mix in the wanton conversation usual at such times; to hear what I dare not repeat; to observe, and be present at the filthy discourse, and drunken revelling, which excite the fire of lust, which animate the bride to endure being deflowered, and encourage the bridegroom to the attack. What is learnt there? what is seen? how does a virgin fail in her purpose, when she, who came modest, departs immodest? for she continues a virgin in body, yet her eyes, ears, and tongue, rob her partly of what she brought with her.' See what will be said in the remark [G] of the article LYCURGUS, and remember, Xenophon's maxim. He was of opinion, that a bride should come to her husband's house, before she has seen and heard many things. 'Ο Ξενοφών οἷσται δὲ τὴν ἐλάττωσιν τὴν νύμφην ἰδῆσαν, ἐλάττωσιν δὲ ἀνέσσαν εἰς ἀνδρὸς βαλῆσθαι. Xenophon censet sponsam ita debere in mariti domum venire ut quam minimum viderit, quam minimum audierit (19).

[E] He touches upon . . . one of the most incomprehensible mysteries of nature.] He introduces a young woman, who, being at the discretion of two tyrants, who hate one another (20), envies the happiness of beasts, whose love is directed by no other rule than love itself. She is amazed at the opposition that is between nature and the law. One of them annexes a great pleasure to certain things, and the other will have them to be severely punished. Her conclusion is this: this cannot be accounted for without the revelation of Moses; and I have often wondered that the ancient philosophers have so little reflected upon it. I mean only such philosophers, who acknowledged the unity of GOD; for those, who admitted of many gods could find no difficulty in it: it was but supposing, that a deity was the cause of the inclination of nature; and that some other deities imprinted the instincts of conscience and the notions of honour. The difficulty concerned only those, who believed, that the world is the work of one most holy Being. How is it possible that under such a Being men should be drawn to evil by a bait that is almost unfathomable, I mean, by the sense of pleasure, and are deterred from it by the fear of remorse, infamy, or several other punishments; they spend their lives, tossed by these contrary passions, pulled sometimes one way, and sometimes another, being sometimes overcome by the sense of pleasure, and sometimes by the fear of the consequences. Manichæism probably arose from a strong meditation on this deplorable condition of man.

[F] He died at Venice in an inn.] He was gone to Venice upon account of a law-suit, and died of grief and old age. His enemies made his life very unhappy, if we believe the author I quote. 'Semper cum adversa fortuna iniquorum odio conflictatus (non enim malevoli tanto viro deesse poterant) demum cum Venetiarum litium quarundam causa venisset, & ad cauponem divertisset, ibi senio curisque confectus, excessit de vita (21). — Having all his life-time struggled with ill fortune thro' the envy of unjust men (for so great a man could not be without enemies), at last, coming to Venice on account of a law-suit, he died in an inn, worn out with old age and cares.' Another author, I shall quote, is very much mistaken as to the year, wherein Guarini died; for he says it was in the year 1590 (22).

[G] His verses cost him a great deal of pains.] Let us see first what Imperialis says of it. 'Insuper mirandum etiam, quod licet expedita illa carminum pangendorum ubertas, illaborata penitus, & sponte fusa videatur; tamen ab ipso anxie affectatam ac ditutino quæsitam studio ipsimet (familiares) asserunt, præmonstrantes extrinsecus quasdam carminum suorum schedulas, frequentissimis expunctas ac immutatas locis, ex quibus hercule peractis quidam, ac implexus scribendi arguitur labors (23). — What is more to be wondered at, is, that tho' his numbers seemed to flow with the greatest ease, yet his intimate friends assure us, he composed with great labour and pains, which they prove by some rough draughts of his poetry, which were corrected in a multitude of places, and seemed to denote a laborious writer.' This author informs us of two things: one is, that Guarini took great pains in making his verses; the other is, that one would think they were made with a wonderful facility. If any one should fancy that those two things are inconsistent, he must needs be unacquainted with the different characters of men, and believe, that no compositions cost a great deal of pains, but those of which a reader may say, what was said of Demosthenes's orations, Olenit lucernam, they smell of the lamp (24): but we ought to know, that there are many other varieties in the characters of men. Some authors make their readers sensible of the great pains they have been at; and, if they correct three or four times a certain place with a profound meditation and great pains, the reader perceives, that that passage is more laboured than another, which has been corrected only two or three times. But there are some writers, whose labour and pains make every thing they write appear easy and natural; so that the more they revise a piece of work, the less it seems to have been revised and laboured. Such was Guarini's character (25). He thought, that the perfection of a piece of poetry consisted in natural beauties, and a fluent and easy turn. He endeavoured to gain the approbation of the public by such a method, and perceived, with great penetration, whether there remained any thing in his work, that was forced and unnatural; and then he made it his business to revise and correct those faults. Thus it was only by much revising and polishing his verses, that he made them run smoothly and fluently. Other authors, having a quite different taste, place perfection in thinking and expressing one's self in an affected and bombast style, and such as discovers the fatigue of a profound meditation. They fancy, they do not express themselves happily and ingeniously, if they can be understood without much wit and attention (26); and they are never satisfied, till they have struck out of their writing whatever appears simple, natural, and common; and therefore the more they correct their works, the more they discover the pains they have ceased to love him, and then Guarini applied himself successively to Vincent of Gonzaga, Ferdinand of Medicis, great duke of Tuscany, and Francis Maria of Feltri, duke of Urbino;

been at. Their labour is certainly very great; but sometimes it does not come near the toil of those, who desire, that their works should appear easy and natural throughout. I have been told by some persons, who pretended to have it from good hands, and I have read it within these few days in a printed book (27), that Voiture did not publish his verses and letters, such as we have them, till he had taken great pains to correct them. His apologist does not say so; but yet he intimates, that the great ease, which appears in the works of that wit, cost him no small pains. I hope the reader will not be displeased to find here a piece of that apology. The thing is curious enough to appear here, attended with the approbation of some good judges. 'Mr de Voiture was above all things for that sort of negligence which so well becomes beautiful persons, which sets off the advantages of their birth, and, after having charmed the eyes, leaves room to think of what the beauties of art might have added to those of nature. There is something so easy and natural in all his writings, that every body thinks at first he might write in the same manner; and it is only after long and vain endeavours, that they cry out, Questo facile, quanto è difficile! This easy, how difficult is it! I remember he was not displeased that I should bestow upon him an encomium, which Tasso bestows upon one of his heroines,

Non so ben dire, s'adorna, o se negletta,
Se cafo od arte, il bel volto compoie;
Di natura, d'amor, del cielo, amici
Le negligenze sue sono artifici.

Whether from chance alone her beauties rise,
Or art improves the lustre of her eyes;
Frien'ded by nature, love, and ev'ry star,
Ev'n negligence itself in her is art.

'Indeed, what seems to be negligence in him, is but art disguised in the shape of it's contrary, to act with the more address and greater safety. And as nature is never more admirable, than when she seems to imitate the works of art; so art is not in it's perfection, unless it imitates nature, and converses it's labours and great efforts with an apparent easiness. The painters of old Greece represented the graces without cloaths, and without a head-dress; and, if at any time they painted them with gowns, they were loose gowns, to denote that the greatest charms do not proceed from artful and visible ornament; and particularly, that whoever pretends to please, ought to avoid the very shadow of constraint. Our love of liberty reaches to the productions of the mind; and we are naturally so great enemies to subjection and slavery, that a thing, though never so fine, will lose all it's charms, when it appears forced and strained. No man was ever more sensible of this truth than Mr de Voiture; no man did ever conceal more industriously the art he made use of, to bring forth out of his imagination the fine things he has left us. One would think, that flowers spring up every step he makes, or that he meets with them by chance, that the finest passages of his works cost him no pains, that every thing drops from his pen without any trouble and labour, as it were, out of a plentiful and unexhaustible source (28).

Mr Pellisson, who was so good a judge of all sorts of ingenious works, was persuaded, that it is often a very difficult thing for an author to make it appear, that his work cost him no great labour (29). Two things, says he (30), 'make poetry admirable, viz. Invention, from which it had it's name; and easiness, which is so necessary to it. I do not mean a facility in composing; it may be sometimes happy, but it ought to be always suspected: I mean the facility, which the readers observe in a composition, which is sometimes one of the most difficult things in the world for an author; so that it might be compared to garden-terraces, the expense of which does not appear, and which, after having cost several millions, yet seem to be a meer work of chance and nature.' What he had been saying about the easiness, that appears in the works of good poets, is admirable. 'One would think they could not have expressed themselves otherwise than they have done; their words and expressions are so easy that they seem to have dropped from their pen of themselves, and to have taken their proper places. The lyre of Amphion did not work greater miracles, when stones, drawn by his harmony, placed themselves one upon another, of their own motion, to raise up the famous walls of Thebes (31).

This is what the reader thinks, but the author knows the contrary, and remembers, that the most easy and fluent verses are those, that have obliged him to scratch his head, and bite his nails (32). He remembers, that, in making those verses, he followed Horace's advice (33), with the greatest exactness, and was like those ancient philosophers, whom a deep meditation put out of their wits.

Obstipo capite, & figentes lumine terram,
Murmura cum secum, & rabiosa silentia rodunt,
Atque exporrecto trutinantur Verba labello,
Ægroti veteris meditantur somnia, Gigni
De nihilo nihil, in nihilum nil posse reverti (34).

Wry-neck'd, and fixing on the ground their eyes,
They mutter mussy maxims of the wise;
To nothing nought returns, from nothing nought can rise.

Some exceptions ought to be made; for some poets, as Ovid among the ancients, and Moliere among the moderns, made verses with great facility, and the readers were sensible of it.

Take notice that Mr Pellisson observes, that this facility may be sometimes happy, but that it ought to be always suspected (35). Which puts me in mind of a thought of Mr Godeau. 'The facility in composing, says he (36), seems to be an advantage; but it is a kind of fault, because it hinders the mind, which naturally hates labour and pain, from carrying things to the highest point of perfection they are capable of. And indeed, the correction, which purifies the first productions, is more troublesome to those, who have that facility, than to others, who finish things as they produce them, and in whom art bears a greater part than nature.' This agrees well enough with Quintilian's notions. That great master would have an author, who begins to compose, to do it slowly. By this means, he will learn to write well, and then he will write readily; but if he writes hastily, or, which is the same, if he writes with great facility, he will never write well. Hanc moram & sollicitudinem initiis impeto . . . cito scribendo non fit ut bene scribatur: bene scribendo, fit ut cito (37). Let this facility be as much a fault as you please, yet it is better to be subject to it, than not to be able to bring forth one's conceptions without intolerable pains; and it is a greater misfortune for an author never to end his corrections, than to end them a little too soon. Balzac has been placed among those authors, who become unhappy by being too nice. Read these words of Costar (38).

'There is nothing fluent and natural in Balzac. His great labour is so sensible, that nice readers grow weary of his works, like that famous Sybarite, who was all in a sweat, seeing a poor workman labouring very hard. And indeed he himself confessed sometimes, that when he took pen in hand, he suffered as much as a galley slave. Not but that he had a great and noble genius; but he found it as difficult to satisfy himself, as that excellent man, of whom the late bishop of Lizieux said, The fine things he publishes cost him so dear, that were I in his case, I would pitch upon some other employment to serve my neighbours, and should not think that GOD required that from me.' Costar is in the right to say, that the readers easily perceive, that the productions of this famous writer cost him a great deal of pains. They will not say, that they might easily write as he does; for it is only the reading of an author, whose thoughts and expressions

This judgment of Horace agrees with that of Cicero, speaking of certain orators. Summissus est & humilis, consuetudinem imitans, ab indistinctis re plus

quam opinione differens. Itaque eum qui audiunt, quamvis ipsi infantes sint, tamen illo modo confident se posse dicere. Nam orationis subtilitas imitabilis quidem illa videtur esse existimanti, sed nihil est experienti minus (40). — His language is humble and familiar, differing more in reality than appearance from the uneloquent. Those therefore that bear him, tho' they are themselves infants, yet are confident they can speak like him. For that artful eloquence seems indeed such as may be imitated, to those, who judge without trying, but nothing is less to him, who makes the experiment. Note, that some said, that this sort of orators were the only ones that could be called Attics (41). To conclude, I add, that Ovid is one of those inimitable poets, whose imitation seems at first sight to be the easiest thing in the world (42).

GUARINI, or GUARINIO (GUARINUS), a Theatin monk and mathematician of the duke of Savoy, was a native of Modena, and flourished in the XVIIth century. His Placita Philosophica were printed at Paris in 1666, and his Cælestis Mathematica at Milan in 1683. He was dead when this last book came out.

[A] His Placita Philosophica were printed and his Cælestis Mathematica. Each of those two works is a book in folio. The first is a body of philosophy, wherein the author particularly enlarges upon physics, and departs from the common opinion of the schools. See the Journal des Savans of the twenty ninth of November, 1666. As for the other work, I refer the reader to the Acta eruditorum Lipsensium (1).

GUEBRIANT (RENATA DU BEC), widow of the Marechal de Guebriant, was the daughter of Renatus du Bec, marquis de Vardes [A], and sister of Renatus du Bec, who married the countess de Moret, mistress of Henry IV. Her eldest brother was killed in Italy by some Banditti [B]. She was ordered to conduct the princess Mary of Gonzaga to the king of Poland, who had married her at Paris by proxy; and she was invested with a new

[A] Renatus du Bec, marquis de Vardes. I add, that he was knight of the king's orders, and governor of la Capelle, and the country of Tierache; and that his son, who married the countess de Moret, had by her the marquis de Vardes, who has been so long out of favour by reason of some intrigues mentioned in the book, intitled, Les Amours du Palais Royal. This disgrace did not last till the death of the marquis de Vardes; but it wanted but a few years of it. The husband of the countess de Moret was governor of la Capelle, and condemned to death for contempt of the court, as having too soon surrendered that place to the Spaniards in the year 1636 (1). But he was declared innocent by a decree of the parliament of Paris, after the decease of the cardinal de Richelieu.

(1) The Mercure François, for the Year 1736, calls him only Baron de Bec.

[B] Her eldest brother was killed in Italy by some Banditti. It is commonly said so in the books that contain a genealogical account of the marquis de Vardes's ancestors (2). But in the collection of pieces, printed at the end of the journal of Henry III, there are some observations on the amours of Henry IV; wherein we are told, that this eldest brother was killed by a peasant, whom he had attempted to beat; and that his father, a venerable old man, who was worth fifty or sixty thousand livres a year, in order to conceal the death of his son, caused his train to take the road of Lyons and Italy, and some days after pretended to have received letters, whereby he was informed of the sudden death of his son, upon the road. He, who gives this account, does it upon this occasion. He says, that one Villeneuve, a gentleman of Guienne, who was married in the Vexin, got together many gentlemen at Saucour (3) near Gisors, in the year 1622, to have their advice about this case of conscience viz. A gentleman (probably the same, who consulted the rest) went alone into a country man's house to chastize him; the country man took him by the neck, and flung him down, swearing, 'he would kill him, unless he promised and swore, that he would never revenge himself either directly or indirectly.' The gentleman swore it, and desired to know whether he was bound to keep his word. The author of the observations adds, 'that all of them, being ten or twelve, voted in the affirmative, resolving that, for the time to come, no gentleman should attack such people but upon sure ground; and they alledged a new and worse instance of a certain marquis, &c.' It is the adventure I have mentioned concerning the eldest brother of the marquis de Vardes, and of the lady de Guebriant.

This story is related with so many circumstances, that one would take it to be true; but, if we consider other circumstances, we may very well doubt of the truth of it, and even affirm that it is false. We find in the voyage of the queen of Poland, written by le Laboureur (4), that the lady de Guebriant, passing by Genoa, caused a tomb to be erected for her brother, who had been killed by some banditti of that country. I shall set down the whole passage of Mr le Laboureur, which contains many circumstances, that render what is said of the assembly of Saucour altogether improbable. That writer, having observed, that the princes of Monaco, and the lords du Bec-Crispin in Normandy, are descended from the same ancestors, adds, 'that this very thing moved the late messire John du Bec, marquis de la Boffe (5), eldest son of Renatus du Bec, marquis de Vardes, knight of the king's orders, being in Italy in the year 1616, to go and pay a visit to the Grimaldi, related to him; and, being killed in his way thither by the banditti, they took care to revenge his death by an exemplary punishment, and caused his body to be deposited in St Francis's church, where many of the family had been buried, and where it remained till the year 1646, when the lady de Guebriant his sister, and messieurs Grimaldi, had it removed to Our Lady of Consolation without the walls of Genoa, where a monument was erected to him, and I made the epitaph.'

(4) Third Part, pag. 353.

(5) Moret, in the article Bec-Crispin, has once put la Boffe instead of la Boffe. He had read, or heard something of the other manner in which they relate this death, as appears by these words: others say, that the peasants of Normandy murdered him at Budarid; which makes a new difference.

Can any one believe, that the farce would have been carried so far, to conceal from the world, that a young marquis had been killed by a peasant? would that family have been dishonoured by such a misfortune; and was there no other way to conceal the thing, but by bringing in the Italian banditti? We must not use people a new character (a), which was that of ambassador extraordinary. Le Laboureur, in his relation of that journey, does not seem to give a sincere account of the issue of the French Ambassador's quarrel [C], nor does Mr de Wicquefort give an exact account of it [D], and he says without any reason, that the lady de Guebriant was concerned in it. She worthily kept up her character: she was an intriguing woman, and endowed with very noble qualities [E]. Priolo does not give a right account people to give more credit to stories told in conversation, than to historical monuments, like those mentioned by Mr le Laboureur; it would be an ill example, and a thing of dangerous consequence.

[C] Le Laboureur . . . does not seem to relate sincerely the issue of the French ambassador's quarrel. Though one be never so desirous to spare a man of his merit, one cannot forbear saying, that he does not give an impartial account of the French ambassador's dispute, and endeavours to conceal the ill success of his pretensions. Having mentioned, page 137, 138, the most solid reasons of the Poles, he does not say what was replied to them, nor what was at last resolved. At page 151, he places Mr de Bregi at table below prince Charles (6), without telling us how, and why, that ambassador gave up his pretensions. In the 194th page, he places him still below the prince; but he adds, that this prince represented the ambassador extraordinary of the emperor. Whereby he artfully insinuates, that Mr de Bregi had all the advantage he could expect from his dispute, since prince Charles was decidedly invested with a character, to which all the ambassadors of crowned heads give the upper hand. But the reader is told in the errata, that the words, who represented the person of the emperor, ought to be left out. It is somewhat strange, that this fault should not be expressed in the errata exactly in the same words as it is in the book. But the artifice, which plainly appears in it, is much more inexcusable, if it be considered that few people mind an errata (7). The reader is also desired to strike out of the same page what is said in it, that the nuncio placed himself below that lady at the wedding feast. However those two corrections do not well answer the expectation of the reader (8) grounded upon the censure passed upon Mr Renaudot's gazettes, and another relation of that feast, and upon these words of Mr le Laboureur: Perhaps I shall be accounted a more credible witness as to the persons, who sat down at their majesties table, and the order they were placed in, since the queen of Poland sent for me to be present at it. If so many fallacies were published at Paris about things relating to the ceremonial, how could the news, that concerned things more difficult to be known, be depended upon? The multitude of those, who pretend to send relations, produces a strange confusion. Le Laboureur says, they had several servants, who pretended to write news, and that the baker took care to observe, among other things, the price and goodness of meal (9).

[D] Nor does Mr de Wicquefort give an exact account of it. The ambassador, says he (10), 'who scrupled to give the upper hand to the hereditary prince of Sweden, brother to the king of Poland, and the lady de Guebriant, who pretended to have the same honours that were formerly paid to the arch-duchess of Tirol, were guilty of an unpardonable impertinence, and procured an affront to their master.' The ambassador he means is the same, whom he calls viscount de Bregi, page 593, of the first book; where having called his pretension an extravagant one, he adds, that the pretension of the lady de Guebriant was not less ridiculous, since she desired to have the same rank, and the same honours that were paid to the arch-duchess, when she brought to the queen her daughter into Poland. It is said in the index, wherein the reader is referred to the same page 593, that the lady de Guebriant pretended to have the upper hand of the arch-duchess; but there is no such thing in that page.

I will not contradict Mr de Wicquefort in what he says concerning those pretensions; it is not a matter of fact. I shall only say, that he has no reason to tell us, that Bregi and the lady de Guebriant procured an affront to their master by their pretensions. This cannot be said of that lady; for it does not appear from le Laboureur's relation, that she had any dispute. We read in it (11), that there was a long contest at two several times, occasioned by the pretensions of the French ambassador; but le Laboureur is so far from saying, that this lady was engaged in a contest, that, on the contrary, he tells us, that, on the very day Mr de Bregi began to have a dispute, the queen of Poland desired the lady de Guebriant not to concern her self in it, and that the count d'Honoff, the ambassador, and the grandes of Poland, assured her, that she should have the honours due to her character, not only of ambassador extraordinary, but also of superintendant of her majesty's conduct, according to several precedents, and PARTICULARLY THAT OF THE ARCH-DUCHESS OF INSBRUCK, when she brought the late queen. In another place the author informs us (12), that the king declared to all the grandes of the kingdom, that he intended she should receive all the honours due to a lady of her quality and character, THE SAME WITH THOSE THAT WERE PAID TO THE ARCH-DUCHESS OF INSBRUCK, sister to the great duke of Tuscany, who brought the late queen. After this I need not allege the following passage of that relation to confute Mr de Wicquefort (13). The lady de Guebriant going down stairs in the palace, to get into her coach (14), the bishop of Posen gave her his blessing in his pontifical habits. This honour is only paid to kings and queens, and sovereign princes; but the king ordered it to be paid to her, the better to show how much he esteemed that illustrious lady.

[E] She was endowed with very noble qualities. I think that, in order to judge of that lady's merit, it is necessary to keep a medium between the praises bestowed upon her by le Laboureur, and the ill character others give of her. However, any one that reflects upon her employments must needs own, that she had a great deal of wit, and all the talents that a lady must have, in order to maintain and distinguish herself in the most eminent posts of the court. Tho it be said, that those, who bestow employments, have no great regard to merit, men of sense will never believe, that the queen mother and cardinal Mazarin made that lady superintendant of the conduct of the queen of Poland (15), and ambassador extraordinary, if she had not been looked upon as a woman well qualified to do a great deal of honour to France in the court of Poland, and to keep up that new character (16) with all the wit, prudence, and grandeur, it required. She is very much praised in the letters, written to her by the king, the queen-mother, and the cardinal, when she was nominated to that employment, and in those, which the king of Poland wrote to the king and queen-mother, when she returned to Paris; and it is certain she acquitted herself of that employment with great ability. Those letters may be seen in le Laboureur's relation.

As I have said before, the praises he bestows upon her ought not to be taken in their full latitude. It seems to him, that when their majesties pitched upon her, they acted according to the wishes of the whole French nation, and particularly of the chief persons of the court. He says, the thing was made public before it was resolved upon; that this illustrious widow lived a retired life; that her husband received every day in her memory, to die in her heart; that she sacrificed to him daily some of her passions; that she minded neither court preferments, nor the court itself. Lastly, that she accepted of that employment, only because she could not disobey her sovereign, being so much beholden to him for so many many favours, and particularly for the funeral honours paid to the marshal her husband by his orders. This he says in the first part of his relation. He tells us, in the second volume of his additions to Castelnau's memoirs, page 499, that she kept up the reputation and memory of the marshal de Guebriant, by so many services and glorious labours, that the king, by making her lady of honour to his queen, has not only pleased all his subjects, but also acted according to the wishes and esteem of all foreign nations, among whom he discovered the great merit, during her embassy extraordinary to conduct the queen of Poland into her kingdom. There is certainly too much rhetoric, and too many poetical thoughts, in these encomiums, especially for a man, who makes very bold reflexions upon the abuses of his time in many places of his additions to Castelnau's memoirs, and whose blows are much like those of the count de Lude, of whom he says, That though he shot at a great distance upon the government, all his shots were not lost: some carried home, and made desperate wounds. This he says at page 767 of his additions. We shall see hereafter a passage of Patin, whereby it does not appear, that the whole French nation wished that heroine might be raised to great honours; and I have just now read in a modern historian, that he had an exorbitant ambition, which was the reason why the marshal de Guebriant had a magnificent burial. Guebriantii exequiæ non vulgari pompa celebratæ. Corpus illatum Fano Deipare Virginis, qui honos in frequens non tam concessus Viri meritis, quàm uxor Renatæ Bekiæ flagitante extortus; femina im- pens, gloriæ potius quàm luctus immodica iusta visu persolvit in sui alimentis inebare. (1.)

The obsequies of the marshal Gueubriant were celebrated with no ordinary pomp. The body was deposited in the church of Notre-Dame, whither unusual honour was not so much granted to the marshal's merit, as extorted by the importunity of Renata du Bec, his wife, who was prompted to the performance of these immoderate rites, not through excess of grief, but ambition and ostentation.* I must needs say, that I do not believe she accepted the embassy extraordinary of Poland out of obedience, and that it was bestowed upon her without her desiring and suing for it. The oratory of a man, who praises, ought to be suspected.

[F] Priso does not give a right account of her negotiation at Brisac. That historian (18) relates a thing, which is not much to this lady's honour. He says, that, during the last troubles, Charlevoix, who commanded in Brisac, quarrelled with the governour sent thither by the court, (it was Mr de Tilladet), and that he so well pursued his point, that the governour was obliged to yield to him. That the lady de Guebriant, either out of avarice or ambition, undertook to make herself necessary; and, being willing the court should think she had preserved that important place, she formed a intrigue to ruin Charlevoix. That she repaired to Brisac with a young woman he loved; and that Charlevoix, being so imprudent as to go out of that place to see this woman (19), was taken, and carried prisoner to Philippsburg. That the lady de Guebriant was very much abused upon that account, and obliged to return to Bafil as fast as she could; and that Charlevoix had secret intrigue with the count de Harcourt, who was dissatisfied with the government, and made his peace upon advantageous terms, so that the lady was hurt by both parties, and died of grief (20).

He is an instance of what commonly happens to those who write abridgments: they omit many circumstances, without which a fact is but a rough and shapeless mass, as those know, who, after they have read it in a large history, compare their notion of it with what they read in an abridgment. Whoever reads this intrigue of the lady de Guebriant in Mr de la Barde's history, will find the truth of what I say. But, laying aside Priolo's omissions, it is certain he has advanced two falsities.

The first consists in saying, that Charlevoix went out of Brisac to see the mistress the lady de Guébriant brought him. Nothing can be more false; he had no occasion to go out of that place to see her, since she was there in that lady's retinue. Besides, the reader may very well wonder that this lady should be at Brisac, and that Charlevoix's mistress, by whose means he was to be entrapp'd, should not be with the lady who carries on the intrigue, and knows so well how to use the stratagems of Catherine de Medicis (21). It is certain he was there, and that the artifice made use of to bring Charlevoix into the snare, was to use him to go in a coach at a great distance from the town with the lady de Guébriant, and his mistress. But on that point that he was taken, the lady de Guébriant, being ling to be in the town, when the first hews of it should come thither, pretended some business that did not allow her to go abroad, and yet desired all her retinue should go. The second falsity concerns the death of that lady. Priolo says, she died of grief, when the civil-war was not yet ended; but it is certain (22) she was not disturbed for the ill success of her enterprise at Briscé, and that she carried on her intrigues even at Bassi, and filled her head with vast designs, to ingratiate herself with the queen-mother, and cardinal Mazzarine: in a word, that she died only in 1659, after she had made so great a figure at court, that she was to be first lady of honour to queen Maria Thérèse. How came Priolo, who was sufficiently acquainted with great people, to know what passed among them, and who published his history few years after the death of that lady, to place her death so wrong, as to take away from her five or six years of a shining prosperity? Perhaps he did her a good office by it.

Mr de la Barde observes, that this lady, not contented with the character of embassadress, which she had been invested with, desired to engage in a war-intrigue, as being a thing of greater lustre (23). Nay, it was said, she aspired to the government of Brisac, and that she was desirous to be possessed of the king's lands in Alsace. She would have recovered by that means the money the king owed her, and would have formed a small flat state upon that frontier. * Ea tempe

[G] This may serve to remove some suspicions about her.] I have just now said, that perhaps Priolo did her a good office. I mean, that, if this author had not taid, that the lady de Guebriant died before the troubles were over, many readers might have suspected, that she was one of the four women, of whom he gives a very ill character. He says, that four women kindled a civil war all over France, that they had more virtue than virtue, and that, their projects having miscarried, they set up for devout women; which, says he, is a common thing with women, when their looking-glass makes them fensible, that they are no longer able to make a figure in the world. thing that Patin says of her ought not to be credited [H]. This affords a remark, wherein we shall see when she died. We shall see, in another remark, the mistake of a German writer [I], who published notes on Priolo. I must not forget, that this lady, who thought herself undermatched, having married a man, who was very rich, caused her marriage to be declared void [K], and married (b) the count de Guebriant,

and the last time he was talked of on account of his gallantry; but I have been informed by a person, who knew it well, that he frequently used that trade. Notwithstanding the age of the lady de Guebriant, all the readers would take her to be one of the four, had not the historian prevented it by the method he took, much better than by the characters he gives of them, most of which suit with her: I say, her age would signify nothing; for, not to go so far as Alpaïa, Lamia, and even the duchess of Valentinois, do we not see, much about the same time Priolo speaks of, a duchess somewhat advanced in years (29), whose amorous conquests were very considerable? Mr de la Barde, whom I quote, agrees with Mr Priolo in this point, viz. that women were very much at the helm during the storms of the late minority. The author of the Thoughts on Comets might have added this citation to his 236th article, and not this alone, but an infinite number of the like, which we meet with in books.

Take notice, that when I said, that Priolo represents the four ladies, who had so great an interest, as being barren; I said so, only with respect to most readers; for those, who know, that these words of that historian, Neque regno, neque sibi felicitas uteri, are an allusion to what Patriculus said of Julia, Augustus's daughter (30), will not take them to be a sign of barrenness.

[H] Every thing that Patin says of her, ought not to be credited. Here are two passages out of his letters. The lady de Guebriant, says he, in a letter of the ninth of September, 1659, is dead (31) at Perigueux: She had not been sick above thirteen hours, and she is dead without confession. She was a partisan in that country, where she has been very much cursed. Ten days after, he spoke of her in the following manner. We hear that the lady de Guebriant is dead, attending upon the court. She was the marquis de Vardes's aunt, and never had any children: I believe she has left a good estate behind her. She died in four days, without confession. One might say of her, what Erasmus said in jest of a Franciscan, who died suddenly, Obiit sine cruce, sine lux, sine Deus (§ 2). It is said, she was very much in debt; but then the queen owed her 40000 pistoles, which she lent her during the siege of Paris.

[§ 2] This saying occurs in the Facetiae of Bebelius, fol. 56. Edit. 1542. And Luther has likewise used it in his Table-Talk, Tom. 1. fol. 86. Omnes, says he of a good number of his adversaries, mortui sunt sine cruce, et sine lux. REM. CRIT.]

There being many things in Patin's letters, which he picked out as he was visiting his patients (32), I would not much rely upon what I have just quoted from him. I could easily believe this lady had a hand in finding out ways and means to raise money for the king, and that loving to make great expences, and to keep her self busy, the willingly turned her mind that way, and that therefore she was cursed in the places, wherein she shewed her skill in that point; but I do not think it was in Perigord (33). Doubtless she died in that province, as she was going through it, during the progress of the court into Guienne, when she expected to be soon first lady of honour to the queen; for no body doubted then of the king's marriage with the Infanta of Spain.

If the letters of that physician be reprinted, his mistakes should be rectified by way of notes, and a good alphabetical index should be added to them. But, before I proceed, I must quote another passage, concerning the family of Guebriant, out of one of the letters I have quoted. He says, that the countess de Moret, mistress to Henry IV, is famous in Barclay's Euphormio, under the name of Cafina; that it is in the place, where she was married to the count de Cessy-Sancy, who was afterwards ambassador at Constantinople, and that there is in it a description of a contract of marriage of a man, who is willing to be a cuckold, and engages to bear it; that, about the year 1618, she was married again to the marquis de Vardes, son of the good man, governor of la Chapelle, &c. He should have said la Capelle (34); he, who married the countess de Moret, was also governor of that place. It might have been further said, that Henry IV stipulated with the count de Cessy, that he should leave that countess the very night of the wedding, which was done accordingly (35). The count does not make such a promise, in the Euphormio; but he promises in the contract not to meddle with the bride. Patin should not have omitted that particular. For the rest, the author, who published the key of the Euphormio (36), is mistaken in taking Olympion, who submitted to those terms, for the count de Moret.

[I] We shall see . . . the mistake of a German writer. Priolo's history was reprinted at Leipzig, the second time, in the year 1686, with the notes of a professor, called Franckenstein: they are not free from faults; nevertheless it appears from them, that the author was pretty well informed for a foreigner. That professor, having said, that Priolo does frequently tax the lady de Guebriant (37) with too great ambition, adds, that she gave a remarkable instance of it, when she demanded, at the court of the king of Poland, the same honours the arch-duchess of Austria had received there, when she brought her daughter, who was contracted to the king. He quotes Wicquefort in the second book De l'Ambassadeur, Sect. 8. pag. 134. But, besides that he should have quoted pag. 200, and not 134, he should also have cited the 594th page of the first book, where that arch-duchess is styled the mother of the queen of Poland, whom she brought. They are both mistaken as to that quality of the arch-duchess; for she was not the mother of the queen of Poland. That queen was daughter of the emperor Ferdinand II, and sister to the emperor Ferdinand III. And therefore were it true, that this queen was conducted into Poland by her mother, she would have been conducted thither by the empress, and not by the arch-duchess of Austria. Besides, that author should have said, the arch-duchess of Inspruc, and not the arch-duchess of Austria. Lastly, I observe, that Le Laboureur does not intimate, that the lady de Guebriant required the same honours, which the arch-duchess had received; he only says, that the king of Poland ordered it so: But Wicquefort is more concerned in this, than the professor of Leipzig. See what I have said about it in the remark [D].

[K] She caused her marriage to be declared void. Nothing can better discover her ambition than this. The count de Guebriant was a hopeful man, and very much esteemed at court; and his skill in the art of war made it very probable, that he would be preferred to the greatest posts. Our Renata du Bec found her man in him: she foresaw he would raise himself (38), and that she would have several opportunities of intriguing, whilst he commanded the armies: and therefore, tho' he was no rich man, she resolved to marry him, and to that end she got her marriage dissolved. Mr de la Barde will give us this account in good Latin. Hæc mulier animo supra sexum valido est, cui videlicet nec prima, nec magna usque fuit sicuti vulgo mulierum solet, rei familiaris cura: primas, quia imparem animo, sicuti rebatur, virum nata erat, nuptias dedignata est, atque infirmas esse contendit, maluitque se I. Budæ Guebriani virtutis, quam alterius amplioris rei, ejus rationem, ut ferè sit, filiam collocando parentes habuerant, sociam esse. Ex illa secum, atque ex gloriâ viri postillâ multis rebus præclarè gestis celeberrimi communicatâ ita creverunt mulieris animi, ut magna, atque insolita moliretur (39). — This lady had a strength of mind above her sex, since her domestic affairs were neither her principal, nor ever her great care, as is the case of most women; she disdained her first marriage, as being got a husband unequal, as she thought, in mind; and therefore she insisted it was void, and chose to share in the virtue of the count de Guebriant, rather than in the larger fortunes of another, a circumstance, which her parents, as is usual, had considered in marrying her. The share she had in her husband's glory so exalted her thoughts, that she attempted great and uncommon things.

(36) See the Leyden edition, of ad Hackium, 1674, in 8vo.

(37) I have not observed that he taxes her with it in more than two places: The index made by Mr Franckenstein, tho' very large, only mentions one of them.

That author of the notes on Priolo has taken for daughter of the arch-duchess her that was not.

(38) That lady, who had a great deal of wit, received him with greater satisfaction, because she knew his noble extraction, and because she foresaw, that he would be quickly raised to the highest posts, by reason of his great endowments. [L] She very much contributed to his being made marechal of France. We have just now seen, that according to Mr de la Barde, she was none of those women, who, like the rest of her sex, take great care of their domestic concerns; she loved to negotiate at court. Le Laboureur observes (40), 'that he had been an eye-witness of the extraordinary care she took to solicit the ministers, that the army commanded by her husband should want nothing; and I can affirm, adds he, that the dignity of marshals of France belongs to her on a double account, because her husband is a marechal of France, and because she had a great share in the good success of his arms.'

GUESCLIN (a) (BERTRAND DU), constable of France, was one of the greatest captains of his time. However, we ought not to believe whatever the old chronicles say of him; for the authors of that sort of works were not yet cured of the distemper, which produced the histories of Roland, of Ogier the Dane, and the like. Our du Guesclin was a Breton, and did yet very great services to France during king John's imprisonment, and under the reign of Charles V. Being gone into Spain to assist Henry king of Castile, he did extraordinary things in that country. He returned into France, when the crown was secured to Henry by the death of Dom Pedro the Cruel, his competitor, and was very successful in recovering several countries from the English. He died in the year 1380, being sixty six years old, or thereabouts (b). He was a little man, and very ugly [A]. See his life, written by Mr du Chatelet [B].

It is better than that, which was printed in the year 1618, in very old French, out of which I shall set down a very remarkable passage quoted by some controversialists [C], to shew, that laymen had a right to administer the sacraments in certain cases of necessity.

[A] He was a little man, and very ugly. 'Tho' Bertrand du Guesclin was a little man, and very ugly, he was made constable of France, and was all along very much esteemed. It has been said in his favour, that nature seemed to have formed him such as he was, lest he should have something common with women: and had he spent every morning in adorning his head with a peruke, he had never made himself worthy of a never-dying lamp, and of being buried at the king's feet in St Denys's church (1).'

[B] See his life published by Mr du Chatelet. Menard published an old history of that hero in the year 1618, which had been written in 1387. But the reader ought to be referred to that, of which an extract was published in the Journal des Savans of the twenty first of June 1666. It had been lately published at Paris in folio by Messire Paul Hat, Seigneur du Chatelet (2): it is digested into a better order than the other; the style is incomparably more pure and elegant, and besides it is illustrated with many proofs (3).

[C] I shall set down a very remarkable passage quoted by the controversialists. Read these words of Mr Dreilincourt (4): 'we have a very remarkable example of of this lay-communion in our Histories of France', 'and a very clear proof that it was practised for a long time. For Bertrand du Guesclin, constable of France, who lived in the reign of John and Charles V, kings of France, describing the battle of Pontvalin, in which he obtained a signal victory over the English, informs us, that his soldiers confessed their sins, and gave the communion one to another, before the battle.' But it is better to set down the words of the author: 'in that place, they eat bread and drank wine, which they had brought with them; and some of them took bread, and made the sign of the cross upon it, in the name of the holy sacrament; and having confessed their sins one to another, they used it instead of the communion (§ a). Afterwards, they said many prayers, beseeching GOD that he would preserve them from death, maiming, and imprisonment.' Grotius made use of the same passage in a dissertation, printed in 1638, De Cane Administratione ubi Pastores non sunt. See the Bibliothèque Universelle, pag. 115, 116. of the fourth volume.

[(§ a)] We meet with footsteps of these communions still more ancient, in our old romances; among others, in ch. 36. of the Galien ressource, in which Roland, wounded to death, and lying in a corn-field, administers the communion to himself with three ears of corn, in the name of the three persons of the holy Trinity. He was brought up at court; but, after the death of queen Isabella of Castile, he turned a Franciscan monk, and had very honourable employments in his order. Afterwards, having made himself known at court, he was made preacher to Charles V, and was much esteemed for his politeness, eloquence, and great parts (a). He ought to have been contented with the glory he got by his tongue; for, pretending to write books, he made himself ridiculous to good judges. His high-flown and figurative style, full of antitheses [A], is not the greatest fault of his works. An ill taste, and a wrong notion of eloquence, put to Guevara, than that of the Flemish Jesuit. You will find it in the following passage of Nicolas Antonio (2): 'Quantumvis stylus hominis non usquequaque placeat, neque in gymnasio rhetorum solidam reponitur eloquentiæ laudem. Cum præcipue Alphonsus & Garzia Matamoros & Andrea Scotto (qualis judicii & doctrinæ viris!) affectata nimium ab eo antithetorum sibi mutuo respondentium perpetua cura displicet maxime. put him upon such a way of writing; which was an inconsiderable thing, if compared with his extravagant way of handling history [B]. He broke the most sacred and the most essential laws of it, with a boldness that cannot be sufficiently detested; and he shewed, that no man was ever so unworthy of the character of Chronicler to Charles V, which was given him. He alledged a very bad excuse, when he was censured for it [C]: he pretended, that, excepting the holy scriptures, all other antithetis doctas posuisse figuras laudari contentus. Fulgurat interdum et tonat, sed non totam (ut olim Pericles Atheniensis) dicendo commovet civitatem, et dum nihil vult, nisi eulte et splendide dicere, saepe incidit in ea quae derisum effugere non possunt. Qui si illam (subjungit) extra-ripas effluentem verborum copiam artificio dicendi repressisset, et graviorum artium instrumento locupletasset, dubito quidem an patrem in eo eloquentiae genere in Hispania esset inventurum. — Tho' this author's style be not altogether pleasing, nor merits true praise in the school of the rhetoricians. Particularly Alphonsus Garfias Metamorus, and Andreas Scotus, men of great learning and judgment, are bigbly displeased with that perpetual affectation of antitheses. The former of these, Metamorus, in his book, de Academiis & doctis viris Hispaniae, owns that he was a writer of wonderful eloquence, and incredible fertility of genius; but (says he) he fell into the fault, which Persius objects to the poets, of perpetually playing with antitheses. He sometimes thunders and lightens, but does not, as formerly Pericles the Athenian did, shake a whole state with his eloquence; and whilst he aims at elegance, he often falls into those things which expose him to laughter. Had this author (he goes on) kept the torrent of his eloquence within bounds, I question whether Spain could have shewn an author equal to him. It is in vain, and thro' a blind conceitedness, that Wadding (3) taxes Father Schottus with envy.

[B] His extravagant way of handling history. The liberty he took to falsify whatever he pleased, and to advance, as true matter of fact, the meer inventions of his shallow brains, comes near that of the writers of romances. The latter deceive no body; for they do not require, that whatever they say should be accounted true: the only thing they are fond of, is, that their fictions should be approved as being ingeniously contrived; but Guevara pretended, that what he advanced, should be looked upon as historical facts taken from good authors. He was therefore a public poisoner, and a seducer, and deserved to be punished as a prophane and sacrilegious man, at the tribunal of the commonwealth of learning; for he violated the most sacred laws of history. Nicolas Antonio is too indulgent. 'Illud, says he (4), commiseratione potius quam excusatione indiget, talis famae virum putasse licere sibi ad inventionem proprii ingenii pro antiquorum proponere, & commendare, factus suos aliis supponere, ac denique de universa omnium temporum historia, tanquam de Aesopi fabulis, portento sine Luciani narrationibus ludere. — It deserves our pity rather than our censure, that a writer of such fame should think himself at liberty to forge ancient facts, and to play with the history of the world, as with Aesop's fables, or Lucian's monstrous stories.' See the whole extent of his impostures in the article RUA: I have also touched upon them in other places (5).

[C] He was censured. Peter Rua, professor at Soria, did not suffer the boldness of this author to go unpunished. He wrote strongly against him, as may be seen in his article. Here follows the judgment that Vossius passed upon the pretended life of Marcus Aurelius, written by Guevara: 'Vita illa M. Aurelii Antonini, quae ab Antonio Guevara, Mendonensi Episcopo, & Caesari Carolo V. à consiliis, Hispanice edita est, eaque de lingua in alias permutas translata fuit, nihil Antonini habet; sed tota est supposititia, ac genuinum Guevarae ipsius foris: qui turpiter os oblevit leclori, plane contra officium hominis candidi, maxime Episcopi. Habet interim plurima lectu nec inutilia nec injuncta imprints viro principi: unde & Horologium principum inscribitur (6). — That life of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, which is published in Spanish by Antony Guevara, bishop of Mondoneda, and privy counsellor of the emperor Charles V, and translated from thence into many other languages, has nothing in it of Antoninus; but the whole is fictitious, and the genuine offspring of Guevara himself: who scandalously imposes upon the reader, plainly against the duty of an honest man, but especially of a bishop. In the mean time, he has many things not unuseful or unpleasant, especially to a prince; whence it is intitled, the Dial of Princes. I quote Martin Schoockius in the margin (7): he knew very well the faults of that Spaniard; but, because he goes upon Rupertus's authority, it will not be improper to set down somewhat at large the words of that learned German (8). Eandem quoque imposturam notaram in eodem Guevara, quem obi id tanta Imperatoris sui, tanta nostrorum hominum benevolentia prorsus indignum studiosae juventutis manibus excussum ibam. Refert lib. I. Horologii Principum c. i. gentem apud Romanos fuisse Clavillam magno in honore, quae se originem ducere gloriatur à Camillo ducum Romanorum celeberrimo, viros ex ea Camillos, Feminas Clavillas dictas in memoriam filiae Clavillae, quae abhorrens nuptias in Virginum Vestalium numerum cooptari voluerit. Hoc Epitaphium addit à Graeco translatus esse, & paullo post, multa refert de Camillorum praerogativa, de perfectionibus eorumdem sub Sylla, quae omnia putida, vana & falsa, nec cuiquam Historicorum veterum tradita, quamvis ille Cinnam & Pollionem laudet scriptores quos tot anni & profunda seculorum oblivio fere cogitationibus hominum & memoriae, ne dum oculis exemit. — I had observed the same imposture in the same Guevara, whom for that reason I endeavoured to take out of the hands of our young students, as being unworthy of the favours of his master the emperor, and our countrymen: he relates book i. ch. i. of his Dial of Princes, that the family of the Clavilla were bad in great honour at Rome, which pretended to derive its origin from Camillus, a most famous Roman general; that the males of that family were called Camilli, the females Clavillae, in memory of his daughter Clavilla, who, abhorring marriage, chose to become a Vestal virgin: that, after her death, divine honours were paid to her, and this epitaph inscribed on her tomb.

Here lies Clavilla, only daughter of Camillus, who chose to live forty six years among the Vestal sisters, a prisoner, rather than to marry, at liberty, the great king of Sicily. Sad fate! the worms now feed upon those limbs, which shone pure and undefiled thro' her whole life.

He adds, that this epitaph was translated out of the Greek, and, immediately after, he relates many things concerning the privileges of the Camilli, and of their persecutions under Sylla; every word of which is idle stuff, and falsehood, nor mentioned by any one ancient historian; tho' he cites two authors, Cinna and Pollio, authors unheard of for so many centuries. I have quoted this long passage at length, because it contains a specimen, where by one may better judge of Guevara's impudence, than by what I have said of it in general. The learned Antonius Augustinus has very well described the faults of that man. Antonius Guevara, says he (9), 'qui scire antiquas Romanasque Historias fingit, eaque comminiscitur quae nec via nec audita quae Dial. x. mortalibus, nemo ut divinare queat in quos ille libros pag. m. 152. incidit. 'nullum reperias auctorem. — Antonius Guevara, who pretends to be skilled in the ancient Roman history, and invents such things, as were never seen or heard of, and which no one can tell whence he had them. He even invents new names of authors, and publishes idle stories, not to be met with in any author.'

teris (10). — He pretended, by way of excuse, that that ancient facts were so little to be depended upon, that the holy scripture alone deserves to be believed. This was the false pretence, under which he endeavoured to screen himself, when the very learned Peter Rua admonished him by several expostulatory letters, concerning the credit due to history. It was a poor excuse; for though historical Scepticism were as well grounded as some pretend, yet an author would not be allowed to advance, that Cicero or Cæsar said or did a certain thing invented by himself. Every body would be obliged to ascribe nothing to them but what is to be found in ancient monuments. An author ought not to go by particular rules of his own; he must conform to public rules: but, according to the public laws in point of history, what is proved by the testimony of grave authors is admitted; and whatever a modern writer advances concerning antiquity, without taking it from good historians, is rejected as a fable: and therefore, whatever opinion Guevara had of ancient history, whether he believed it to be true, false, or doubtful, he should have cited what he found in it, and only that, otherwise he deserves to be treated like a public seducer. Rua confused that subterfuge, and wrote against him, in vindication of the truth of history. Another author (11) did likewise enter the lists, to run down Guevara's principles. 'Cujus rei etiam nomine doctissimus ille Theologorum locorum scriptor libri secundi sexto capite in Guevaræ hoc, indignum eo, ac dignitate ejus, five judicium, five, quod magis credere est, ingenii luxuriantis licentiam, acri, quod deuit, oratione invehitur. Præsertim cum Chronographi munus regio beneficio apud Carolum exerceret, neutiquam debuit eam qua ornabatur historiarum professionem sic deprimeret, ut propria confessione sibi ipsi quoque & monumentis suis fidem apud posteris derogaret (12). — Upon which account, likewise, the learned writer of the Theological Common-places, in the sixth chapter of the second book, inveighs sharply against this opinion, or rather wanton liberty, of Guevara, so unworthy of him, and of his dignity. Especially, considering he was chronicler to the emperor Charles, he ought by no means to have so depressed the authority of history, which was his profession, as, by his own confession, to take away all credit from himself and his writings to all posterity.

Mention is made, in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (13), of a certain Triumvirate, to which Guevara might be added. That Triumvirate is made up, I. of Father Morin, who, 'three years after the taking of Rochelle, maintained still that it had not been taken, and that all the reports that went about it were meer romance.' II. Of a famous and dreadful logician, who told a gentleman, who had been saying, that he had seen the duke d'Epemont at Plaisance, that cannot be . . . for four undeniable reasons, and I will make it out that this duke must necessarily be at London . . . It is more probable that the eyes are mistaken, than reason . . . The news in question implies a moral contradiction, and perhaps a physical one.' III. Of a man, who told Isaac Vol-

fius 'that after long and intent meditations, he had writ a book, wherein he shewed by invincible arguments, that whatever is contained in Cæsar's commentaries, concerning the wars of Gaul, is false; and besides, that Cæsar never went beyond the Alps.'

[E] It is a fiction to say that he was beatified by the court of Rome.] Don Nicholas Antonio quotes an author, who composed the martyrology of the Franciscans, and said, that the holy see, after the necessary informations, solemnly declared, that Guevara is one of the beatified persons, and ought to be looked upon as such. Nescio unde Arcturus, à Monasterio Franciscani Martyrologii auctor rem alii inditam, inauditam acceperit. Antonium ut Guevaram Octobris die xxiv in albo eorum collocaret quos Apostolica Petri sedes Beatos esse atque appellari debere, acceptis prius exquisitisque probationibus, rite sanxit (14). This is a greater boldness than that of Guevara. If this fact had any appearance of truth, how comes it to be mentioned only by one author? the silence of all others is a demonstrative proof against the author of the Martyrology.

[F] One cannot sufficiently admire the eagerness of foreigners, in translating some of his works into several languages.] The Dial of Princes was translated into Italian by Mambrin Rosco in 1548, and into French in 1588 (§ 2). Frederic William duke of Saxony caused it to be printed in Latin, with notes and aphorisms, by John Vankelius in 1611, in folio. That edition was reprinted at Leipzig in 1615, and 1624, and at Frankfurt in 1664 (15). Emericus Calaubonus in prologo sic feliciter Guevaræ suam contigisse fictionem confirmat, omnium sit ut hic liber ubique gentium celebratissimus, Europæique omnes suo uniuscujusque idiomate loquentem thesauri ad instar habeant, mirificæque ejus possessione fruatur (16). — Emericus Casaubon, in the prologue, assures us, that Guevara's fiction succeeded so well with him, that that book was in great reputation all over the whole world, and translated into every language of Europe, as a most valuable treasure. This I take from Nicolas Antonio: he says, Vankelius's edition was made at Torgau in 1611; but he should have added that this edition of the year 1611 is the third. I rather think that it came out at Leipzig than at Torgau; for the translator opposes it to that of Torgau, which was the first (17), and which appeared in the year 1601. The second came out in 1606. Guevara's epistles have been translated into Italian and French. The Jesuit Schotus very justly laughs at those, who valued those two books in France. 'Nam Principum Horologium, says he, pag. 215. of his Bibliotheca Hispanica, 'seu de vita M. Aurelii Imperatoris, & Faustine Conjugis conficta sunt, non ex historiis petita: ne quis erret, ut in Gallia, ubi cupide nimis in sinu olim nobilium, manibusque gestatum fuisse memini; ut & Epistulas ejus nauci plenas & ineptiarum, Aurearum titulo transcribere non iidem dubitarunt (18): sed quas illi legant, per me licet, quibus meliora non suppetunt, aut capere non possunt. — For the Dial of Princes, or the life of M. Aurelius the Emperor, and his wife Faustina, is a meer fiction, not borrowed from history: that no one may be deceived, as in France, where I remember it was too much in request among the nobility; who made no scruple likewise of translating the same author's nauseous and trifling Epistles under the name of Golden: which those may read, for me, who have nothing better, or know no better.' And he says pag. 567. 'M Aurelii Antonini vita & Faustinae ejusdem Guevaræ, ridicula est & meræ nugæ; quam tamen Galli applausu magno exceperunt, sæpius verterunt, edideruntque, & nobiles plerique manibus gestant: sed quid mirum quibus Amadisius Gallicus, & Orlandus Furiosus, ceteraque ægrorum somnia placeant, quæ, qui sapiet, ne horas collocaet male, fugiet. — The life of M. Aurelius Antoninus, and Faustina, by the same Guevara, is ridiculous, and meer trifling; which yet the French received with great applause, often translated, and published; and which give a catalogue of his writings [G]. I have something to add to what I have said of his Dial of Princes [H], and I will shew, that, if the French are to blame for having highly valued such a book, the Spaniards, who have esteemed it still more, deserve more to be laughed at.

'most of the nobility are very fond of: but what wonder, since the same persons were pleased with Amadis of Gaul, Orlando Furioso, and such like sick mens dreams; which a man of sense will avoid, that he may not misemploy his time.'

[(a)] There has been two French translations of this book, published at about sixty years distance: the first of Bernard de la Grise, in 4to, in the Gothic letter, 1531, reprinted in 16mo, with a fine letter, by John de Tournes, Lyons 1550: the second of Nicolas de Herberay, Sieur des Essars, reprinted several times. To these two different translations, the last of which, by the by, is castrated of several chapters, alludes the scipius ceterunt of the Jesuit Schottus, REM. CRIT.]

[G] I shall give a catalogue of his writings. I have mentioned the most famous, which is intitled in Spanish, Relox de principes: à Marco Aurelio. It is thought the first edition is of the year 1529. It was followed by some others before the author published it himself. He complained, that it had been taken from him tho' imperfect, and made public without his knowledge. His letters were printed the first time in 1539; and since in several places, and at several times. His other works are, Prologo solenne, en que el autor toca muchas historias. Una decada de las vidas de los X. Cesares Emperadores Romanos desde Trajano à Alexandro. Del menos precio de la Corte y alabanza de la Aldea. Doctrina de privados, y doctrina de Cortesanos (19). De los inventores del marear y de muchos trabajos que se pasan en las Galeras (20). Monte Calvario, fove de mysteriis Dominica passionis ac de verbis Domini in Cruce pendenti (21). Oratorio de eligiosos y exercicio de virtuosos. He was about a history of Charles V, and it is said, he ordered by his will, that the pension of historiographer should be restored (22) to that emperor, which he had received, for one year, wherein he had bestowed no time upon that history. (23).

[H] I have something to add to what I have said of his Dial of Princes. He declares, that this work (24) was a translation of the life of Marcus Aurelius, and that the original had been sent to him from Florence (25). He confesses, that he had not confined himself to translate it word for word, and that he had added many things to it. He begun this work in the year 1518, and finished it in the year 1524: 'and tho' during those six years, says he (26), I kept my book secret, nevertheless it was divulged: for the emperor, being ill of an ague, sent for it, to pass away the time, and divert his distemper. Wherefore in obedience to his intention, I myself carried him Marcus Aurelius, without it's having been revised, corrected, or finished, humbly beseeching him, in recompence of my labour, that he would not suffer it to be transcribed, nor taken out of his royal apartment, otherwise his majesty would do me a great prejudice, because, in pursuing and finishing my undertaking, he would know, that my intention was not only to publish Marcus Aurelius, just as it was, but to add to it many sentences worthy of recommendation: notwithstanding this, it unfortunately happened, that the book was stolen, and afterwards copied by several hands, by which means it became every day more incorrect and faulty; for there was but one original to correct it by: it is true, some persons brought me some copies, to revise and correct them; but, if they could speak, they would complain more of those, who have copied them, than I of the thieves, who stole them; and, what is worse, about the time when my labour was near at an end, ready to disperse the fruit, Marcus Aurelius was printed at Sevil, and soon after in Portugal, and in the kingdom of Arragon, in such a manner, that, if the first edition was bad, the others were more so. Judge from hence, whether the Spaniards deserve less than the French the galleries of Andrew Schottus (27). Perhaps, he knew not, that there were Frenchmen, who despised the epistles of Guevara, of which, says Montagne (28), those who call them golden make a judgment very different from what I do. It must be owned, however, that they imposed upon a great many Frenchmen, and that the Dial of Princes met with very good success in France. It was printed there several times. I make use of an edition of Lyons, by Benoit Rigaud, 1592, in 12mo, and I see, in the title, that the work was translated out of Castilian into French by R. B. de Grise. Afterwards revised and corrected by N. de Herberay, lord des Essars, beyond the preceding editions. The epistle dedicatory to cardinal de Givri is not signed. I there find, that the lord des Essars died whilst he was translating this work. 'We have therefore, continues he, only the first book of his translation, in which we still find some loose sheets, in so poor a condition, that it is impossible to read them: for which reason the work has been continued from the old translation, after having been corrected, from the Spanish copy, of an infinite number of faults, and altered as to certain phrases, contrary to our language, which often obscure the sense of the author, and sometimes are entirely repugnant to his meaning.'

The Italians likewise have more than once translated this book. I have spoken of the version made by Mambri Rosco, and I add, that Fausto da Longiano gave another, which was printed in the year 1546, in 8vo. He added some things to it, which were not in the Spanish original, and he replaced those, which the other Italian translation had retrenched from the same original. He lays open, in his preface, the liberty Guevara gave himself of advancing facts which were not true. His criticism is good and learned. He promised a life of M. Aurelius, composed from the testimony of the ancient historians, in order to set in comparison with this, which the Spanish writer had forged. He represents himself as one, who applies himself to more serious studies, in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, than such as translating a Spanish book into Italian, and he gives us hopes of his Latin works.

GUICCIARDIN (FRANCIS), descended from one of the most noble and ancient families of Florence, and author of an history very much esteemed [A], and of some other works (a), was born in that town the sixth of March 1482. He was professor

(10) It was translated into French with this title, Revellematin des Courtisans, by Alexander Hardy, a Parisian. I make use of the second edition printed at Paris in 1623, in 8vo.

(a) See Remark [H].

(1) Bullart, Academi. des Sciences, Tom. 4, pag. 151, says, it begins with the entrance of the French into Italy in the year 1490, and ends with the pontificate of Paul III, in 1535. The French entered not into Italy before the year 1494.

(2) Made the 13th of Oct. 1534.

[A] He is author of an history very much esteemed. It contains, in twenty books, the transactions in Italy, from the year 1494, to the year 1532. I confine it within these bounds (1), because the author of his life will have it so; but I must observe, that the historian goes back as far as the state that Italy was in, in the year 1490, and ends with the death of Clement VII, and the election of Paul III (2). It is true, he is very short in his account of what passed in the last years of Clement VII, especially from the year 1530. This history has been translated out of Italian into several languages. Cælius Secundus Curio published it in Latin, at Basil, in 1566. One Jerome

Chomedei, a Parisian, published it in French at Paris in 1568. The English have it in their own language, as appears from the catalogue of the Bodleian library. The Spaniards, the Germans, and the Dutch, have also translated it into theirs (3). The best Italian edition is that, which is illustrated with the marginal notes of Thomas Porcacchi. The first edition of that nature is of Venice in 1573 (4). This history did not appear till after Guicciardin's death; and it was Agnolo Guicciardin his nephew, who published it. The Protestants took care to preserve the fragments, that were left out, because the court of Rome did not like them. They published them by themselves at several feffor of the civil-law, being twenty three years of age; but he rather chose to follow the law, than to teach it, as he had done before. He became a very famous advocate, inasmuch that he was thought fit to be employed in state-affairs. He was sent ambassador to the court of Ferdinand, king of Arragon, in January 1512. His embassy lasted two years, and proved very glorious to him; for, at his return to Florence, he met with a kind reception, and was very well approved. Some time after, he entered into the service of Leo X, who made him governor of Modena and Reggio. He defended Parma with great success, after the death of that Pope, and continued in the same governments under Hadrian VI, and Clement VII. Besides, he was made governor of Romagna, under Clement VII, and lieutenant of the army, and shewed, that he was as great a captain, as a good negotiator. He was governor of Bologna, when that Pope died, and took care that the enemies, he had gained by an exact observation of justice, should not take advantage of the Interregnum, to his prejudice. The new Pope bestowed that government upon another; whereupon Guicciardin returned to Florence, where he settled, till he died. He did great services to the house of Medicis, and would not accept the offers of Paul III, who desired to take him into his service. He had a wife, but no sons, and therefore he considered, that he could not be preferred to ecclesiastical benefices, nor procure any to his sons: besides, being afraid that he could not serve the Pope, without disobliging sometimes the duke of Florence, he rather chose to live a quiet life in his country-house, and to spend his time in writing the history he had undertaken. He was advanced very far in it, when he died of a malignant fever, in May 1540, being fifty five years of age. He desired to be buried without pomp, and without an epitaph or funeral oration (b). His history of Italy is very good. Many look upon him as an impartial historian, who flatters no body, and blames only what is to be blamed; but some are of opinion, that he shews too great a partiality against France [B], or that he

(5) They published several times (5). Heidegger, last of all, inserted, in his Historia Papatus (6), the fragment of the fourth book. Varillas affirms, that Guicciardin's heirs presumed to publish, against his intention, the four last books in the third edition. I shall enquire into the truth of it hereafter (7). Note, that Sansovino published an epitome of that history, and that Guicciardin designed, in imitation of Cæsar, to write some memoirs concerning the actions of his life; but James Nardi, whom he consulted about it, made him resolve to undertake a nobler work, viz. a history of his own times. He took him to be a man well qualified for such an undertaking, knowing, that neither fear nor hope would hinder him from discharging the duties of a faithful historian. Besides, had he confined himself to the history of his own life, he might have exposed himself to the envy of the Florentines.

Fin da lui dissiuaso, e' essortato a scriuere l'Historia de suoi tempi, si perche lo conuoleua d'ingegno, atto a condurre un'impresa così fatta a perfezzione; e perche anche sapeua molto bene, che egli era per descriver la pura verità, senza rispetto di paura, o speranza di premio, delle quali due corruttele par che sieno stati ne' tempi passati, e sieno ancor hoggi corrotti quasi tutti gli Scrittori; si ancora perche fuggisse l'invidia de' suoi Cittadini, e l'bisogno universale de l'haver voluto celebrare solamente se stesso (8).

[B] Some think, that he shews too great a partiality against France. I shall set down a long passage of Claudius du Verdier (9). 'Guicciardinus tam frigide invitique Gallorum victorias & gloriam narrat, quam accuratè lubensque, adversa quæque, quantumvis minima, à fortunæ potentissimo belli numine ejaculata: quemadmodum sarcinarum in alicujus fluminis traiectione submerfionem persequitur, atque dilatat. Dum videt Carolo VIII totam Italiam ab Alpibus ad Neapolim nemine penitus obfistente occupanti, victoriam absque suspitione falsi adimi non posse, in Gallorum quorundam militum internecione paucorumque, quâ sine victoria obtineri non potuit, totus est, magnam eam appellans stragem; Carolo tamen agri dominium superstitiisse diffiteri non ausus est. Sed quæ de victoribus strages fieri potuit? Si de suis sermonem instituit, eis semper plus meritis attribuit, & regionis laudes magis, quam suæ gentis res gestas persequitur, unde maxima laus ducenda est. Guicciardin relates as coldly, and as much against his will, the victories and glory of the French, as he does accurately, and readily, every the least unfortunate event, such as the loss of baggage in passing a river, on which he descants at large. Whilst he sees, that he cannot, without suspicion of falsehood, deny the success of Charles VIII in conquering all Italy, from the Alps to Naples, without any resistance, he dwells wholly on the putting to death of a few French soldiers, without which the victory could not have been obtained, calling it a great slaughter; at the same time not daring to deny, that Charles remained master of the field. But what slaughter could be made of conquerors? But, when he is to speak of his own party, he ever attributes more to them than they deserve, and rather expatiates in praise of the country, than relates the actions of his own countrymen, whence the greatest praise is to be fetched. If this censure be well grounded, Guicciardin made himself ridiculous, and as our gazetteers do. They afford sport every day; for, to give an instance of it, when the French are encamped beyond the Rhine, the gazetteer of the contrary party speaks of nothing but of their parties beaten, of the prisoners made upon them, and of their deserters. The Paris gazette says nothing of all this; but then the French gazetteer enlarges upon the losses of the allies, and the contributions they are forced to pay. When the Germans march into the territories of France, as they did in the autumn of the year 1694, the French gazetteer does not forget to take notice of their parties that are defeated, or obliged to surrender: he speaks of nothing else. On the contrary, the gazetteer of the allies, forgetting all those things, keeps a very exact account of all the villages plundered by the Germans, of all the magazines burnt, of all the French parties beaten, &c. There are a thousand unlucky reasons for using such a method in those daily writings (10); but an historian, who does the same, is wholly inexcusable. He ought to relate the losses and advantages of his party with the same exactness. Is there any that does it?

La Popeliniere is one of those, who tax Guicciardin with too great a partiality against France. 'He is a free and sincere writer, says he (11), exempt from passion, but not from hatred, which he could not conceal against the French, the duke of Urbino, and others. . . . nay, he could not forbear resenting the injury, which the Italians continually complain, in their words and writings, to have received from the French, when they disturbed the long and profound repose of Italy under the reign of Charles VIII. . . . though it be an improper subject for Guicciardin and most Italian authors to shew their animosity: and I cannot apprehend upon what grounds he says, that that king was a man of a monstrous shape.' La Popeliniere confutes this with many tedious words: he should have been contented with the following passage. 'If king Charles had been such a man, or any thing like it, let any body judge, whether the other Italians, as great enemies to the French as Guicciardin, (who has only men-he dwells too much upon inconsiderable things [C], or that he has inserted too many prolix harangues [D], or that he is too apt to ascribe actions to bad motives [E]. Cardinal Palavicini is not favourable to him: I will mention what he says of him [F]. As for Guicciardin's style, his most unjust censurers acknowledge, that it is very pure and exact; but they make a great difference between the first books, and the following, because they suppose, that the first five books were corrected by an able hand (c). Father Possévin blames him for ascribing to fate and fortune the success of wars, and the revolutions of states: he is willing to believe, that it does not proceed from an error of his mind, and that it is only an effect of custom; but he tioned the virtues he could not deny, without being taxed with lying) would not have stuffed their writings with it before and after him : but no man among christian nations did ever reflect upon that king in his life-time (12). Not to refer it to another time, I shall mention the other faults, for which that writer blames Guicciardin. They are the same that have been observed by others, as it will appear by the following remarks. ' I do not find, says he (13), any thing in him, for which he ought to be more valued than others, except his great freedom of speaking of great men, and his care to inquire into the causes and motives of several actions. But he is so prolix, and so full of harangues, and considerable things not worth mentioning, that, if some author had gone before him in boldly laying open the faults of eminent men, he would not have been much esteemed. But it is well known how much the minds of men are affected with a remarkable novelty : and yet he has done himself a great deal of injury by not keeping within due bounds, and by preferring the regard he had for his country, to the duty of an historian, and even of a Christian, and a man of honour, to whom such things ought to be indifferent.'

[C]. . . or that he dwells too much upon inconsiderable things.] It is Lippius's opinion (14). 'Vitia duo propria hujus ævi non effugit, quod & iusto longior est, & quod minutissima quæque narret, parum ex lege aut dignitate historiar, quæ, ut Ammianus, lib. 26. ait Discurrere per negotiorum celstuidines assueta, non humilium minutias indagare cau-rum. — He did not escape the two faults peculiar to this age: I mean, that he is too prolix, and too particular, contrary to the law and dignity of history, which, as Ammianus, book 26, says, is wont to dwell on the summit of affairs, not to descend into a minute recital of every little spring of action.'

[D] . . . or that he has inserted too many prolix barangues.] Besides what you will see in the passage out of Montaigne in the following remark, here are Lippius's words (15). 'Sed non orationes ejus satis "vegetæ mihi aut castigatæ, languent sæpe aut solutæ" vagantur. Denique, uno verbo, inter nostros summus est historicus: inter veteres, mediocris. — But his barangues appear to me to be incorrect, and sometimes spiritless and tedious: In a word, among the moderns, he is one of the best historians; among the ancients, but indifferent.'

[E] or that he is too apt to ascribe actions to bad motives. It is Montagne's opinion, who assumes a spirit of charity for mankind in that respect. Many others will not believe, that Guicciardin deserves to be censured upon that account : but let us see what Montagne says, both upon what concerns the text of this remark, and in general about the character of that famous historian. ' It is not at all likely, that he has misrepresented things out of hatred, love, or vanity ; and one may be convinced of it by the judgment he freely passes upon great men, and especially upon those, by whom he had been raised and employed, as Pope Clement VII. As for that part of his history, of which he seems to be most proud, viz. his digressions and discourses ; some of them are very good, and adorned with fine strokes ; but he is too fond of them. For, being willing to omit nothing, and having a very full, and, as it were, an infinite subject, he grows weak by it, and his history favours of scholastic prattling. I have also observed, that, among so many events and counsels, about which he gives his judgment, he never ascribes any to virtue, religion, and conscience, as if those things were wholly banished from the world : and he imputes all actions, tho' they appear never so fine, to a vicious principle, or self-interest. It is impossible to believe, that, among such a vast number of actions, none should have been produced by a reasonable motive. Men can never be so generally corrupt, but some will avoid the contagion:

which makes me afraid, that Guicciardin had a vicious taste, and perhaps he judg'd of others by himself (16).'

[F] I will mention what cardinal Palavicini says of him.] First, he taxes him with three fallacies, and then judges of him in general. The first fallacy concerns Hadrian VI. The cardinal pretends, that Guiciardini should not have said *, that, on the day of that Pope's election, no cardinal intended to raise him to the pontificate; and that those, who voted for him in the scrutiny, designed only to spend the time that morning (17). I omit the reasons alledged by the cardinal against it. The second fallacy concerns the elector of Saxony. Palavicini maintains, that it is not true, that Leo X published a threatening monitory against that prince, which did very much exasperate him. Due altre abbazj piu rilevanti prende egli nelle principal nostra materia. Il primo è l'asser-fermar che Leone spedisse contra l'Elettor di Sassonia un monitorio con minacce di gravi pene, e pero con irrita-tation di quel Principe. Il che è un vano sogno contrario à quanto si leggi nelle memorie pienuissime di que successi (18). The third fallacy concerns Luther, who, according to Guiciardini, was so frightened when he was put to the ban of the empire, that he would willingly have renounced his errors, had not cardinal Cajetan cast him into despair by his threatnings and injurious words, and had he made him honourable offers. Palavicini maintains, that cardinal Cajetan returned to Rome twenty months before Luther was put to the ban & c, and that he spoke to him very kindly. E pur è certo che il Cardinal di Gaeta non parlò are his words (20): ' Dal che m'auveggo, che quell' Historico, di ciò che non apparteneua al suo principal argomento, prese notizie molto confuse: e fu anche fempre inclinato a credere le peggiori, come appare nella sua spessa maledicenza di ciascheduno la quale appresso alla volgare malignità gli hà guadagnata estimazion di veridico. Ma contro a Pontefici fu anche più specialmente amaro, così per quell' usato rancore che i ministri di lungo servizio concepiscono contra i padroni da cui non ottennero le mercedi sperate; come forse perch'egli riconosceua da loro la perdita della libertà nella sua Repubblica. — This historian has a very confused notion of what does not immediately belong to his principal subject. Besides, he was inclined to believe the worst, as appears from his frequent slandering of every one; and which with the vulgar gained him the reputation of speaking the truth. But he was especially bitter against the Popes, through that usual disgust, which those who have long served, conceive against their patrons, from whom they do not obtain the expected reward; because, perhaps, they impute to them the loss of liberty in their republic.

fancies that such a thing spoils the readers (d). It does not clearly appear, whether he is more inclined to censure him, than to commend him [G]. Varillas charges him with calumny in what he says about Francis the first's intelligence with Soliman: I shall examine what that French historian observes upon it [H]. I shall likewise take notice of Bonifacio Vannozi's a little too devout complaints [I], and shall not forget that the Venetians complain of a Speech, which Guicciardin ascribes to the ambassador, whom

[G] It is not easy to know whether he is more inclined to censure, than commend him. He (21) says, Guicciardin was a man of great judgment and experience in public affairs: he mentions the good opinion Thomas Porcia had of his history (22); but he says also, that John Baptist Leone published (23) five books of considerations upon that work, to shew the falsities and partiality of the author. That book, says he, is in every body's hands, and therefore I need not dwell upon it. For the rest, he informs us, that Clement VIII had lately caused the Latin translation of Guicciardin, made by the heretic Caelius Velcurio, to be put into the index (24). He pretends, that the true reason of it was, because the translator had not rightly explained the original (25); but such a reason ought not to be minded, as we shall see hereafter from what Vannozi says. Had Poffevin intended to inspire his readers with a great esteem for Guicciardin's history, he would have been as careful to mention Remigius, as John Baptist Leone. This Remigius, a Florentine monk, is the author of a book printed at Venice in 1582, with this title, Considerationi civili sopra l'Historie di M. Fr. Guicciardini, e d'altri historici.

The nephews of the author dedicated it to the same Cosmo de Medici, duke of Florence, to whom they had dedicated the sixteen books. Agnolo Guicciardini signed for them all the epistle dedicatory dated from Florence the twentieth of July, 1564. The Pope, the doge of Venice, and the duke of Florence, granted licences to Giolito the bookfeller, which were prefixed to that work. And doubtless this was the reason why the bookfeller, Bevilacqua, did not insert those four books in the edition of the first sixteen.

These same four last books were printed at Parma appresso Setb Viatti in the year 1567, in 4to, con l'aggiunta de' Sommarii di ciascun Libro, & di molte Annotationi in margine delle cose più notabili, DI MARCO PAPIRIO PICEDI.

[I] I will mention the devout complaints of Bonifacio Vannozi. His history, says he (32), is more acceptable to private persons than to princes; for he speaks of the latter without any reserve, and reflects so much upon the Pope, that his book translated into Latin has been greedily read in heretical countries. From whence it appears, continues he, that the Italian writers may do a great deal of prejudice to the Papacy. Vannozi pretends, they ought not to discover their mother's nakedness; and that, if they publish a disgraceful truth, they offend against charity; and if they publish falsities, they offend against justice. This is in general the meaning of what he says; but I shall set down his own words, for the satisfaction of those, who may be desirous to know more particularly how he expresses himself. 'Si che vegga un pò chi scrive, con quanta facilità egli possa pregiudicare alla Chiesa Romana; alla Sedia Apostolica, & al Sommo Pontefice: & che le penne de' gl' Italiani, professanti il Christiano, ò scoprono le nostre vergogne, se dicono il vero, che è contro alla carità, dovuta al prossimo; ò calunniando per odio, ò per altra passione, chi merita esser onorato; facciano da maligno, & da trillo (33).' He owns, that Guicciardin's history does not give so great a scandal, since it has been corrected; but he maintains, that the Latin translation made from the first original (34) may offend the devil himself. 'Ma la fatta Latina, cavata dal primo originale, & piena di male-dicenze contro à Papi, & altri Ecclesiastici, può scandalizzare il Diavolo stesso; parlo di quel ch'io sò di propria scienza, & come si dice di veduta. Et un moderno Scrittore, parlando di questa Storia, dice così per l'appunto. Il Guicciardini ha potuto per se stesso, acquistar tanto d'autorità all' Istoria sua, che molte indegnità, molti errori, & molte bugie, ch'ella contiene, sono state non solo sopprimate dal Mondo; ma approvate da molti, per esempi, & per dogmi del vero, & perfetto viver civile. Et lasciando il resto, si legge pur in esso, un'aperta, & fastidiosa irreverenza, dice il medesimo moderno Scrittore, verso gli stessi Vicari di Christo, con grande indegnità della Sedia Apostolica, & non potendosi accusarlo d'ignoranza, bisogna necessariamente confessarlo, per troppo appassionato, & commiserare più tosto, che biasmare una così bella, ma così disetosa, fatica (35). — But the Latin translation, made from the first original, and full of calumnies against the Pope, and other ecclesiastics, may scandalize the devil himself: I speak by experience, and, as it were, by sight. And a modern writer, speaking of this history, expresses himself thus: Guicciardin so established the credit of his history, that the many meanesses, the many errors, and the many lies, which it contains, have been not only born with in the world, but approved by many, as examples of true and perfect civil life. And omitting the rest, let any one read only the bare-faced and contemptuous irreverence in him (says the same modern writer) towards the very vicars of CHRIST, and as he cannot be accused of ignorance, we must confess, that he is too passionate an author, and pity, rather than blame, so fine, but defective, a work.' This long passage is not needless in this place, since it belongs to the history of the several judgments passed upon Guicciardin.

whom they sent to the imperial court [K]. Besides this, he wrote some other books [L]. LEWIS GUICCIARDIN his nephew signalized himself in the common-wealth of learning [M].

[K] The Venetians complained of a speech, which Guicciardin ascribes to their ambassador. Nothing can be more humble than that speech. That historian supposes it was made by Antonio Justiniani to the emperor Maximilian, in the year 1509. Per ottenere da lui con qualunque condizione la pace gli mandarono con somma celerità Ambasciatore Antonio Giustiniano: il quale amesso in pubblica audientia al cospetto di Cesare; parlò miserabilmente con grandissima sommissione (36). Not contented with this general notion of the too great humility of the Venetians; he adds, that it is not improper to set down the whole speech, that the reader may see how great was their consternation. Accordingly he sets down the whole discourse of the ambassador, without any alteration; only he translates it out of Latin into Italian. Non mi pare alieno dal nostro proposito, acciò meglio s'intenda in quanta consternatione d'animo fusse ridotta quella Repub. la quale già più di dugento anni, non haveva sentito avversità pari a questa, inferire la propria oratione havuta da lui innanzi a Cesare, trasferendo solamente le parole Latine in voci volgari, le quali furono in questo tenore (37). The Venetians maintain, that it is a chimerical speech, and, in order to prove it, they say, that Francis Capello (38), whom they sent to the emperor, after they had retaken Padua, could not so much as obtain leave to go into the territories of that prince; and that Lewis Mocenigo and Antony Justiniani, whom they sent to him some time after, were neither admitted, nor heard, no more than Francis Capello. What is certain, is, that those ambassadors were ordered to make very advantageous offers to his imperial majesty. The historian of Venice, whom I have quoted, does not deny it. Peter Bembo, another Venetian historian, confesses it still more expressly. Latum, says he (39), ut Antonius Justinianus . . . ad Maximilianum recta contenderet; & cum illo, si posset, pacem quantumvis duris conditionibus faceret: Tergestine oppidum, & Portum Naonis, reliquaque municipia, quæ resp. ex ejus ditione superiore anno ceperat, Senatui ei paratum esse restituere: ac quæ oppida ex Romanorum imperatorum ditione in Carnis, & Gallia, & Venetia resp. possideret, ea se omnia illi tanquam accepta relaturum nuntiaret. — It was decreed, that Antony Justiniani . . . should go directly to Maximilian, and make peace with him, if possible, upon any conditions, how hard soever; and inform him that the senate was ready to restore the city of Tergeste, the harbour of Naon, and the other towns, which the republic had taken from him the year before, and to deliver up to him the imperial towns, which she possessed in Carinthia, France, and the territories of Venice. Take notice, that he affirms, that Antonio Justiniani was sent to the emperor, as soon as the Venetians heard of the victory obtained by the French. Perhaps Guicciardin saw a copy of the speech, which Justiniani had prepared. This cannot justify him; for if it be true, that the ambassador had no audience, his copy could not be produced as a discourse actually made before the emperor. The historians were very bold as to the speeches mentioned by them; they forged them, and yet they would have the world to believe, that they had been actually delivered. Read, in Jovius, the speech spoken by the ambassador of the duke of Milan to Charles VIII., to persuade him to make an expedition into Italy: read it also in Guicciardin, and you will find that those two pieces are not alike (40). The discourse, which the doge Loredano made to the senate, in order to send 200 noble Venetians to the defence of Padua, is mentioned by Guicciardin quite otherwise than it is by Mocenigo and Justiniani, historians of Venice (41).

[L] Guicciardin wrote some other books. I reduce them to two; one of which is intitled, Consigli aurei, and the other, Avvertimenti Politici. Ghilini mentions only those two books (42). There are some other books ascribed to Guicciardin in the catalogue of the Bodleian library, viz. Piu Consigli e Avvertimenti in materia di re publica e di privata, printed at Paris in 1576, in 4to. I Precetti e Sententie in materia di Stato, printed at Antwerp in 1585, in 4to. Avvertimenti Politici, printed at Venice in 1583, in 4to. Hypomneses Politicæ. These are the titles we find in the Bodleian catalogue, without being told they are only different editions of the same books. The booksellers occasion this confusion by the liberty they take to put different titles to one and the same book. Some will be apt to think, that Guicciardin published the rules of poetry, because the catalogue of the Bodleian library ascribes to him Hypomneses Politicæ. But it is a fault of impression; it should be Hypomneses Politicæ; for so the Latin translator of Guicciardin's Avvertimenti Politici intitled his translation. These works of Guicciardin, translated into French by Charles de Chantecler (43), were printed at Paris in 1577, in 8vo, with this title, Plusieurs Avis & Conseils tant pour les affaires d'estat que prieres. There is a great mistake in the catalogue of Thuanus's library. Two books, written by Lewis Guicciardin, are ascribed there (44) to Francis Guicciardin his uncle; one of them is intitled, Raccolta de i detti & fatti notabili così gravi come piacevoli; and the other, Hore di Recreationi. That mistake implies an absurdity; for Guicciardin the uncle was so far from being a facetious man, that he never used any jest. He was extremely grave and severe. Fuit indignationi proclivior, orisque ductu licet suavi, tamen severo & gravi genioque supra modum falsæ urbanitatis dictis repugnante, quorum nullum in tota vita ipsi unquam excidisse perhibent quidam (45). An Italian history, Urbis Haliæ, is ascribed to him in the epitome of Gesner's Bibliothèque.

[M] LEWIS GUICCIARDIN his nephew signalized himself in the common-wealth of learning. Besides the two books I have just now mentioned, he published Commentarii delle cose più memorabili seguite in Europa, specialmente in questi Paesi bassi dalla pace di Cambray del M. D. XXIX infino a tutto l'Anno M. D. L. I have the edition printed at Venice, appresso Domenico Farri 1566 in 4to. The author dedicates that book to the grand duke of Florence: his epistle dedicatory is dated at Antwerp, the first of January 1565. That history was translated into Latin (46), and followed soon after by the Descrizione di tutti i Paesi bassi, altrimenti detti Germania inferiore. That description of the Netherlands is a very good book: the author was a long time in that country, and took great pains to be informed of every thing, and visited the places as much as he could, in order to say nothing but what he was sure of. He published three editions of that book; the last is of the year 1587, and exceeds the second, as much as the second exceeds the first. That book was translated into French by Belleforest, and into Latin by John Brant, a senator of Antwerp, and by Regnier Vitellius. Brant's translation was never printed; the author suppressed it, being prevented by others (47). Ghilini knew something of it: but his account is strangely confused. These are his words: Reynero Vitellio, e avanti di lui Giovanni Branzo Senatore di Anversa, che dal Vitellio fu prevenuto la traduzione dal Francese nel Latino (48). These words are very faulty: first, they signify, that Brant's translation was published; for when an author mentions a book, without saying, that it was never printed, he gives us to understand that it was made public. This falsity is attended with a strange piece of nonsense. Ghilini says, that Brant translated that book before Vitellius, and was prevented by Vitellius: these things are inconsistent, when an author forgets, as Ghilini does, to distinguish the composition from the impression. Nay, it is to be observed, that Valerius Andreas does not say, that John Brant made a translation of that book before Vitellius did the same: he only says, that he was prevented as to the impression (49). Lastly, it is not true, that Vitellius and Brant translated that book from the French translation. Vitellius says in the title page of his version (50), that he made it from the Italian; and Valerius Andreas affirms the same with respect to Brant. I have quoted his words. Ghilini committed all those faults, because he blindly followed Swerterius (51). Poccantio (52) says, that Guicciardin understood Greek and Latin, and mathematics, and was a good antiquarian. Thuanus does very much commend the description of the Low-Countries, and mentions a remarkable thing, viz. that the duke of Alva caused Lewis Guicciardin to be imprisoned, for writing a book, containing the reasons why Lent should be suppressed. Which shews the fierceness and the enormous pride of that duke; for Guicciardin wrote that book by his order; but, but, because he himself did not give his copy to the duke, and that haughty Spaniard received it from the hands of a third person, he fell into a violent passion against the author, and caused him to be shamefully imprisoned. GUICHENON (SAMUEL), advocate at Bourg in Bresse, deserves an illustrious place among the historiographers of the XVIIth century. He was born at Mâcon. He published the history of Bresse, in 1650, and then he set about the Genealogical History of the house of Savoy, and had it printed at Lyons in the year 1660, in two large folios. He published, in the same year, a Latin book, intitled, Bibliotheca Sebustiana [A]. Those three works are very good in their kind, and made him worthy of the rewards bestowed upon him (a). Le Laboureur owns it, but in such a manner, as seems to reflect upon the court of France for their ingratitude towards their historiographers [B]. He had been a Protestant, and he died a Roman Catholic, the eighth of September, 1664. He has been taxed with plagiarism [C].

I have been accused of believing, without any grounds, that he had been an Huguenot. A confutation of this censure appeared in the Memoires de Trevoux, for January 1703 (b); but I am going to say something stronger than all that: I shall cite a minister, who has publicly upbraided Guichenon with abjuring the reformed religion. He makes use of very harsh expressions [D]; whence we may gather that he was well assured of the truth of what he advances.

(a) His titles run thus, Lord of Palenstuyt, Counsellor and Historiographer to the King and his Royal Highness, Count Palatine, Knight of the Empire, and of the Sacred Order of St Maurice and St Lazarus.

Guichenon, Dominus de Painesstuyt, Regi à Consiliis, Franciæ, Sabaudia, & Dombarum Historiographus, Eques auratus & Comes Palatinus, Sacræ Religionis S. S. Mauritii & Lazari miles.*

[B] Mr le Laboureur . . . seems to reflect upon the court of France, for their ingratitude towards their historiographers. These are le Laboureur's words. 'Whilst the (1) enlarges their dominions by her victories, she takes care to have the genealogical history of the dukes of Savoy written by the Sieur Guichenon. The name of the author is sufficient to shew, that she has made a good choice, and to give a good opinion of that work, which is now (2) in the press. M. Guichenon has already illustrated Bresse with an excellent collection of the antiquities of that country, and with the history of its ancient lords and nobility. If that prince was not the daughter of the great Henry IV, I should be ashamed for our nation, to say, that she made it appear to him, by the honours he received from her, whilst he was about that work, that the affection of sovereigns is not suited to the extent of their dominions; and that the character of historiographer of Savoy is now the most glorious and happy in the world (3).

[C] He has been taxed with plagiarism. That accusation is contained in these words of Varillas. 'I speak, in the eleventh book, of the pretensions of the duke of Savoy, and of the bishop of Geneva, to the town of that name; and I confess Mr Guichenon's history has been of good use to me. Not but that I find this author too much addicted to the house of Savoy, to which he was born a subject; but, because that inclination did not prevent his reading all the printed books and manuscripts relating to his work, I have found some fragments in it, which I had not seen before. However, I am obliged out of sincerity, to take notice of one of his faults, which seems to me so gross, that I wonder no body has reproved him for it. He finds fault with William Paradin in his preface, for having taken the greatest part of his history of Savoy from the ancient chronicle of that house, and from the history of Jerome Champier, without ever quoting either of them; and yet I have found out that Guichenon is guilty of the same ingratitude. Nani's history is well known, and it is acknowledged, that few historians of our age come near him in politeness and subtilty. Any one, who compares it with Guichenon's account of the last dukes of Savoy, will find, that he inserted it word for word, in his last volume, without mentioning the historian he transcribed (4).

[D] A minister . . . has publicly reproached Guichenon with having abjured the reformed religion. He makes use of very harsh expressions. Consider only the parenthesis of the passage I am going to copy. 'Guichenon . . . has just published a large history in three great volumes in folio, in which he evidently falsifies, against his knowledge and conscience, all that relates to the right, the innocence, and the conduct of these Vaudois, both in general and in particular; and he is not ashamed to employ his mercenary pen in giving the lie, both to the truth of the massacres of the year 1665, and to whatever may tend to the justification of those good Christians, and in representing the cruelty and perfidy of their enemies as acts of great forbearance and mildness (WHICH I THINK NO STRANGE THING IN A RENEGADE, WHO HAS APOSTATISED FROM THE KNOWN TRUTH, AND GONE OVER TO THE INTERESTS OF LYING) (5). This is what John Leger, minister and moderator of the churches of the Valleys has observed in his preface. Let us see what he says in the body of the book, when he endeavours to justify his uncle Antony Leger, whom Guichenon represents as a factious spirit, and capable of diverse crimes. 'I might confute this Guichenon, only by saying, that he was himself born and bred up in the reformed religion, and that he went through part of his studies with the abovementioned Leger, whose constant companion he was, as I learned from the said Leger's own mouth, but that afterwards, in order to arrive at the honours he now enjoys, he turned his coat, and denied the known truth, to embrace the mass, taking for his device the Italian proverb, Guelfo io fui, e Gibbelin m'appello, à chi più mi darà volterò il mantello. For no one doubts, that he, who sells his soul for bread, and his birth-right for a mess of pottage, can let out his tongue and pen to say and write, as those, who hire him, direct. And I am positive, that he did not dare to set down one line in his book, which had not been sifted and re-sifted at Turin, and that he could not refuse to insert in it all the answers of the oracles of the marquis de Pianello, and of the president Truquis (6): and I have by me proofs of it (7).

He refutes him, in another place (8), in relation to two facts, and observes again, that he is one, who has betrayed religion, and renounced the known truth for worldly advantages.

GUIGNARD (JOHN), a Jesuit, native of Chartres (a), and professor of divinity in the college of Clermont (b), was executed at Paris, the seventh of January 1595, for high-treason. He was convicted of having written a book full of rebellion and rage against Henry III and Henry IV [A]: and, as the circumstances of the time required, that a doctrine, which had not long before exposed the life of the king to the wicked attempt of John Chastel, should be punished with the utmost severity, it was not thought proper to shew any favour to this Jesuit. He obstinately refused to make the amende honorable; and he persisted to his death in not acknowledging Henry IV for king of France [B]. He has been extolled as a martyr by the apologist of John Chastel [C]. We shall see what the Jesuits answered, when they were reproached with

[A] He was convicted of having written a book full of rebellion and rage against Henry III and Henry IV. This is the way how they came to know it. Whilst the parliament was carrying on the process against John Chastel, some of them, deputed for that purpose, went to the college of Clermont, and seized on several papers, among which was found a book written in Guignard the Jesuit's own hand, containing several propositions and means to prove, that it was lawful to kill the king, with several inductions for the murder likewise of his successor. Here are some of them extracted from the said book, which are yet extant in the rolls of the court (1). The author of the Anti-Coton afterwards produces some extracts of that book; but, as Victor Cayet has given them more at large, I choose to make use of his narrative upon this occasion. As to Guignard, he could not deny, that he wrote the nine following propositions, to wit,

I. That in the year 1572, on St Bartholomew's-day, if they had bled the royal vein, we should not have fallen out of the frying-pan into the fire, as we experience: But quicquid delirant Reges; by being sparing of blood, they have involved France in fire and blood, et in caput reciderunt mala.

II. That the cruel Nero was slain by a Clement, and the pretended monk dispatched by the hand of a true monk.

III. Shall we call a Nero Sardanapalus of France, a Fox of Bearn, a Lyon of Portugal, a She-wolf of England, a Griffin of Sweden, and a Hog of Saxony.

IV. Think that he saw in vain three kings, if kings they may be called, the late tyrant, he of Bearn, and this pretended monarch of Portugal D. Antonio.

V. That the finest anagram, that ever was, on the name of the deceased tyrant, was that, by which it was said, O the base Herod.

VI. That the heroic action performed by James Clement, as a gift of the HOLY GHOST, so called by our divines, has been justly extolled by the late prior of the Jacobins, Burgoign, confessor and martyr, by several reasons, as well at Paris, where I was an ear-witness of them, when he taught the book of Judith, as before that fine parliament of Tours: and this the said Burgoign, which is more, sealed with his own blood, and consecrated by his death; and we must not believe what the enemies report, that with his last breath he disapproved this action as detestable.

VII. That the crown of France might and ought to be transferred to another family than that of Bourbon.

VIII. That he of Bearn, though he were converted to the Catholic faith, would be treated more mildly than he deserved, if he were presented with a monkish crown in some well-reformed convent, there to do penance for the many evils he has done to France, and to thank God for giving him the grace to know himself before death.

IX. That if he cannot be deposed without war, let war be made on him: that if war cannot be made on him, let him be assassinated (2).

[B] He obstinately refused to make the amende honorable, and persisted to his death in not acknowledging Henry IV for king of France. Let us give the sequel of Cayet's narrative. The parliament having seen these writings, Guignard the author, being interrogated concerning them, acknowledged that he had composed and written them with his own hand; and for that he was condemned by the court to make the amende honorable, naked to his shirt, with a rope about his neck, before the principal gate of the church of Paris, and there, being on his knees, and holding a lighted torch of wax, of the weight of two pounds, in his hands, to say and declare, that wickedly, traitorously, and against the truth, he had written that the late king was justly killed by James Clement, and that, if the reigning did not die in war, he ought to be assassinated: of which he repented, and asked pardon of God, the king, and justice. This done, to be led and conducted to the Greve, to be hanged and strangled on a gibbet to be there erected for that purpose, and afterwards his dead body to be burnt to ashes in a fire, which should be made at the foot of the said gibbet. This decree was put in execution the seventh of January, and the said Guignard was hanged and burnt at the Greve. As they were conducting him before the church of Notre Dame, there to make the amende honorable, being naked to his shirt, and having the torch in his hand, he asked the Sieur Rapin, lieutenant of the short robe, what he must do: he told him, that he must ask pardon of God and the king, repeating what the register should say to him. I will ask God's pardon, said he, with all my heart; but why the king's? You have offended him, said Rapin to him, in that you have written against him: Guignard replied; what I wrote thereupon was before Paris submitted to him. What you say, is not true, said Rapin to him, and, though it were, you have no right to the pardon and general indemnity, granted by the king to his subjects of Paris after their submission, since you were not ignorant, that it was strictly commanded to burn such writings, on pain of death: by keeping them contrary to these decrees, you have therefore offended both him and the public. After disputing the matter above a quarter of an hour, notwithstanding all the reasons and menaces of the said Sieur Rapin, Guignard refused to make the amende honorable, and was carried to execution without making it (3).

It is plain, that in saying he had not offended the king, he supposed that Henry IV was not king. We are going to see, that he is commended for entertaining this opinion, and for never renouncing it.

[C] He has been extolled as a martyr by the apologist of John Chastel. The tenth chapter of the fifth part of the apology of that villain is intitled The martyrdom of Father Guignard justified in every point. The author declares him happy in dying as one, who kept himself unshaken on the basis and strength of the gospel alone. That is to say, of the obedience, and for the obedience of the church (4). The constancy of this person †, to his last breath, (adds he (5), in refusing to acknowledge for king, him whom the church has condemned, and for lawful judges, those who are separated from the church, and judge contrary to the church: and refusing to repeat the clauses and words, prescribed by the Arrêt, to make the amende honorable: and insisting upon the truth, both of what he had preached, and of what he had laid down in his memoirs (for which reason his execution was hastened, and on the spot, and in his shirt, without carrying him back to prison), all which entirely justifies the martyrdom, having no other foundation than the pure Catholic truth, maintained to death inclusively, the contrary of which is heresy: this will serve as a witness, to make out their process one day, to chain them hand and foot, to pronounce their sentence, and to condemn them definitively, and by an irrevocable judgment, as this glory is to all his saints †. When he, who guards the eternal truth †, who keeps the books of the eternal register, in which every thing is written, shall render judgment to those, who suffer injury *.

[D] We shall see what the Jesuits answered, when they were reproached with giving him a place in their martyrology. Let us begin with quoting a passage of the Anti-Coton (6): 'The reader may ask, if he pleases, if there ever was a Jesuit, who has condemned this Guignard of treason and perfidy. On the contrary, Richeome, in his apology, excuses him as much as he can; saying, that Guignard treated the abovementioned propositions, by way of a dispute in divinity. And in this we agree; for thus, I say, that to kill the king, has always been one of the resolutions of the divinity of the Jesuits. If any Jesuit, half thro' force, and half thro' shame, condemns him, it is for not having been discreet enough, or for having taken a wrong time, or for some such reason. This appears by the Jesuits having put Guignard in the catalogue of their martyrs, which they published at Rome, in two forms, in one of which Guignard is, in the other not, that there might be copies, which might be sold in France without danger. Thus the Jesuit Bonarscius, in the eighth chapter of his Amphitheatre, extols Guignard to the skies, tho' without naming him, for fear of offending our king, always plainly enough, that we may discover him in these words: shall I say nothing of you, O! bright star of heaven and earth, and last expiation of the boue, which after this ought to suffer nothing more? no time shall erase the memory of your death: then he adds, all France will join in my wishes ++.

(7) Réponse Apolog. à l'Anti-Coton, pag. 42.

(8) Ibid. pag. 43.

This can only agree with Guignard, who was a French Jesuit, and who was the last Jesuit, that suffered punishment in France. Father Coton replied, among other things (7), that no Jesuit had disapproved the judgment of the court, and that every one of them had endeavoured to persuade himself, that Guignard had been justly condemned; that all that is added to it is not equally certain, and that many things must be imputed to licentious tongues, and the injustice of the time (8); that if no Jesuit has condemned Guignard of treason and perfidy, it is because none of them are thoroughly acquainted with the process. I have seen (continues he) several catalogues of Jesuit martyrs, but not one in which is Guignard; and yet I have seen some printed at Rome. And, if he appear as such in prints made elsewhere, who knows not the liberty, which painters and poets give themselves? He denies that the passage of Bonarscius relates to Guignard; but it is to deny an almost indisputable fact. Another apology was not so peremptory; he was contented to evade the question. Thus he replied to the author of the Anti-Coton: 'You are angry, that Clarus Bonarscius, in his Amphitheatre, praises this father, and that he calls him a shining star in heaven, how do you know, that he speaks of this father, since he does not name him? Do you guess so, because he was the last that was executed in France; he is likewise the first. But, supposing your conjecture to be right, why are you angry, that he extols this father as a saint (9)? . . . Now accuse, and complain of Clarus as much as you will, you will not hinder me from commending him for this praise, and from praising, with him, this father, because he was a great divine and did honour to France, his country which you dishonour; and I believe, with the same Clarus, that he is in heaven, if not in the list of martyrs, at least in the number of the saints: not because he was condemned to death, but for having forsaken the vanity of the world to serve God and the public in religion, to the utmost of his abilities: for having lived as a true Religious many years; for having taught the catholic faith, and opposed heresy which you defend under the cover of the state; lastly, for having patiently suffered all the torments of death, and the shame of punishment, and given up his soul as a good and firm Catholic (10). He had expressed himself as follows, p. 181. 'You take exceptions at our placing the said father in the list of martyrs: who told you so, except the spirit of lying, which directs your pen? for, among the many thousand persons of credit, who have read this catalogue, not one has found what you pretend to discover in it: if you have not seen this catalogue, which is most probable, why do you speak so positively of a thing unknown to you? have you so little regard for your honour to take all false reports for truth, and to give them as matters of fact, and become the subject of contempt and laughter thinking to prejudice the Jesuits? The Jesuit Eudemon Johannes, replying to the Anti-Coton, denies, that Guignard was placed in the martyrology of the Jesuits, and observes that the prints of their martyrs were made and sold by persons, who only aimed at profit, and who had no dependence on the Jesuits (11). Verebaris nimirum, ne prolatis Martyrum nostrorum Catalogis, impudentissimi mendacii convinceretur, quod te causa impulit, ut frigidam hanc Catalogorum varietatem dignam plane stupore istius animi somnariis. Nam neque mendacium regis, & vecordiam tuam prodixit: Martyrum enim nostrorum effigies non à nobis, sed ab exteris lucris sui causa typis excusæ, venales per orbem passim exposcæ ab iis sunt, ut in nostra potestate nullo modo fuerit quis Martyrum Catalogus, aut à Gallis emeretur, aut in Galliam ab emptoribus importaretur. Neque vero ita stolidos quicquam Jesuitas existimaturus est, ut cum rem eam aggrederentur, non viderent fieri non posse, ne Guignardus quoque cum cæteris martyribus vel ab amicis, vel ab inimicis in Galliam mitteretur. Mirum vero est, si cum utriusque generis Catalogi venderentur, non nisi unus in Galliam, isque ad tuas unius manus venerit, in quo Guignardus légeretur, quem si apud te habes, profer lodes, si non habes indica, apud quem inveniri possit. Nam nos quidem Romæ nunquam Guignardum adscriptum Societatis Martyribus vidimus: nunquam in Martyres retulimus. — No doubt, you were afraid, if we produced the catalogue of our martyrs, of being caught in a lie, which put you upon inventing this nonsensical variety of catalogues. For you betray both the lie, and your own folly. For the prints of our martyrs, engraved, not by our selves, but by foreigners, for the sake of gain, are sold by them all over the world, so that it is not in our power what catalogue of martyrs shall be bought by Frenchmen, or imported into France by the buyers. Nor would any one think the Jesuits such fools, as to think they can prevent Guignard being sent, with the rest of the martyrs into France, either by friends, or enemies. And it is strange, that, when catalogues of both kinds are sold, but one should come into France, and that into your hands, in which Guignard appears; which if you have, pray, produce it; if not, tell us where we may find it. For we at Rome never saw Guignard in the list of martyrs of the Society nor ever put him there.

[E] They endeavoured to extenuate the outrageousness of his tenets. See in the remark [A] the doctrine of Guignard. It is abominable. In 1602, a little book was published, intitled The free and true address to the King, on the re-establishment of the Jesuits, desired of him. We find in it, among other things, that, if the Pope can lay his hand on the SCEPTRE, and temporalities of kings, as the Jesuits affirm, it remains without difficulty, that, when his holiness communicates a king, he is ipso facto deprived, he becomes a private person, and is no longer a king; and if he continues resolved to reign, he is a tyrant. Whoever allows the first proposition, must grant the latter. Now the book, written by John Guignard the Jesuit, and which he acknowledged in full parliament, the two chambers being assembled, contained these two propositions outrageously written: for among other things there was, that the Nero, &c. . . . THAT IF HE OF BEARNE COULD NOT BE DEPOSED WITHOUT WAR, WAR MUST BE WAGED: THAT IF WAR CANNOT BE WAGED, HE MUST BE ASSASSINATED. Your majesty may see the original; this well deserves it (12). The Jesuits replied, by the pen of Richeome, as follows (13). Sire, I will not here accuse any one, nor plead for this deceased, he is out of the reach of an earthly tribunal, nor call for vengeance, more than he does, whom I believe to be praying in heaven for his enemies. I only say, that your majesty has pardoned

- pardoned whatever passed of this kind, and that prudently and royally, in imitation of the emperor Octavian ††, who ordered all instruments concerning debts, which occasioned calumnies and quarrels, to be burned; and of the emperor Constantine the Great †† who likewise condemned to the flames contentious libels. And certainly, if it had been necessary to make enquiry after all those of the League, who had written and spoken, there would have been no end of the troubles and enmities: and there were at that time a thousand and a thousand Frenchmen who had by them worse writings, than that which this person here counterfeits and produces, who nevertheless have continued your very faithful servants and subjects: why then does he alledge this writing against the law of Oblivion, and against one deceased. If he had been guilty of a punishable fault, has it not been sufficiently expiated by the punishment of death? ought the process to be revived, and sentence again passed, on one, who has been executed eight years since? I say farther, that this piece  was not written by that divine, but is an invention of his adversary. Observe well, that they pretended, that the writing of John Guignard was not such as their adversaries would have it to be. The observations of Richeome (14), to prove this, are the weakest imaginable; but if Henry IV, on this plea of falsification, did not demand to see the original, and if he did not give order, that the enemies of the Jesuits should prove incontestably, that the propositions, which they attributed to Guignard, were really in his book, he was guilty of extreme negligence, or of a piece of policy, which might pass for fear. However it be, the author of the Anti-Coton, who knew, without doubt, that the Jesuits had stiffly denied what was given out concerning the manuscript of their brother, continued to object to them the same propositions, as the free and true address, and to say, that they were extracted out of Guignard's manuscript, which was still extant in the rolls of the court (15). He was answered, that what he said was one of those things, which must be ascribed to licentious tongues, and the injury of the times, and that it was denied, that the words, if war cannot be waged, he must be assassinated, are to be found in the court rolls, in which words nevertheless lies the sting of the scorpion (16). These words, replied another to him (17), contain the poison of your calumny; but they are mere words and lies; for nothing of them appears in the Register. These answers are pitiful; for the author of the Anti-Coton had not said, that these words were found in the register of the parliament, but in the manuscript, which was preserved in the rolls. Therefore, to give any thing of a solid answer they should have maintained to him, that they were not in this manuscript. But this is what the Jesuits, who have refuted the Anti-Coton, never ventured to maintain, and thus, we may very justly believe, that this proposition is in the writing of Father Guignard. Several reasons convince me of it.
- I. In the first place, the Arrêt of parliament expresses (18), that, considering 'the criminal process . . . made against John Guignard . . . for having been found possessed of several books, containing, among other things, approbations of the most cruel and inhuman parricide of the late king, whom God absolve, AND INDUCTIONS FOR THE MURDER OF THE KING NOW REIGNING. . . The court has declared and does declare the said Guignard attainted and convicted of high-treason, and of having composed and written the said books, containing several false and seditious means to prove, that it was lawful to commit the said parricide, AND THAT IT WAS RIGHT TO KILL KING HENRY IV, NOW REIGNING. There is no doubt, but that the words of the Arrêt, which are here in capitals, are grounded on those, which, according to the author of the Anti-Coton, were contained in Guignard's book.
- II. Besides this, who can doubt, that Thuanus, president of the parliament of Paris, had read this Jesuit's book? now he, as well as a great many other authors, affirms, that the words in question are found in it (19).
- III. In the third place, the Jesuits have never proved, that the propositions, which were objected to them as taken from this manuscript, are not to be found in it. They have only denied, that the last is in the parliament rolls, which was not the thing in question and, as to the others, they have alledged but weak probabilities. They have never boasted, that they have seen the book; so that they have said nothing to the purpose, and have not offered the king, as their adversaries do, to shew him this or that in the manuscript preserved in the register of parliament. If they could have hoped to convict their enemies of calumny, they would have desired of the king or parliament, that this book should be given to be examined in their presence by such commissaries as he should chuse. Is it not very certain, that, not having taken this step, they have given to understand, that they distrusted the book, and that, if they treated the propositions alledged by their adversaries, as fictitious, it was only acting like lawyers? It is well known that pleaders treat as fictitious, whatever makes against them as long as ever they can. I know not whether the adversaries of the Jesuits have taken the step I speak of, I mean, of petitioning the parliament to name commissaries to examine the manuscript in the presence of the parties concerned. A good verbal process thereupon would have for ever stopped the mouth of the most obstinate caviller. But, having none of these formalities, we have sufficient reason to believe, that Guignard had inserted in his treatise the propositions ascribed to him.

This being so, one cannot but be surpris'd at the false idea which his apologists give of it. Let us quote Richeome. 'What was found in John Guignard's chamber, says he (20), and on which he (20) Réponse 'was condemned to death, was a question, which de René de la Fon pour les Religieux de la Compagnie de Jésus, chap. xiv, 'he had formerly treated on, when he read divinity 'which was: whether it be lawful to kill a tyrant; 'a question, which all the canonists and moral philosophers put in their discourses, and which Bodin 'among the moderns, has discussed in his republic.' Richeome informs us elsewhere (21), that Henry IV was satisfied with this answer. This prince, then, must have been easily satisfied; for it was a very bad ti-Coton, pag. 184. one, since it represents in the most unfaithful manner the character of John Guignard's book. We have seen above (22) the reflexion, which was made on this passage of Richeome by the author of the Anti-Coton. It does not point out the defect which is to be found in the words of this Jesuit, and only aims at improving an opportunity of lashing the whole society of the Jesuits. So true it is, that there are those, who take more pleasure in satirizing a whole body, than in refuting one member of it in form.

The Jesuit Eudæmon Johannes has improved upon Richeome; for he has said, that Guignard only disputed for and against the theological question, whether it be lawful to take away the life of tyrants; and he adds, that this did not render him more worthy of death, than other divines, who exercise themselves, not only on this question, but on that likewise of the existence of God (23): Theologica quæstione in utramque partem scripta supplicium non magis meritis est, quam S. Thomas, quam reliqui Theologi, qui non modo de Tyrannorum necesse, sed de ipsa etiam Dei existentia, in utramque partem disputare soliti sunt. A most horrible misrepresentation of the state of things, since Guignard was not contented to examine a problem, as a reporter of reasons for and against; but he took the affirmative, and approved by name the assassination of Henry III, and every the like action which should be executed on Henry IV.

Father Gresser inserted in one of his books (24) an account of the trial of John Chastel, in which the book of Father Guignard is described as a mere collection of various passages concerning the thesis, whether private men may take away the lives of tyrants. He adds that, in the way of narrative, Guignard had spoken of the Jacobin, who assassinated Henry III, and that he declared on the scaffold, that this was the true character of his book, and that he had not written one word in it, which might offend the king (25): 'In cubiculo P. Johann's Guignardi Theologie Professoris, perbrevis Tractatus repertus est, quem ipse ante annos quatuor vel quinque conscripserat, quo illa Quæstio continebatur a Doctoribus in Scholis passim tractata & agitata: Utrum Tyrannum qui se palam hostem gerit Republicæ li- cent privato occidere? De qua Quæstione Argumenta, quæ in utramque partem, ut solet, ad discutendam disquirendamque veritatem, à variis Auctoribus adferuntur, ibi quoque congesta erant. Inter alia item narratione comprehensum fuit quid Frater Clemens Dominicanus Monachus in Henricum III ausus fuisset. (26) Cum jam patibulum à longe conspexisset cui appropinquabat, S. Andreæ Apostoli exemplo & verbis illud piè & alacriter consalutavit; læta mente ac fronte scalas conscendit, è quibus allocutus circumfusam spectantium multitudinem: quod supplicii hoc genere encicaretur, aliam non subesse causam, quam quia ante annos quatuor vel quinque perbreve Tractatum conscripserat, nullius injuriâ, nullius incommodo, in quem collegisset opiniones & sententias Sanctorum Patrum, variorumque Auctorum, quos ipsi ante monumentis commendaverant de hac Quæstione: Utrum liceat privato homini occidere manifestum Tyrannum; Tractatum illum se neque typis in lucem editum evulgasse; quin in aliorum manus cum nunquam pervenisset. Regem ibi neque verbulo læsum aut offensum. Quæ Patris verba omnem circumstantem Populum in magnam commiserationem inflexerunt. — In the bed-chamber of Father John Guignard professor of divinity, was found a small treatise, which he had written four or five years before, in which was contained that question, every where handled and discussed by the doctors in the schools; whether a private man may kill a tyrant, who is an open enemy to the state; the arguments on which question, which are alleged by various authors on both sides, for discussing and enquiring into the truth, are there likewise collected. Among others, there was a narrative of what Father Clement, a dominican monk, had attempted against Henry III. When he saw the gallows at a distance, to which he approached, he piouly and cheerfully saluted it, after the example, and in the words, of St Andrew the Apostle; he mounted the ladder with a cheerful mind and countenance, from whence he harangued the crowd of spectators round him: he told them, that the sole reason of his suffering this kind of death, was, that, four or five years before, he had written a short treatise, with no ill design, nor to the detriment of any one, in which he had collected the opinions and sentiments of the holy fathers, and of various authors, concerning this question, whether it was lawful for a private man to kill a manifest tyrant: that he had never printed that treatise, nor suffered it to go into the hands of any person. That he had not offended the king by the least word. Which speech of the father greatly inclined the surrounding audience to pity.

What disguises, or rather what impotures! But observe, that, by the help of an equivocation, he might pretend, that he had said nothing, which might offend the king; for he did not acknowledge Henry IV for king.

Let us quote a very long passage of a book, which is seldom to be met with. This may serve to excuse the length of the citation, without reckoning, that this passage will inform us, I. that Guignard had preached the same doctrine, which he had maintained in his writing; II. that he pretended, that this doctrine was agreeable to that of the ancient fathers, and to a decision of the church, and to the opinion of the Catholic party. This is a mixture of truth and falsehood. But the excess, committed in the person of Father Guignard, was the more cruel, as he was put to death unjustly; to wit, for collections and memoirs, taken both from the fathers, and decrees, to prove, that it is lawful to make war against heretical and excommunicated princes, which were found in his study; on especial notice given them to search it, and to make use of them for this purpose, by a certain minister, who, some years before, had heard the said Guignard, preaching at Bourges on this subject. For if a man is to be sentenced to death for scholastic collections, what injury is this to the holy fathers, out of whom they are taken? And what becomes of St Hilary, the light of the French, and of Lucifer bishop of Sardinia, who, in their times, wrote so strongly, on this subject, against the emperor Constantius, and sent him their books? Likewise of St Cyril, and St Gregory Nazianzen, against Julian the apostate? If these are things debated time out of mind, digested by consent of the ancients, ratified by the judgment of the church, which has the sole right of determining such truths, and afterwards received and made public in the schools of the divines; what are these censures, who so highly exclaim against them? What! Do they condemn the holy spirit? And dare they judge of colours, in which they are truly blind, and leaders of the blind? And if such collections are condemned, and so severely punished, how will they bear with those of heretics? How will they endure their books and pestilent writings, their propositions and maxims, judged and condemned as they are, both by the church, and the parliaments of France? Why are their preachings and blasphemies against God and the church tolerated, nay, approved by edicts, and verified by them? And if it be not lawful to make war against an heretical prince, how is it lawful for an heretic to make war against a Catholic prince? And how can he be justified, who, as head of the heretics, has made war, all his life, against the Catholic kings of France: upon which he has valued himself, and is the reason why he has been condemned, and why they acknowledge him for their prince? Why is it not lawful against him, since besides the authority of decrees, he himself has set the example? Add, that this was not at all to be condemned, for being a proposition of the schools, and a general one, and merely the doctrine of the church. And however it be, belonging to the party in general, and consequently convert, as well by the edict of treason of Paris, as by that, which was afterwards published. Considering that, upon this treatment, there was no one, not only of the said society, but even no zealous ecclesiastic, nay, no one of the whole Catholic party, but ought to undergo the same punishment (27).

[F] The whole kingdom was full of seditious preachers. The evil did not cease by the abolition, which the Pope granted to Henry IV, the sixteenth of September, 1595. Read these words of cardinal d'Osat: they are in a letter, which he wrote from Rome to the duke of Villeroy, the fourteenth of May 1601. I spoke the other day to the Pope of what the king desired; which was, that his holiness would order his new Nuncio to take care, that the preachers in France, preached with the requisite discretion and moderation, without meddling in state-affairs, of which they knew not the motives, nor bold seditious discourses: and I delivered to him likewise a Memorial in writing, the copy of which I send you inclosed. His holiness told me, he would order his new Nuncio accordingly (28). Mr Amelot de la Houfflaie has commented admirably on this passage of cardinal d'Osat. 'It no better becomes preachers (says he) to talk about affairs of political government, which they understand nothing of, for the most part; than it does politicians, to decide in matters of faith and religion. Affairs of state are of so nice a nature, that it is always dangerous to speak of them before the people, who are not always well affected to the government. Omni populo, says Plutarch, inest malignum quiddam & querulum in imperantes. All preachers have a good zeal, I confess; but as this zeal is not always attended with knowledge and prudence, it is for the interest of the public that those of ability should forbear, through modesty, to bring these matters into their sermons, in order to oblige others to confine themselves within the limits of the gospel doctrine, which every where recommends peace and obedience. In the last years of the reign of Henry III, and the first of Henry IV, the doctors, Aubry, Boucher, Pelletier, Lincestre, Rose, Feu-ardent, and many others of that stamp, had so profaned the ministry of the word, that the pulpit, where nothing but truth should be spoken, was become the seat of imposture and calumny; and that the people, infected through the ears, adored no other cross, but that of Lorraine. For which reason it was absolutely necessary to restrain this licence, and re-establish good discipline in the sacred ministry, which the spirit of rebellion had converted into a mystery of iniquity.'

If the Pope's Nuncio acquitted himself well of his commission, yet he did not remove this great disorder. They continued to preach and talk seditiously, and to give rise thereby to conspiracies against the life of Henry IV (29). The true Frenchmen, favourers of the independent writings and private conversation, insinuated the assassination of such princes as Henry IV, whom they suspected of favouring the enemies of Popery. This was perhaps one of the reasons, which obliged the parliament of Paris to involve all the Jesuits of France in the cause of John Chastel, and John Guignard [G]. They hoped perhaps, that, by banishing out of the kingdom those who passed for the principal authors of dangerous doctrines, they should bridle the boldness of other Ecclesiastics.

independent power of the king, and attached to the monarchical maxims of state, attributed to the Jesuits especially this republican and ultramontane spirit. Not that they looked upon them as the first authors of it (30): they only considered them as it's strongest support. This puts me in mind of a remark, which appeared in a book, printed in the year 1701, and intituled, The present state of the faculty of divinity of Louvain, treating of the conduct of some of it's divines, and of their sentiments against the sovereignty and safety of kings, and against the four articles of the clergy of France. It is three letters of a canon of Tournai to a doctor of the Sorbonne. They are preceded by a letter of that doctor, in which we find these words (31): 'But whence is it, that in mentioning, in your letters the sentiments of those divines, who teach, that kings subjects may be absolved from the oath of fidelity, you speak only of some particular doctors of Louvain, of some Augustins, of some Recollects, and not at all of the Jesuits? Know you not, that these detestable opinions are derived from them? Not that they are the first, who maintained them: several canonists, some divines, above all, the Italians, subject to the Pope, taught them before them: but their writings were so insignificant, that they fell of themselves, and served rather to discredit these opinions, than to bring them into fashion. But the Jesuits have heightened them, and have undertaken to give them credit.'

[G] This was one of the reasons, which obliged the parliament to involve all the Jesuits of France in the cause of John Chastel, and John Guignard. There were some persons, who were surprized, that there being at most but presumptions, that the Jesuits had advised John Chastel to the wicked attempt, which he executed, yet they were banished the kingdom by the same Arrêt, which condemned that assassin. But to justify in this the conduct of the parliament of Paris, we must observe, that the action of that young man was not the foundation of the banishment, to which the Jesuits were condemned: it was only an occasion of determining a cause, which had been pleaded some months before. This cause was a process carried on against the Jesuits by the university of Paris. Antony Arnould, who pleaded for that university, had concluded, 'that the court might be pleased in confirming the request of the university, to order all the Jesuits of France to quit the kingdom and all his majesty's dominions, within fifteen days after notice given in every one of their colleges or houses, speaking to one of them for the rest. Alas! and, upon their refusal, wherever any of them shall be found in France after the said time, they shall be condemned upon the spot, without form of process, as guilty of high-treason, and attempting on the life of the king' (32). The judgment of the cause was referred to another time; but, on occasion of the affair of John Chastel, they complied with the petition of the university, and the methods made use of by Antony Arnould. Some other parliaments imitated that of Paris: but the parliament of Toulouse, and that of Bourdeaux, refused to conform themselves to it (33); and thus the Jesuits kept their ground in Languedoc and Guienne till their recall. They did not obtain it till the beginning of the year 1604.

GUILLELMA, or GUILLELMINA, of Bohemia, the head of an infamous sect, which appeared in Italy in the XIIIth century, did so effectually deceive the world by the appearances of an extraordinary devotion, and acted her part so well to the last, that she died with the reputation of holiness, and was in great veneration for a considerable time after her death, as if she had been a saint. At last her imposture was found out; her corps was dug up, and burnt, in the year 1300. She died in 1281, and had been buried at Milan in the church-yard of San Pietro del Horto. Half a year after, she was removed to the convent of Caravalla (a), and a tomb was erected to her, the ruins whereof are still to be seen in the burying-place of the monks. Two learned men, Puricellus and Boffius, have published an account of that sect; but they do not agree in every particular. Boffius was the first, who defamed that sect on account of their lewdness [A]; but Puricellus maintains, that the corruption did not proceed

[A] Boffius . . . first dis famed this sect on account of their lewdness. That sect was accused of a thing, wherewith many other conventicles have been charged at several times, and in several places. It was said, that the followers of Guillelma met in a cave in the night-time, and that, after they had repeated certain prayers, they put out the candles, and men and women lay together, as chance directed. Quos ipsi in quadam Synagoga subterranea conventibus antelucanis congregantes, cum ad modum Presbyterorum induti certas orationes ad altare fudissent, extincto aut sub medio abscondito lumine ad fortuitos concubitus hortari, consueverant (1). It is further said, that a rich merchant having a wife, who used to go frequently by stealth to that cave, followed her one day privately, and lay with her, and convicted her of it by a ring he took from her finger. He set up for an informer against that sect (2). The same story is related of the Fratricelli, as I have shewn in their article (3). I believe such accusations have been sometimes calumnious: but doubtless many lewd actions have been frequently performed in those conventicles: and I do not wonder, that so many husbands do not approve, that their wives should grow fond of certain devout assemblies; for love will come in sooner or later, and one cannot sufficiently admire the docility of the fair sex in relation to the doctrines that are most contrary to chastity (4). I do not much wonder, that women should have been prevailed upon to prostitute themselves, in the ancient Paganism; it was accounted a kind of divine worship; the goddess Venus was honoured in that manner: but it is an amazing thing, that, in the midst of Christianity, notwithstanding the wise counsels of mothers, and the pathetic exhortations of preachers, the first hypocrite, that comes in their way, should be able to persuade them to a thousand abominations. If he tells one of his devotees, as St Aldhelme (5) did, lie by me; I desire to know whether you will be so powerful an instrument in the devil's hands, as to make me yield to the temptation; she will do it. If he tells her, as some heretics did, who were punished by the inquisition of Toulouse, let us be stark naked one by another upon another; let us kiss and strive to tickle one another; we shall thereby give proof of our spiritual strength (6); he is obeyed. Can there be a greater docility? would the refuse to proceed farther, if he was willing? have not many women complied with the order of lying with the first comer, when candles were put out, in the conventicles of the fraternity? I must take notice of another docility not so bad, but yet very strange. When infirm men want to have their natural heat in some measure restored to them, there are young women who will not scruple to lie by them, in order to do them that good office. A pagnyrist of the fair sex affords me a very remarkable passage about it. 'Physicians, says he (7) cannot deny, that the heat of a young woman's breast, applied to an old man's stomach, may revive and keep up ceed from the mind to the body, and that Guillelma and her followers were only guilty of an abominable Fanaticism, which he proves by the verbal process of the Inquisition (b) [B]. * his natural heat. The royal prophet David was not ignorant of it, since he pitched upon * the beautiful Shunamite, that she might, in that manner, drive away the coldness of his old age. And it is likely, that, in imitation of him, the grandfather of the late king of Navarre, called Monsieur d'Albret, being 120 years old, kept two young handsome women to that effect. He lived a long time upon their milk without any other food, and lay between them; which was the reason why they were respected like princes in his house. But I would not have every man to do the same; for they would often imitate a Notary in the Chatelet of Paris, whose name was Martin Maupin. That man made his jealous wife believe, that he was sick of David's distemper, that she might give him leave to make use of his maid in order to warm his stomach; and the poor woman was sometimes deceived in it. I shall observe, by the by, that St Jerome does not approve, that what is related of the Shunamite should be taken in a literal sense. He explains it allegorically, and says the meaning of it is, that David, in his old days, was more intimately united to wisdom. That great doctor of the church rejects the literal sense with the utmost indignation. 'Nonne tibi videtur, si occidentem sequare litteram, vel figmentum esse de mimo, vel Attellanarum ludicia? . . . Quæ est igitur ista Shunamitis, uxor & virgo, tam fervens, ut frigidum calefaceret, tam sancta, ut calentem ad libidinem non provocaret: Exponat sapientissimus Salomon patris sui delicias, & pacificus bellatoris viri narret amplexus. Posside sapientiam, posside intelligentiam, &c. (8) . . . Do you not think, that, by following the literal sense, you make a meer fiction of the story? . . . What therefore is that Shunamite, both wife and virgin, so hot, as to warm the cold, so holy, as not to provoke him, when

* warm, to last? let Solomon, the wisest of men, explain his father's joys, and a peaceful king relate the embraces of a warlike one. Get wisdom, get understanding, &c.

[B] By the verbal process of the Inquisition.] That act, drawn up in the year 1300, imports, that Andrew Saramita and Mayfreda Pirovana, the chief followers of Guillelma, maintained, that she was the HOLY GHOST incarnated in the feminine sex, and born of Constantia, wife of the king of Bohemia; that she was only dead according to the flesh; that she would rise again before the general resurrection, and ascend into heaven in the sight of her disciples; that she had left a vicar upon earth, viz. Mayfreda Pirovana, a nun of the order of the humbled; that this nun would say mass at Guillelma's tomb; and at last, that she would be possessed of the holy apostolical see at Rome; that she would expel the cardinals from thence, and have four doctors, who would make four new gospels. Puricellus gives us a full account of all those impious assertions. His book was never printed, and it is not known whether it will ever come out. It does not appear that Guillelma boasted of that pretended incarnation; nay, it seems that by a false modesty she affected not to own it (9).

[C] Her visions were not extirpated for ever.] The author of the continuation of Nangis's chronicle says, upon the year 1306, that one Dulcinius of Verceil vented the like doctrines concerning the HOLY GHOST (10). Postel, and his mother Joan, were guilty of as great extravagancies; and it were easy to shew that this sort of Fanaticism is revived from time to time. One would think, that the devils have plotted to have religion ridiculed by women, and that, notwithstanding the ill success of many attempts, they renew them from time to time in many places.

GUINDANO (SIGISMUND) a native of Cremona, having made a poem about the actions of the emperor Charles V, presented it to that prince at such an unlucky time, that he received nothing for it. He did not pitch upon a proper time [A]; for he made his compliment with his copy in his hand, when Charles V was engaged in a great war in Germany. He was so vexed at such an unprofitable reception, that he threw his poem into the fire: It is thought, that, if he had been rich enough to get it printed at his own charge, he would not have been so cruel to his work; but his great poverty, which did not permit him to publish it, together with his spite, was a sufficient reason for him to destroy it (a).

[A] He did not pitch upon a proper time.] All those, who intend to present their works to great men, should mind this advice of Horace:

Ut proficentem docui te sæpe diuque

Si validus, si lætus erit, si denique poscet.
Ne studio nostri pecces, odiumque libellis
Sedulus importes opera vehemente minister (1).

When last we parted, this was my command:
Present these papers to Augustus' hand;
From cares of empire if his mind unbends,
Or if he asks to see what Horace sends:

That is, one ought to avoid an unseasonable time for all princes are in that respect like Augustus; they will not be unseasonably interrupted (2). An author will miscarry for want of observing the critical minute, and what the Latins call, Molles aditus, mollissima fandi tempora. Our Guindano had this misfortune; he mis-timed his business; he shewed a poem of twelve books to an emperor, who was engaged in a very troublesome war (3). GUISCARD.

GUISCARD. It is the name, which the lords de la Cotte, de la Bourlie, de la Laurie, &c. bestowed upon their family, which is one of the most noble and most ancient in the province of Quercy. They pitched upon it out of respect to one of their ancestors, whose proper name was GUISCARDUS. It was not the custom of those times to preserve the proofs of the origine of families in favour of their posterity; nevertheless those lords can produce some writings near five hundred years old; for they make it appear, not only that they are possessed of lands, which never were out of their family for many ages, but also that their nobility has been transmitted without any interruption to the count de GUISCARD, who is (a) a worthy successor of his illustrious ancestors. BERNARD DE GUISCARD makes the first degree of the genealogy of that house. The testimonies of his actions, which are extant, shew that his race had an original, which reached beyond the age he lived in. He took the title of knight in all the leaves of his lands from the year 1247 to 1283. This is a manifest proof, that he had signalized himself in war, and that his services procured him that title, which was then, and for many ages after, the most honourable reward bestowed upon military valour. There are fourteen degrees in a direct and male line from that Bernard to the present count de Guiscard, and that series of successions affords several illustrious alliances, and several persons distinguished by their merit [A]. But it must be confessed, that those, who gave a greater lustre to that family, are, GEORGE DE GUISCARD, lord of la Bourlie [B], and LEWIS DE GUISCARD,

[A] Several illustrious alliances, and several persons distinguished by their merit. I shall mention some of them. BERTRAND DE GUISCARD, Da-moiseau (1), the third son of BERNARD (2) DE GUISCARD, left a son behind him called GAILLARD DE GUISCARD, about whom there is an uncommon record preserved in the archives. Having been knighted, as his forefathers were, a private man called Peter de la Tour, who probably served under him, and was upon the point of death, having desired him to honour him with the same title, he conferred it upon him in the year 1334: In infirmitate qua decessit, fecit se militem fieri per Gaillardum Guiscardum militem, & per eundem Guiscardum insignia militaria sibi dari. King Philip de Valois, approving that action, by his letters dated from Paris in August, 1337, confirmed that knighthood, and was willing that the descendants of him, who had received it, should enjoy, by virtue of it, all the privileges belonging to nobility. The same Gaillard de Guiscard served still in the wars of Gasconne, in the year 1339, with four esquires under the command of messire Peter de Marmande, seneschal of Perigord, according to an account of that year given by Bartholomew de Drack, treasurer of the war. But it is not known, whether he was married, and left any children behind him (3).

(1) Children of good families, who had not yet been knighted, were distinguished by that title.

(2) He was the son of that Bernard de Guiscard, which whom the genealogy begins.

(3) Hoffer, Genealogie de la Maison de Guiscard. See citat. (9).

(4) Ibid.

(5) That company was then composed of persons of quality.

BERNARD DE GUISCARD fourth of that name, Seigneur de la Cotte, and de la Laurie, Da-moiseau, married the twenty eighth of April, 1315, Helis de Montaigne, daughter and heiress of Bernard de Montaigne, Seigneur de Montecuc. His castle of la Cotte being then an important fortress, Galois de la Baume, lord of Valin, who had the direction of the war in Languedoc, and was then at Cahors, gave him the government of it, and kept him in the pay of Charles V, by letters of the tenth of May, 1348, with six men of arms, and six foot-serjeants, to secure that place. There is good reason to believe, that he preserved it out of interest and zeal, as he had engaged; for he made his will in that castle, the twenty seventh of April in the year 1353 (4).

WILLIAM BERTRAND DE GUISCARD, second of that name, married, first, on the fifth of October, 1413, Margaret de Veirac, daughter of Guy de Veirac, lord of Merle and Cossac in the diocese of Tulle; and, secondly, Helis de Landore, sister to Bernard de Landore, viscount de Cadars in Rouergue. ANTONY DE GUISCARD, lord of la Cotte and Montecuc, married, the sixteenth of October, 1492, Isabella de Lomagne, daughter of John de Lomagne, lord of Montagu in Agenois. JOHN DE GUISCARD, first of that name, gentleman in ordinary of the king's chamber, married the eleventh of August, 1528, Souveraigne de Ricard de Genouillac, daughter of John de Ricard surnamed de Genouillac, knight, baron de Gourdon, and lord of Genouillac, and Vaillae, and of Margaret Daubousson. JOHN DE GUISCARD his son, one of the hundred gentlemen of the king's household (5), married, the twelfth of November, 1554, Frances de la Barthe, daughter of Matthew de la Barthe, baron de Mont-cornet, and first baron d'Astarac, and of Catherine de Lomagne, lady de Montarac. JOHN DE GUISCARD, his second son, lord of Puy de Sirests, married Agnes de Temines, the fifth of January, 1625.

[B] GEORGE DE GUISCARD lord of la Bourlie. That family was divided into two branches towards the end of the XVth century, viz. that of the lords du Puy de Sirests (6), and that of the lords du Cairou and de la Bourlie. The head of the first was the second son of John de Guiscard, second of that name. The head of the other was GABRIEL DE GUISCARD, lord of la Gardelle, du Cairou, and de la Bourlie, the third son of John de Guiscard, second of that name. Gabriel de Guiscard had eight sons: the sixth is the count de la Bourlie, whose name appears in the text of this remark. He was born the ninth of August, 1606. He has been successively captain of foot and of horse in the regiment of Vaillac and Coallin. One of his legs was broke by a musket-shot, at the descent into the isles of St Margaret and St Honorat; and one of his arms was run through with a spear, at the battle of Rocroy; and having signalized himself at the battle of Lens (7), at the siege of Arras, and on several occasions, he deserved to be made one of the king's pensionaries in the year 1644. He was made serjeant of battle, and governor of Courtray, in the year 1647. The year following, the queen-mother thought him worthy of the choice she made of him to fill the place of sub-governor to the king. Afterwards he was made counsellor of state in 1649, maréchal de camp in 1651: and his majesty being well pleased with the services he had done in his employments, gave him, in 1662, the command of the sovereignties of Sedan, Raucour, and St Mange; and he had the government of that important place in 1671, of which he had been made great bayliff. The king thought he could not bestow upon a more faithful person the command of the towns and citadel of Dunkirk, Bergues, Furnes, and Graveline, and of the troops appointed for the defence of that frontier, which was given him with the power of lieutenant-general in 1672: and the year following, he beat, near Furnes, with 500 troopers, above 800 men of the enemies, a great part of which were killed upon the spot, and he brought 140 prisoners to Dunkirk. At last, crowned with the reputation he had justly acquired by his wisdom and valour, during the space of a very long life, he died the ninth of December, in the year 1693, aged eighty seven years and four months. He had been married in the royal palace, in the king's and the late queen-mother's presence, the twenty eighth of November 1648, to Genevieve de Longueval, lady de Fourdrinoy in Picardy, daughter of Antony de Longueval, lord of Tenelles and Lemont, and of Elizabeth de Margival; and he left behind him four sons by that lady. LEWIS DE GUISCARD count de Neuvy, of whom I shall speak in the following remark. JOHN-GEORGE DE GUISCARD, born the twenty seventh of September, 1657, he gave great proofs of his valour, being engaged in the colonel's company of the regiment of Normandy, Normandy, during the defence of Grave, where he was wounded with a musket-shot in the head; and, whilst he was captain in the regiment of guards, he signalized his courage in many battles and sieges. He was shot through the body at the siege of Ipres; and has been since colonel of the regiment of Normandy, at the head of which the count de Guiscard, his brother, had served with great distinction. ANTONY DE GUISCARD, born the twenty seventh of December 1658, abbot of Bonnecombe in Rouergue, and prior of Dieu en Souvienne. Genevieve Catherine de Guiscard was married, the thirtieth of Oct. 1683, to Camillus Savari, count de Breves (8). Note, that the eldest branch is now, in the fifteenth degree, in the person of FRANCIS DE GUISCARD, Seigneur de St Jean and de la Coste.

[C] LEWIS DE GUISCARD, his eldest son. He was born the twenty seventh of September, 1651; and, ever since he bore arms, he has had important posts in the king's service. For being animated with the same sentiments, which procured to the count de la Bourlie, his father, all the glorious rewards, wherewith his majesty honoured his courage, he began to serve as a captain in the regiment des Vaisseaux, in the year 1671. He served in that quality, the year following, at the sieges of Orfey, Rhinberg, Duisburg, and Zutphen, and at those of Maestricht and Unna in the country of Marck, in the year 1673. The king made him colonel of the regiment of Normandy in March 1674; and immediately he entered into Grave, which was invested already, and where the said regiment was. He forced a guard, and carried 16 prisoners into the place, with 30 troopers of the garrison of Mazeyck, whom he had taken for a convoy. He was dangerously wounded with a musket-shot in the arm-pit, towards the end of the siege, where he commanded the infantry. The year following, he was wounded again with a musket-shot in the head, at the siege of Bouchain: and, being detached, the same campaign, to bring six battalions to the body, commanded by the marechal de Crequi near Thionville; he was at the battle of Conlarbrick, and was so happy, as to bring to Metz the broken remains of the Infantry, with the remainder of the regiment of Normandy and Bourlemont. He served the years following, in Germany, and was at the siege of Friburg, and of fort Kiel; and also, in the year 1684, at the siege of Luxemburg. He always signalized himself with so much bravery in all the places, where he had occasion to act at the head of that body, that his majesty granted him, in 1689, a commission of brigadier in his infantry, and gave him power to command in Dinant, and a general inspection over the troops garrisoned in that place, and in Charlemont, Rocroy, Beaumont, and Philippeville. Having discharged the duties of that post with the utmost vigilance and activity (9), the king thought fit to make him, the next year, marechal de camp, and commander of Rocroy and Charlemont, with orders to throw himself into Philippeville, if it should be attacked. And because his wife conduct and indefatigable application made way for new rewards, the count de la Bourlie having resigned his government of Sedan, the king thought it just to give it to the count de Guiscard, his son. It was conferred upon him in the year 1692. And his majesty being well pleased with the zeal and intrepidity he had shewn, wherever he had executed his orders, thought he ought to entrust him with the keeping of the town and castle of Namur, the most important place of Europe, which he had just then subdued at the head of his army. He had the power to command in it as a governor; and that glorious choice was attended with the dignity of lieutenant-general, wherewith the king honoured him, the thirtieth of March, 1693. His majesty gave him the command of a considerable body, to invest Huy, in order to make a diversion, whereby the siege of Furnes, undertaken by the marechal de Boufflers, might be carried on; which succeeded, by keeping on that side part of the enemies troops commanded by the earl of Athlone. He sustained, at Bossu, a vigorous attack of the enemies upon a convoy, which he conducted from Maubeuge to the army of the marechal de Luxemburg, with a firmness the more extraordinary, because he had but thirteen squadrons; and Mr du Puy, lieutenant-general of the Spanish armies, who had eighteen squadrons, and 2400 foot, of the garrison of Charleroy, was entirely defeated, and put to flight, having had many men killed and made prisoners. He was so lucky as to be at the battle of Nerwinde, having set out from Huy at break of day. The marechal de Luxemburg placed him in the right wing, where he proved very serviceable. Having acquired a new degree of glory by the defence of Namur, attacked by all the forces of the allies, he was honoured with the order of the HOLY GHOST, to which the king nominated him the seventeenth of December, 1695; and he was admitted, with the usual ceremonies, on the first day of January of this year 1696. He married the twenty fourth of February, 1677, Angelique de Langlée, the daughter of Claudius de Langlée, chevalier, Seigneur de l'Epichelere, quarter-master-general of the king's armies, and of Catherine Roze; by whom he has LEWIS AUGUSTUS DE GUISCARD, born the twentieth of May 1680, and colonel of the regiment of Guiscard, &c. Catherine de Guiscard, born the twelfth of June 1688 (10).

This is what Mr d'Hofier said in December 1696. He could not then mention the embassy of Sweden, to which the count de Guiscard was named in 1698 (11); nor the untimely death of the only son of that count. That young lord had been educated with all imaginable care, and had wonderfully answered so good an education. He had very noble inclinations, he loved not only warlike exercises, but also the Belles Lettres and philosophy, and had made a great progress in them. He saw the court of England in the retinue of the count de Tallard the French ambassador, in the year 1698, and accompanied his father to Stockholm in 1699. He was preparing to take a journey to Rome; but, being arrived at Vienna, he fell sick of the small-pox, of which he died in a few days, towards the end of December 1699, to the great grief of all those, who knew and admired him. Had not the count de Guiscard, who loved that only son with a particular tenderness, been a man of a very steady soul, he had never been able to bear such a severe blow.

GUISE (JAMES DE), a Franciscan monk, was born at Mons in Hainault. He was doctor of divinity, and taught that science, philosophy, and mathematics, for the space of twenty-five years more or less, in the convents of his order. He earnestly applied himself to illustrate the antiquities, and the history, of his country; but he followed fabulous traditions; for he affirmed, that his birth-place was founded by the Trojans. We have only an abridgment of his chronicle of Hainault (a) [4], and it is not

(a) Taken from Valer. Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 411.

[A] We have only an abridgment of his chronicle of Hainault. That abridgment is written in French, and not in Latin, as the chronicle. It was printed at Paris in the year 1531, in folio. The title of it runs thus: Les illustrations de la Haute Belgique, antiquitez du Pays de Hainault & de la grande cite des Belges, à present dite Bayay, dont procedent les chaussees de Brabant, & de plusieurs Princes qui ont regné, & fondé plusieurs villes & citez audist pays, & autres choses singulieres & dignes de memoire, advenues durant leurs regnes, jusques au Duc Philippe de Bourgogne dernier decede. Par Frere Jacques de Guise Religieux de l'Ordre de Saint François. Oeuvre divisé en six Volumes, desquels il n'y a que les trois premiers imprimez. not likely, that the whole work will ever be published. The author died at Valenciennes, the sixth of February, 1399 (b). Moreri has committed some faults [B].

'city of the Belgæ, now called Bavay, where the causeway (commonly called les Chaussées de Brunehaut) begins, and of many princes, who reigned and built many towns in that country, and other memorable things, which happened in their reigns, till the time of the late duke Philip of Burgundy. By brother James de Guise, a monk of the order of St Francis. A work divided into six volumes, whereof only the three first are printed.' Thus the title of this work is mentioned by Andrew du Chesne (1). Du Verdier does not mention it so fully; but he has not forgot a circumstance omitted by du Chesne, viz. That this book was translated into French (2). La Croix du Maine falsely believed, that James de Guise was the author of that translation (3). He adds, that the Latin chronicle of that monk is to be seen in manuscript in the convent of the Minor Friars at Valenciennes, as John le Maire says in his Illustrations of Gaule; that it was composed at the request of William earl of Hainault, and that it reaches to the year 1244. This last particular does not agree with the title of the abridgment; for no duke of Burgundy, called Philip, died at that time. Philip de Rouvre, the last duke of Burgundy of the first branch, died the twenty first of November 1361. Valerius Andreas observes (4), that the Paris edition, 1531, is intituled, Extraits des Chroniques de Jacques de Guise; and that there was, at Mr Gevart's at Antwerp, another abridgment of those chronicles, made by order of Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy. He further says, that the Franciscans of Mons had the manuscript of that chronicle of Hainault in three volumes.

I learned yesterday (5) of Baron le Roy, a very curious and knowing man, that, not long before his most Christian Majesty besieged Mons in 1691, he wrote a letter to the warden of the convent, where that manuscript was, desiring him to get some chapters of it transcribed for him; and that the warden made answer, that, after he had transcribed something of it, he had left it off, not being able to read the author's letters and abbreviations, and that the most able monks of his convent could not do it neither. Baron le Roy added, that, during the siege, a lay-brother of that convent set up for a gunner, and made it appear, that he had not forgot the experience he had formerly got in that art; and that, a deserter having acquainted the French with it, many bombs were thrown upon that convent, which set it on fire; so that the manuscript of James de Guise was burnt, with the library of the monks.

[B] Moreri has committed some faults. I. James de Guise was not a native of Valenciennes, but of Mons. Observe, by the bye, that La Coix du Maine, who conjectured he was born at Guise (6), is mistaken; besides, he did not know that this monk lived in the XIVth century. II. Moreri should not have said, that he died in 1398, or in 1399; for authors do not differ in that manner as to the year, in which James de Guise departed this life. Their variations consist in this, that some begin the year with January, and others after Easter. According to the latter, he died in 1398, and, according to the former, in 1399 (7).

GUISE, a town of Picardy, upon the river Oise, in the diocese of Laon, was the ancient patrimony of the younger brothers of the house of Lorraine, and was erected into a duchy and peerdom in January 1527 (a). It went through several revolutions, according to the different success of arms, during the wars of Francis I, and the emperor Charles V. It was taken by storm in 1536. The castle, which might have held out, was safely surrendered; for which reason the captains were branded with infamy (b). But in 1543, Ferdinand de Gonzaga, who besieged it, being early informed of the march of Francis I, raised the siege, and was so briskly charged in his retreat, that he lost two thousand men in the rear of his army, besides many prisoners (c). In 1636, the Spaniards, who had made some conquests in Picardy, did not think fit to besiege Guise, being afraid that the count de Guebriant, who commanded in it, would make a vigorous resistance (d). They could not make themselves masters of it in 1650, though every thing seemed to favour them. See the book, intituled, Le Triomphe de la Ville de Guise. It was written by John Baptiste de Verdun, a Minime, and printed at Paris in 1687: It is mentioned in the Journal des Savans (e). I shall observe in another place (f), that the miscarriage of that enterprize of the Spaniards is chiefly to be ascribed to the marquis de Bougi.

GUISE (CLAUDIUS DE LORRAIN, duke of), the second son of Renatus duke of Lorraine, went and settled in France, after he had endeavoured in vain, as it is said, to hinder Antony his eldest brother from succeeding his father [A]. Being a man of great

[A] He in vain endeavoured, as it is said, to hinder Antony his elder brother from succeeding his father. The following account is to be found in Thuanus, where he gives an account of the speech, which la Renaudie is supposed to have made to his accomplices (1). Renatus, duke of Lorraine, when he married Margaret d'Harcourt (2), heirs of the house of Tancarville, obliged her, by the contract of his marriage, to make over to him her estate by deed of gift. Afterwards, under pretence that she was ugly, and then under pretence that she was barren, he cruelly divorced her, without restoring her estate to her, and married the sister of the duke of Guelderland before his first wife died. He had, by this second wife, among other children, Antony, who succeeded him, and our Claudius. The latter, who was born after the death of Margaret d'Harcourt, pretended, that Antony, being born during the life of that lady, was to be reputed a bastard, and incapable of succeeding; so that he did not scruple to dishonour his own mother, by giving out, that she was a concubine, provided he might become by that means duke of Lorraine, to the prejudice of his elder brother (3). Having miscarried in his attempt, he left his country, and retired into France. I cannot tell whether this be true; and I give little credit to what is said by a speech-maker, in such circumstances as la Renaudie was in: but I am sure, that a very ambitious man is little concerned to dishonour his mother, when great advantages accrue to him from it. I shall set down some words of Thuanus, which seem to have some obscurity in them. Cum primo finalis nuptiis Margaritam Gulielmi Haricuriani Tancarville Comitissæ filiam & amplissimorum bonorum, quæ Lotaringi hodie in Calensæ agro possident, heredem duxisset, & tabulis dotabilib. ad donationem illorum bonorum adesset, postea deformitatem & ex deformitate sterilitatem causatus miseram feminam repudiavit, & tamen bona retinuit (4). Thuanus's meaning seems to be this, that the two pretences of the duke of Lorraine were grounded one upon another; that is, he alledged, first, that Margaret was an ugly woman; and, in the second place, that her ugliness was the cause of her barrenness. None but a wretched philosopher would argue thus: for there is no other connexion between a woman's ugliness and her barrenness, than what a malicious and nice husband can make, by refusing to pay to his wife what great courage and merit, he was very much esteemed. He married a princess of the blood (a), and was raised to great offices. The county of Guise was erected into a duchy and peerdom upon his account. Such erections had not been made till then but for the princes of the blood. It is said, Francis I was angry with him upon some occasions [B], and would not permit him to be acknowledged a prince [C], nor to assume all the marks of one. However it be, Claudius de Lorraine became so powerful, that he founded a house, which was like to dethrone the lawful successors. He died in 1550, leaving behind him six sons and four daughters, the eldest of which was married to James Stuart, the Vth of that name, king of Scotland. He signalized himself upon several great occasions, particularly at the battle of Marignan [D]. His brother John, who went by the name of cardinal of Lorraine, proved a great support to him (b).

what we call a due benevolence. Perhaps, duke Renatus took care not to want a pretence of barrenness upon occasion; but I am persuaded, that the only meaning of Thuanus's words, is, that, after the duke had alleged his wife's ugliness, he gave another reason for his divorce, viz. that he could get no children by her.

I cannot tell whether Varillas had any other authority besides la Renaudie's speech: however, it will not be improper to quote him (5). * When Claudius de Lorraine consulted his own interest, he pretended, that the duchies of Lorraine and Bar belonged to him, and that Antony, his eldest brother, was not a lawful son, since he was born in the life-time of the first wife (6) of their father. The same Claudius could not forbear saying so to some persons, who told duke Renatus of it; and he was afraid that his two sons would attempt upon one another's life. He found no better expedient, than to send Claudius into France, and to marry him there to Antoinette de Bourbon, eldest daughter of the count de Vendôme, and to bestow upon him all the lands he had in that kingdom; which were so many, that they take up two pages in the manuscript of the contract *, and so considerable, that they brought in as great a revenue as the duchies of Lorraine and Bar. Beloi says the quite contrary: for he affirms, that the first duke of Guise was not worth above fourteen or fifteen thousand livres per annum, when he married the lady Antoinette de Bourbon (7).

[B] Francis I was angry with him upon some occasions. La Renaudie affirms it in his speech: he says, that Claudius de Lorraine, having sent, without the king's order, some troops out of the province, of which he was governor, did so exasperate his majesty, that his pardon could not be obtained, but upon condition that he should no more appear at court. The pretence he made use of to send those troops out of his government of Champagne, was, that he had a mind to repulse the Anabaptists, who made excursions into the dominions of the duke of Lorraine (8). Antonio ab Anabaptistis, uti agebat, infestato, injusto regis ex praesentia sua auxiliareis copias adduxit. Quod adeo impatienter tulit Francis, qui his praedictis patientiam suam tentari interpretabatur, ut nisi in Joannis fratris (9) & Annae Memorantii, qui factum excusavit, gratiam, nunquam eam injuriam condonaturus fuisset cedatur: quam tamen ea lege remisit, ut Claudius in posterum aula abstineret, neque in suum conspectum veniret. As I have already said, I do not much depend upon la Renaudie's speech; but part of what he says is to be found in a good historian: let us keep to his account. The late king Francis, says he (10), never had a good opinion of the father (11), since he came to know, that, during his imprisonment, he had brought the forces of the kingdom to Severn, in order to pacify the troubles of Germany, and fight those, who troubled the Netherlands, and other countries, belonging to the house of Austria. The said king took it so ill, that, being come from Spain to St Sever, he ordered he should be imprisoned; and, had it not been for the constable's intercession, it had gone hard with him. He was also very much blamed, not only by the nobility, but also by the king, for the attempt he made upon the government of Burgundy in the life-time of Philip Cbadot, admiral and governor of that country; for the doing of an ill office to the crown, and encroaching upon the office of a gentleman still living, are two things very much taken notice of in France: which made the father and the sons so odious to the king, that they lost all hopes of raising themselves without the alliance and favour of the dukes of Valentinois.

I wonder this historian does not add, that the king, not long before he died, charged his successor to bestow no office upon the Guises. This particular is mentioned by some historians: La Renaudie did not forget it.

These are his words in Thuanus. Ejus rei memoria cum tenacissime in Francis prudentissimi principis animo, quamdiu vixit, haesisset, moriens ille inter salutaria praecepta, quae de posteritate ac regno sollicitus Henrico F. dedit, imprimis eum monuit, ut sibi à Guisianorum ambitione caveret, ac proinde eos publicae rei gubernaculis ne admoveret (12).

[C] and would not permit him to be acknowledged a prince. President de la Place, whom I have quoted before, mentions a discourse, that was made to Catherine de Medicis, by Lewis Regnier, Sieur de la Planche. 'The French gentlemen, (they are Regnier's words) honour foreign princes, when they keep within due bounds; otherwise they cannot endure them, and much less acknowledge them for princes, but only for lords and gentlemen. Which was confirmed by the judgment of the late king Francis, when the duke d'Aumale married; for he would not permit his wife to be dressed like a princess on her wedding day, saying, that he would not bestow upon the princes of Lorraine the honours that belong only to the princes of the blood; and that, if they had a mind to appear like princes, they must go out of the kingdom, and do it at their own charges. And the late duke of Guise, who very carefully sued for the place of chief hunter, which before was only possessed by meer gentlemen, was well contented, that his daughter-in-law should have no mantle on her wedding-day (13). We shall see, that Henry II did not tread in his father's steps, and even that Francis I was not always so strict on that head. The late king Francis, (they are la Planche's words) at the entry of queen Alienor, was willing that Mademoiselle de Guise, afterwards queen of Scotland, should be dressed like a princess; but, when her brother married, he plainly made it appear, that he would not have it to be made a precedent. And if the late king, at the solicitation of the dukes of Valentinois, (to whom all those of the house of Guise, that are now living, are indebted for their grandeur) altered the ancient custom, which was, that no maid should be dressed like a princess on her wedding-day, unless she was the daughter of a prince of the blood, or married to one; it is certain, that, if he had lived, he was resolved to humble them sufficiently. There are two other particulars in Lewis Regnier's discourse, that deserve to be inserted in this place. The late M. de Saint Paul never heard the duke of Guise, Claudius de Lorraine, stile himself prince, but he smiled, and told some persons about him, that he spoke German in French; and that whenever he had a mind to call himself a prince, he should add, of Lorraine, to speak proper French (15). This is the first particular: here follows the second (16). * It has been an ancient custom of our parliaments, especially of that of Paris, to prevent any one's assuming the title of prince in those courts, unless he be one of the royal blood. Which was confirmed, with respect to Messieurs de Guise, pleading before the late president Lizet, who told their advocate in a full court, that the title of prince belonged to none in France but to the princes of the blood, and ordered it to be struck out immediately (17).

[D] He signalized himself . . . particularly at the battle of Marignan. Francis I obtained a victory over the Swiss at Marignan in the year 1515. Claudius duke of Guise, who commended the Lanque-nets in the absence of Charles duke of Guelderland, his uncle, was trampled under foot. A German gentleman belonging to him saved his life, and lost his own, by covering his body, and receiving the blows levelled at him (18). See Father Anselme (19) who describes the thing more to the advantage of the duke of Guise.

(11) That is, Claudius duke of Guise.

GUISE (FRANCIS DE LORRAIN duke of) eldest son of the foregoing, was one of the greatest captains of his age. He did very important services to the state, by defending Metz against the emperor Charles V, and by the taking of Calais, and on several other occasions; but it may be said, that the evils he occasioned do infinitely exceed the advantages he procured to France by his valour and conduct. His ambition, and that of cardinal Charles de Lorraine his brother, which was still more exorbitant than his, brought a dreadful desolation upon the kingdom: besides, the bloody spirit, wherewith they were animated against the Protestants, occasioned the civil wars, which brought France so often to the last extremities. That hatred was at first a meer political pretence; for had they had a prospect of a better fortune among the Reformed, they would doubtless have sided with them [A]; but at last it proved a true hatred. The greatest

(1) Intituled, Le Prince de Condé.

[A] If the Guises had had a prospect of a better fortune among the Reformed, they would doubtless have sided with them. The author of a short romance (1), which came out in France in 1675, introduces the prince of Condé speaking to admiral Chatillon in the following manner. Does the religion you are of, and which I profess, only because the Guises make profession of another, (for I shall not scruple to tell you, that if they turned Protestants, I would turn Catholic the very next day) I say, does that religion forbid to love the most beautiful woman that can be seen? These words may be an unjust reflexion upon that prince; but it is true, generally speaking, that the heads of great factions resolve upon a thing, only because their competitors are engaged in a thing contrary to it: and it is not to be doubted, that the Guises confirmed themselves in their religion, because their most dreadful enemies were in the other party. If the prince of Condé and the Chatillons had affected a great zeal for the extirpation of the Protestants, and if they had been enabled by that means to oppress the Guises, it is not to be questioned, that the latter would have forsaken the church of Rome to make themselves dreaded at the head of the Huguenots. Some say, they were for some time wavering about it; but Varillas pretends to have very good reasons to deny it. These are his words (2). 'Here I must confute an error, which is the more dangerous, because the best historians have not always avoided it. It is said, that the Guises took into consideration, in the present juncture (3), whether it was more advantageous to them to continue in the Catholic religion, or to put themselves at the head of the Calvinists; and that, after an exact discussion of their interests, they preferred the ancient religion to the new one. Messieurs du Puy, those two brothers, so famous for their great abilities, whispered that matter of fact to all the learned men, who visited them in the king's library, as one of the most important secrets of the French history. They affirmed, that this secret was to be found in the book against the league of Gonzaga, duke of Nevers. They got that book very neatly bound, and kept it with particular care; and yet, when they came to die, that book was examined the more exactly, because several people remembered what they had said of it; but no such thing was found in it. Besides, Marin le Roy de Gomberville, having undertaken to print the memoirs of the duke of Nevers, borrowed the same book. He transcribed it, and inserted it in the first volume of his memoirs (§a). But that pretended deliberation of the house of Guise does not appear in it, tho' Gomberville knew what Messieurs du Puy had said of it. Lastly, all the circumstances of that time shew, that this particular is a chimerical thing; for, on the one side, the Guises would have got nothing by turning Calvinists; and, on the other, would have lost all by it. They would have got nothing, since the Protestants, though they had sided with them, would not have been headed by them exclusively of the two first princes of the blood, especially of the prince of Condé, who was too ambitious to yield the command to foreigners, in a faction he had partly formed, having taken all proper measures to do every thing under his brother's name, and to succeed him, in case he should return to the pale of the church of Rome. Besides, supposing the princes of the blood had yielded to the Guises in so nice a point, the three Chatillons would not have done the same, but would have had the general direction of Calvinism, which was afterwards so solemnly bestowed upon them, after the desertion of the prince of Navarre, and the death of the prince of Condé.'

(3) That is, after the death of Henry II.

(§a). Not in the first volume, but in the second. For the rest, the original of this treatise, containing 583 pages in 8vo, has not a word of what Varillas says that Mess. Du Puy boasted to have found in it. It is of the year 1590, without the name of the place, or of the printer, but probably of James Metayer, and printed at Tours, whither that able printer had followed Henry III. REM. CRIT.]

I could easily rest satisfied with these reasons alleged by Varillas, tho' I know, that those, who publish memoirs, leave out, and add, what they think fit (4). I can find no time, in which the Guises might have thought, that their forsaking the Catholic religion would be advantageous to them; and they never had less reason to think so, than in the reign of Francis II. And therefore what ground could there be for the deliberation, which Messieurs du Puy imparted to their friends as a great secret? What seems very likely to me, is, that, if the Guises had found that the Chatillons had a greater interest with the Catholic party than themselves, they would have sided with the Protestants; for, in all probability, self-interest was the only cause of their zeal for the church of Rome, and they expressed a great aversion for the contrary party, only to ingratiate themselves with the populace, and the clergy. What I say concerns the time, when private quarrels and libels had not yet exasperated them: For, at last, when their political hatred made them execrable to the party persecuted by them, they hated it in earnest, and yet they cunningly dissimulated, when some political reasons required it. I have read in one of the pieces that came out at that time (5), that cardinal Charles de Lorraine gave to understand, that by his advice the Sieur d'Aumale, his brother, favoured, as much as he could, the churches of Burgundy and Champagne, according to the edit: 'L'Évêque de Meuse, qui a été causé par les informations données par les Protestants, since the Declaration of the peace, to be burnt, at Chalons, in his presence; that he knew, that Madame de Guise, his sister, was a Protestant, and that she took care, that the Sieur de Guise, her son, should be secretly brought up in the confession of Augsburg: at which, said he, I am not displeased in the least (6). He is there answered, among other things, I know the cardinal for very well, you make some German princes believe, that you take care to have your nephew brought up in their confession; but it is only in order to get him invested with the four baronies of Metz, that he may be made a prince of the empire. To that end, when you paid your last homage, you made him barague the nobility in the German language, to get the love of the country by degrees. Some pages before, he was told in a reproachful manner, that he had, with one hand, given them some cups of gilt silver to the German ministers at Soverne, and executed, with the other, the massacre of Vassy. During the Paris massacre, the duke of Guise barbaured in his house above a hundred Protestants, whom he hoped to bring over to his party (7). The author of the answer to cardinal de Lorraine's Abbrégé, Chron. épist. was a good Protestant. What he confesses, concerning the hatred, which the Protestants had conceived against the Guises, is expressed by him thus: It is, and it will always be, says he (8), the general consent of our churches, to make head against all those, whom you favour, directly or indirectly, and to side with your enemies, whatever quality or religion they may be of. I wonder you are still ignorant of a thing so well known to the Pope, since he lately told the bishop of Auxerre, that he would willingly give a hundred thousand crowns, to make you a Huguenot, being persuaded, considering the mortal hatred we have for you, that we would greatest panegyrist of that duke of Guise cannot clear him of a very unjust and, violent usurpation; for a man may be called an usurper, not only when he usurps the supreme authority, but also when he invades the power that belongs only to the princes of the blood, and deprives them of the share they ought to have in the government of the state, during the minority of a king. But this is what the Guises did under the reign of Francis II, who had married their niece (a), by making an ill use of that prince's weakness, without observing any rules of decency. Nay, it is said, they had a design to put to death the first princes of the blood [B]. That usurpation, attended with a horrid cruelty against the Protestants, occasioned the famous conspiracy of Amboise, whereby their authority was the more encreased. They carried things so far, as to get the second prince of the blood condemned to death; and, doubtless, the sentence would have been executed, and all the Protestants in the kingdom massacred, if Francis II had lived somewhat longer (b). After his death, the Protestants obtained liberty of conscience, by virtue of the edict of January (c); and the Guises, notwithstanding their authority, could not prevent it, as they had done in the assembly of the Notables [C] under Francis II: but they made that useless by the massacre of Vassy. It is in vain to say, it was not a premeditated design; the most flattering historians acknowledge some things, which plainly shew the contrary [D]. That massacre was soon followed

'would forsake our religion, if you made profession of it. Wherefore, since this unanimous design of our churches against you cannot but proceed from a special goodness of God, we ought certainly to hope, that he will prevent the ill effects of your designs which you carry on by a cruel war, against our lives and fortunes.'

Mind these words of Brantome. Cardinal de Lorraine 'was very devout, and for that very reason very much hated by the Huguenots; yet he was accounted a great disssembler and hypocrite. For I have heard him often discourse of the confession of Augsburg, and he seemed to approve it in great measure; which he did rather to please some Germans, than for any thing else. I heard him publicly talk at that rate at Rheims in his mother's presence, the week before Easter (g).' See the remark [2] of the article LORRAINE.

The following passage is not less remarkable. I take it from a piece, which Du Pleffis Mornay wrote, in April 1589, to justify Henry III, for joining with the king of Navarre. He was to answer the clamours of the league about the king's confederacy with the Huguenots. Du Pleffis alleges, not only the king of Spain's alliances with Protestant princes, but also what had been done by the Guises. 'We need not go farther than our leaguers. How often did the late duke of Guise endeavour to treat with the king of Navarre, and those of his party? did he not write to many Protestant gentlemen? let them remember what he used to say: Friend, I am no enemy to thy religion: if one minister is not enough for thee, take two. Who does not know the going backward and forward of the vice-chancellor of Montelmar to Rochelle from the duke of Mayenne; what he made him say, that he was willing to be his servant, that he was no enemy to his religion, that his mother had bred him up in it, that a way might be found for an accommodation; that, upon his word, he would come to him with four horses; that he would give him his wife and children as hostages; at that very time that he was upon his return from Caillon, and made a great shew of devotion and zeal for the Church? and indeed he did not scruple to make use of Lutheran reifiers, who publicly received the sacrament in their own way in his army: and the letters he lately wrote to his agent may be seen, wherein he says, that he has taken up arms to exterminate the sacramentarian Huguenots, but not those of the confession of Augsburg, whom he loves and intends to preserve; and yet they have not been less condemned by the Pope than others, and they were the first, who rose up against the church of Rome (10).'

[B] It is said he had a design to put to death the first princes of the blood. 'One cannot read without horror what was said at that time (11), and printed since. That the Guises, being afraid of the king of Navarre's resentment, and being of opinion that their authority would never be settled, as long as there should remain a prince of the blood to oppose it, undertook to make away with them; and that the method they had pitched upon was such, that, if their design had succeeded, all the royal family would have been destroyed. That the king, to whom they gave to understand, how important it was not to suffer a prince to live, who might revenge the death of the prince of Condé, was to send for the king of Navarre into his chamber. That he should upbraid him with the crimes of his brother in very sharp words, and tell him he had just reasons to complain of him too. That the prince would boldly deny the thing, or at least vindicate himself too warmly; whereupon he should be stabbed by some men lying in wait, to whom the king should make a sign. It is further said, that this prince was informed of the danger he was threatened with, and that, after he had been a long time uncertain what he should do, he resolved to venture himself; and that, as he was going into the king's chamber, he told one of his most faithful servants; If I happen to sink under the multitude and treachery of my enemies, take my bloody shirt, and carry it to my wife and to my son. My blood will suggest to them what they ought to do, to revenge my death. That, afterwards, he went to the king, who either durst not, or would not, give the signal agreed upon; and that Guise, being vexed at the ill success of that attempt, cried out to those, who were with him: Oh, what a poor prince have we got! (12).'

[C] As they had done in the assembly of the Notables. It was held at Fontainebleau, in August, 1560 at Paris in 1681, pag. 78, Dutch Edition. (13) The admiral presented a petition in the name of all the Protestants of France, wherein they desired to have churches for the public exercise of their religion. John de Monluc, bishop of Valence, voted for the admiral; but the duke of Guise, and the cardinal his brother, did so violently oppose that petition, that it was rejected. They were like to establish an inquisition in France (14). They used their utmost endeavours towards it; and the chancellor, in order to ward off that blow, betought himself of proposing to the king the edict of Romorantin, which was very severe against the Protestants. From whence it appears, that all the calamities of the civil wars of those times ought to be imputed to those two brothers. They opposed the granting of liberty of conscience to the Protestants; they promoted persecution, and introduced bloody maxims into the kingdom, contrary to the most essential and most indefeasible right that a man can enjoy, and which sovereigns ought to look upon as the most inviolable.

[D] The most flattering historians acknowledge some things, which plainly shew, That the massacre of Vassy was a premeditated design. Varillas owns (15), I. That the duke of Guise, and the cardinal de Lorraine, not doubting, that the civil wars would quickly begin, and that the Catholics would obtain the victory, provided the German princes did not side with them, went privately to Saverne, where they had an interview with the duke of Wirtemberg. II. That they omitted nothing, that might raise a jealousy in the Lutherans, about the progress of Calvinism, and make them believe, that they were going to ATTACK IT in France, (mind these words, for they shew there was a design to begin the acts of hostility) only to endeavour afterwards to re-unite the Lutherans with the holy see by gentle means (16). followed by a religious war, as the Guises expected. The success of that war proved fatal to both parties, and consequently very pernicious to France. The Guises were the only gainers by it. Our duke of Guise had the art to engross to himself all the glory of the battle of Dreux; and, in all probability, the taking of Orleans would have enabled him to destroy the reformed religion, when he was assassinated by Poltrot. He died of his wound (d) the 24th of February 1563, at 44 years of age (e) [E]. It is said, he protested upon his death-bed, that he had no hand in the massacre at Vassy (f); but I doubt whether such a protestation can counterbalance the proofs we have of the contrary [F]. The writers of his party do very much commend him for a Christian maxim, which he would use his interest with those of his party to obtain their consent, in order to prevent Calvinism's taking root in France, they returned to Joinville, where they intended to have some diversion for some days (17). IV. That the duchess-Dowager of Guise, their mother, who lived a very retired life at Joinville (18), used her interest with them, to persuade them not to suffer any longer so near them the temple of Vassy, whose contagion would quickly reach Joinville. V. That the duke of Guise being resolved to comply with his mother's desires, as far as he could do it without infringing the edicts, went through Vassy with cardinal de Guise his youngest brother (19). VI. That he was far from having any violent design, since he supposed that his bare presence would be sufficient to prevent the assemblies of the Calvinists, wherever he should be. VII. That he came to Vassy the first day of March 1562, and that being forced to interrupt his prayers during mass, because the Calvinists, whose temple was very near the church, fell a singing their psalms . . . he sent them them word, that he desired they would leave off singing for a quarter of an hour, assuring them they might afterwards go on, because mass would be over by that time.

I need only make two reflexions upon this account. I. It plainly appears from it, that the duke of Guise designed to have the edict repealed, and took measures to attack the Huguenots; and that, besides this general disposition, he passed through Vassy, only after he had promised his mother to comply with the great desire she expressed, that the heretics should not preach there. It is not therefore likely, that he went to Vassy, without a premeditated design of using violent means against the Protestants. II. Varillas could not dissemble the truth, without putting together some facts that contradict one another. For, in the first place, how could the duke of Guise have performed his promise to his mother, if he had intended, that the Calvinists should freely sing their psalms, as soon as the mass was over? This is a contradiction; and therefore it must be confessed, either that he never acquainted the Calvinists, that he had no design to disturb them in their pious exercises, or that he did not go to Vassy, in order to satisfy the duchess-dowager of Guise, or that he sent a false message. The last thing is so unworthy of a man of honour, that it cannot be imputed to the duke of Guise, if one has a mind to justify him; and therefore we must stick to the other two, both which contradict Varillas; so that the duke of Guise cannot be justified, without giving the lie to the historians, that are most favourable to him. In the second place, it is not true, that the duke supposed his presence would be sufficient to prevent the assemblies of the Protestants. He knew that people, as greedy of sermons as they were, who had purchased the liberty of preaching at the price of so many persecutions and capital punishments, would not renounce their privilege by reason of his presence. Thirdly, had that duke supposed, that his presence would prevent their assemblies, he could not have gone thither, without infringing the king's edicts; from whence it plainly follows, that he contradicts himself, in Varillas, when he supposes, that his bare presence will prevent the Protestants meeting at Vassy; and yet that he will comply with his mother's desire no farther, than he can do it without infringing the edicts. It was impossible for him to satisfy his mother without breaking that assembly; and Varillas owns, that at least he intended to break it by his presence. Besides, he could not break it without acting against the last edict; and therefore he is represented as acting inconsistently. Historians may be commonly reduced to this extremity, when they endeavour to throw a veil over the most glaring truths.

I might add several particulars (20), whereby it plainly appears that the duke of Guise intended to get the edict of January repealed; but we need only consider what he himself confessed, as we find it in Davila. When the tumult of Vassy was over, the duke of Guise sent for the judge of that place, and severely reproved him for allowing the Huguenots such a pernicious liberty of meeting together. The judge acknowledged, for his excuse, the king's edict, whereby those assemblies were permitted. The duke, being no less angry at that answer than at the thing it self, laid his hand upon his sword, and said, the edge of this sword shall quickly cut that edict, so closely fastened. It is nature that speaks on this occasion; and it is not the first instance of a fit of anger that has betrayed the greatest dissemblers. Those words did not fall to the ground; they were alleged as a strong proof of the violent designs of the duke of Guise. Davila makes that observation. His words are these. Finito il tumulto, il Duca di Guisa, chiamato a se l'ufficiale del luogo cominciò con gravi parole a riprenderlo, che permettesse in danno de' passaggieri questa pernicioza licenza: E' iscusando egli di non poterle impedire per la permissione dell' editto di Gennaio, che concedeva le radunanze pubbliche a gli Ugonotti, il Duca sdegnato non meno della risposta, che del fatto, messa la mano su la spada, replicò pieno di colera, che l'editto così strettamente legato, presto si troncarebbe con il filo di quella: dalle quali parole dette nell' ardore dell' ira, e non trascurate da quelli, ch'erano presenti, molti poi l'arguirono per autore, e per macchinatore delle guerre seguenti (21). The Protestant historians afford many other circumstances against the duke of Guise. If it be said, that they ought to be mistrusted, coming from such hands, what can one say against Davila?

[E] He died . . . the twenty fourth of February 1563, at forty four years of age. Father du Londe, tho' an exact man, knew not the true time of his death: he places it on the twenty sixth of February (22). The mistake, which remains still in Moreri's dictionary, is much more considerable. The death of that duke of Guise is placed therein the year 1553 (23). I wonder Mr de Valincourt mentions neither the year nor the day of that death, nor the year of the birth, in the life published by him in 1681 (24); but I am more surprised still, that he makes him fifty years old.

[F] I know not whether such a protestation can counterbalance the proofs we have to the contrary. We know no longer what to think of the protestations of dying people: the authors, who have written for and against the conspiracy declared in England by Titus Oates, produce some accused persons, who protested to the last breath, that they were innocent, and some witnesses, who did the same. The accused, or the witnesses, must needs make false protestations at the point of death; so that the depositions of dying people cannot afford us a fence against Scepticism (25). The sentence of Lucretius, that men, at last pull off the mask, at the point of death (26), is not always true. A false shame does often attend us to our very graves; and the love of glory, the idol of great men, does frequently oblige them to conceal all their life-time what might blot their reputation. The power of a prevailing passion is so great, that the prospect of approaching death is not always able to put a stop to it. This was observed in Tiberius as to dissimulation, his darling quality. Jam Tiberium corpus, nondum dissimulatione deserebat. Idem animi rigor, sermone ac vultu intentus, quaestis interdum comitate, quamvis manifestam defectionem tegebat (27). — *Tiberius's strength and limbs began now to fail him, but not his dissimulation. which they say he alledged against a Protestant, who had a mind to kill him. That maxim was not very well placed in his mouth [G]. It were to be wished, that the Protestants had not printed so many libels and satires against that duke, and the cardinal his brother [H]; wherein they acted neither according to the rules of the gospel, nor tion of courtesy, covered a too plain decay. The history of the duke d'Epemon affords another instance of what I say. He was a very haughty man, and his haughtiness appeared all along in all his words and actions. The very day on which he died, he made it appear, that he was still animated with the same spirit, though a sickness, and a very old age, had prodigiously weakened him. A clergy-man, who attended upon him, having made him say, that he forgave his enemies, and all his domestics who had displeased him, bethought himself of asking him, whether he asked pardon of his domestics, whom he might have offended: the reason why he put such a question to the duke was, because, some few days before, he had ill used a person, who was in his service. He expressed some uneasiness at such a proposition, and answered with an angry tone, that it was enough for him to forgive those, who had displeased him, and that he never heard any body say, that, in order to die like a good Christian, a master ought to beg pardon of his servants (28). The duke of Guise, who is accused of the massacre at Vassy, having made it his business all along to save appearances, and pretending to more probity and candor than the other courtiers, said, and protested a thousand times, that he was innocent of that massacre; and his interest required he should make such a protestation; because, if he had owned the thing, he would have declared himself to be the first cause of the calamities of France, and would have been publicly detested upon that account. He was therefore engaged to protest the same thing to his last hour, not only for fear his memory should be detested by all those, who abhorred the civil wars, but also for fear all Europe should know, that he had been a liar in all the protestations he had made, that he had no hand in the slaughter committed at Vassy. Few ambitious men can resolve to retract, when a retraction is so shameful.

But this is not the only thing that can be said against the last words of dying people; most things that are told of them may be called into question, because they are only grounded upon the testimony of suspected persons (29). Who can assure us, that a man made such a declaration when he was dying, and that his friends or relations, who are concerned in his glory, do not ascribe those words to him, in order to make the world believe, that he was innocent of there is nothing more easy than to give out, that such a man declared such a thing, when he was a dying, and that those, who saw him die, say so. If it be a thing, wherein the public is concerned, the news of it will be spread all over a great town in an hour's time: every body writes it to his friends; none goes about to enquire into the truth of it; it is immediately printed in the gazette; and you may be sure, that, as long as the world lasts, the declaration of that dying man will be alledged, with as much confidence, as if it had been verified by the most strict enquiries of magistrates. In order to shew how little those declarations ought to be depended upon, we need only consider how that of the duke of Guise is related by Maimbourg and Varillas, two famous historians, who published their works much about the same time. The first affirms, upon Brantôme's authority, that the duke protested he had no hand in that disorder, and yet begged God's pardon for it (30); but the other assures us, that he prayed GOD to forgive him all his faults, except that of Vassy (31). Reconcile these two things if you can; and remember, that the Catholics were highly concerned to make the world believe, that the duke of Guise had made such a protestation upon his death-bed. They were thereby enabled to deny what the Protestants continually upbraided them with. What will not men do, to confute such things, when they are influenced by a religious hatred?

[G] That maxim was not very well placed in his mouth. Here follows a reflection of one of the Protestant Authors, who have written most vehemently against the French Dragoons (32). 'It is said, that, during the siege of Rouen, a Protestant gentleman being brought to him (33), who had a design upon his life, and who had confessed, that it was not out of hatred to him, but that he thought he was bound to do it, to serve his religion; the duke dismissed him, telling him, Get thee gone: if thy religion commands thee to assassinate those, who never offended thee, mine will have me to give thee thy life, though I may justly deprive thee of it; judge which of the two religions is the best (34). This answer might be looked upon as a wife and Christian one, if the duke had not been a Catholic, and at the head of a persecuting army; but, when I consider, that they are the words of a persecutor, he must needs be laughed at, as a man who acts the part of a comedian, and sports with religion, who, out of vanity and bravado, forgives a private man that deserves death, whilst he exercises a wild and abominable cruelty upon a great body of innocent people. Was not this duke of Guise of the same religion with Francis I, and Henry II? did he not approve and advise the edict of Chateau-Briant, and that of Romorantin, whereby the Protestants were to be put to death? did he not use his utmost endeavours to establish the Inquisition in France, whereby, properly speaking, there had been a continual slaughter of men, and a court of justice always sitting, and surrounded with executioners? was he not the chief promoter of the design, that was broke by the death of Francis II: which was to send troops into all the provinces, and to require, that every French-man should subscribe a formulary, and that those, who should refuse it, should be expelled the kingdom, (which was the mildest punishment) and deprived of all their estates? but how many would have been put to death? again, was it not the same duke, who suffered his men to slaughter many Protestants at Vassy, whilst they were praying to God in a barn? in a word, was not his obstinacy, in having those poor people always punished with death, the cause of the civil wars of religion, which had never been in France, if they had been allowed to serve God in their own way? did he not do it out of a religious zeal? would he have done it, if he had been a heathen? would he not have tolerated the Protestants as well as the Papists? was not what he did approved by the Pope and the clergy? how then could he say, that his religion enjoined him to forgive them, who offended him, since it put him upon persecuting and tormenting a thousand ways, a vast number of people, who did him no harm, and only desired to serve God according to the dictates of their conscience? such is the enormous and comic turpitude of a persecuting religion. A man of such a religion will not scruple to protest, that, for his own part, he forgives a man of a different religion the injuries he has done him; and yet he sends him to the gallows, or to the gallies, under pretence, that he does not hold the true faith, even tho' that person had been serviceable to him. Indeed that duke little thought of what he said, since he durst compare the two religions together, and prefer his to the other in point of charity. The gentleman, who had conspired against him, thinking that his death would prove advantageous to the Protestant religion, did not follow the true doctrine of his party; for all Protestant divines say, preach, and maintain, that it is not lawful for any man to assassinate any body, in order to procure some advantage to his religion: but the duke, pursuant to a doctrine approved, and a thousand times commanded in his religion, voted in the king's council for publishing edicts, whereby a vast number of good people should be condemned to death, and made it his business to extirpate the Protestants by the most violent methods. Is it not a jest for a man, thus disposed, to boast that he professes a religion, which enjoins him to forgive? I beseech the converters to consider this. Their conduct is such, that the finest maxims of Christian morality, when alledged by them, are trifling and comical, or perfect nonsense.

[H] It were to be wished the Protestants had not printed so many libels and satires against this duke and his brother. In the assembly of the Notables above above-mentioned, cardinal de Lorraine said, haughtily, that he gloried in being hated by the Huguenots, and exposed to their fury; that they had dispersed in Paris, and from thence in all the provinces of the kingdom, a vast number of libels, full of outrageous words, and furious threatnings against him, and the duke of Guise his brother; that, for his own part, he had twenty two in his hands, which he carefully preserved, and that he took delight in showing them, as being so many shining proofs of their zeal for religion, and of their inviolable fidelity to the king, who had been pleased to make them his ministers (35). I repeat it again, it were to be wished the Protestants had not published so many satirical pieces; they are to this day prejudicial, by reason of the reflections they afford to the missionaries. To give an instance of it; Maimbourg did not fail to make a malicious and satirical observation on what was said by the cardinal concerning those libels. 'And indeed it is manifest, that it was the usual stile of the Huguenots, at that time, to revile unmercifully, by a thousand scandalous libels and impudent satires, all those, who did not favour them, without any regard to merit or quality, and without sparing kings, princes, prelates, and what is most sacred and inviolable among men. For my part, I can affirm, that I have seen a large collection in ten volumes in folio, made up of those sorry pieces, which the Huguenots published at that time against Henry II, and Francis II, against queen Catherine, when she was not inclined to favour them; against the king of Navarre after he had sided with the Catholics; but especially against the duke of Guise, and cardinal de Lorraine archbishop of Rheims; wherein they brutishly inserted, without judgment and wit, the most heinous calumnies and accusations, that can be invented by the most malicious and slandering men. So that any one who has never so little honour and good sense, cannot peruse those foolish and insolent writings, without expressing the utmost contempt for them, and a just indignation against those impudent writers (36).' Such are the odious reflections, which Maimbourg made upon those libels. Those, who answered his history of Calvinism, did not fail to confute them. He adds (37), that cardinal de Lorraine, whose greatness of soul answered the greatness of his wit, did not revenge himself upon those libellers, but by a noble contempt of their weak fury: notwithstanding which, the magistrates, pursuant to their duty, apprehended some of them, who were dealt with according to the utmost severity of the laws; whereby it is enacted, that they be used as public poisoners. And indeed two of them were hanged, viz. the author (38) of one of those wicked libels, entitled, Le Tigre, and he who sold it underhand.

[I] These kind of writings exasperated more and more a most potent enemy. Maimbourg is in the wrong to say, that the cardinal de Lorraine, having a great soul, did not revenge himself upon those libellers but by a noble contempt; for can there be a more violent and unjust vengeance than this? he made no enquiry after the private authors of those libels, which is all that Maimbourg can pretend to say; but he exterminated, as much as he could, the whole body of the Reformed; he was the great promoter of penal laws, and of the capital punishments inflicted upon them; he endeavoured to bring them under the cruel yoke of the inquisition. Was it not a more cruel vengeance, than if he had been contented to get the authors of those satires punished? it will appear from what follows, that it is not true, that he stifled his resentment against those writers. Castelnau, quoted by Maimbourg (39), makes this observation: The Huguenots published continually several injurious libels against the house of Guise. Whereupon a printer was apprehended, who had printed a small book, intitled, Le Tigre, the reputed author whereof, and a merchant, were hanged upon that account. This account is not exact; we are not told what became of the printer, and it is not true, that the person suspected of being the author of that book was hanged. Castelnau should have said as la Planché does, that the printer and the vender were hanged; but neither of them was the reputed author. I shall set down that historian's own words (40). 'The parliament made a strict inquiry after those, who printed and sold the pieces, that were handed about against the Guises. They spent some days in it, with so good success, that they came to know, at last, who had printed a small book, very satirical, intitled, Le Tigre. A counsellor, called du Lion, was intrusted with that employment, which he willingly accepted, being promised an office of president in the parliament of Bourdeaux, which he might sell if he thought fit. The printer, called Martin l'Homme, was found out with the book in his hands. Being asked from whom he had it, he answered, he had it from an unknown person; and at last he accused several people of having seen and read it; they were persecuted for it, but they made their escape. As they were carrying that printer to the place of execution, a merchant of Rouen, who was a man in pretty good circumstances, seeing the mob very much incensed against him, said only to them, good people, is it not enough for him that he must die? Let the executioner perform his duty. Will you torment him more than his sentence imports? (Now he knew nothing of the crime, for which he was to be hanged, and was lighting from his horse at an inn hard by). He had no sooner spoke those words, but some priests came up to him, calling him a Huguenot, and that man's accomplice; and immediately the mob fell upon him, and beat him unmercifully. Whereupon some officers of justice came to him, and, to refresh him, carried him to goal, whither du Lion forthwith repaired, and asked him several questions about the book, intitled, Le Tigre, and what he had said to the mob. That poor merchant swore he knew nothing of the book, and had never seen it, nor heard of the Messieurs de Guise; adding, that he was a merchant, and minded nothing but his own concerns.' He protested, that the man that was going to be hanged was wholly unknown to him; but that he had been moved with pity, and had exhorted the people to let the executioner perform his duty. He desired his life and conversation should be inquired into, submitting to every body's judgment. Du Lion, without any further proceedings, made his report to the parliament, and to the judges deputed by them, who condemned him to be hanged in the Place Maubert, where the printer had been executed. Some days after, du Lion, being at supper, in a great company, fell a jesting upon that poor merchant. His own words were made use of, to shew him the injustice of that sentence. How can it be helped? said he; there was a necessity to give some satisfaction to the cardinal, since we could not apprehend the author, otherwise we had never been quiet. Judge whether the Guises were unconcerned at the satires published against them: the following passage of Brantôme shews how tender they were on that point. 'Many libels came out at that time (41) against those, who governed the kingdom; but none was sharper and more offensive than an invective, intitled, Le Tigre, (in imitation of Cicero's first invective against Catiline) because it mentioned the love-intrigues of a very great and handsome lady, married to a great man related to her. If the author had been apprehended, if he had had ten thousand lives he would have lost them; for that great man and that great lady were extremely vexed and almost distracted at it (42). I have said in another place (43), that Francis Hotman was accounted the author of that satire.

[K] . . . and gave him a pretence to keep up his hatred, and increase the persecution. Though you make the Guises never so wicked, yet it is certain, that the libellers imputed to them many things, which they had not done. Whoever goes about to write, without having been concerned in public affairs, or without consulting good memoirs, will unavoidably advance many falsities, if he writes against a man, by whom he has been ill used. Such writers are willing to revenge themselves, and to defame their persecutors: being thus disposed, they believe whatever they hear; and, though they do not even believe it, they think they patience of some private persons, and their itching desire of writing satirical books [L]. This duke of Guise had been made duke d'Aumale, and governor of Dauphiné, in the year 1547 (g). He was knight of the order, high-steward, great-chamberlain, and grand veneur of France (h). His barony of Joinville, which was under the jurisdiction of the town of Vassy (i), was erected into a principality in 1552 (k), and some villages belonging to the same town were added to it (l). He married Anne d'Este, daughter of Hercules d'Este, second of that name, duke of Ferrara, the 4th of December 1549 (m), and had several children by her. they may lawfully publish it, since they have heard it. Now, when those who are defamed in those libels, consider, that they are charged with crimes of which they are perfectly innocent, they look upon the authors and approvers of them as men without honour and conscience; they think they can never hate them too much, and fancy there is no harm in exterminating such calumniators, or favourers of calumny. It is therefore certain, that those, who publish such defamatory libels, vent their spleen, and give a free scope to their zeal, with great imprudence. The whole party pays too dear for it.

[L] It would be unjust to ascribe to the whole body the impatience of some private persons, and their itching desire of writing satirical books. We may judge of the XVIth century by the present time (44). We know, that those, who every day publish a vast number of anonymous libels, make no figure in the world.

(44) I write this in 1695.

They live in such an obscurity, that the most curious inquirers cannot find them out; and, when some of those writers come to be known, it frequently appears, that they are neither good Christians, nor honest men. I am persuaded, that most of those, who wrote those many libels, whereof Maimbourg pretends to have seen ten large volumes, were the less noble parts of the reformed church of France. Most of them were unknown, and never owned by the party, and it was not necessary they should be many. Five or six men naturally satirical, who have nothing else to do, and get some money by it, will fill a large kingdom with their libels in less than thirty years. Is it reasonable to impute to a great body the faults of a few men? In order to have a right notion of them, it is not sufficient, to say, that they are credulous; it must be further said, that they are cheats: they publish many things, which they know to be false; for they themselves invent them. Here follows a passage of Mezerai concerning such impostures (45). 'Some have been of opinion, that those memoirs (46) were supposititious; and the most equitable persons thought, that, if they were true, they only proceeded from the deep melancholy of that advocate, who, having received some injury from the Huguenots, was extremely incensed against them. It is highly probable, that those memoirs were forged by the Minions, or the Huguenots, or by the queen-mother, all mortal enemies to the Guises; and it is certain they invented many other calumnies to make them odious. The Guises took care to be even with them; and therefore little credit ought to be given to the writings, or relations of that time, unless they be thoroughly examined.'

(46) That is, those of the advocate David, concerning the execution of the descendants of Hugh Capet, and the restoration of the crown to the Guises, descended from Charlemagne.

[M] He did not believe his wife's virtue had been always unspotted. As to the manner how he died, the bishop of Riez, whose name was Carles, made a very impertinent discourse about it, ascribing to him several theological words, and expressions taken from the holy scripture, which however he had never looked into. Among other things, thinking to praise him, he does a great deal of wrong to the dukes, his widow, to whom he confesses he was not always a faithful husband, which he desires she would forgive, as he forgives her the like (47). This is what I find in a book of Beza. It is not very likely, that a bishop should have given such a turn to the last words of his hero, to the great dishonour of the widow and her children. Wherefore I mistrusted Beza, and endeavoured to consult the book of Lancelot Carles; and, not being able to find it, I desired Mr de Larroque to give me some information about it. He was pleased to send me the following answer. 'The letter of Carles, bishop of Riez, to Charles IX, concerning the last words of the duke of Guise, has been printed three times (48), as it appears from the advertisement to the reader, prefixed to the second French edition; where it is said, that what was printed before this, was but an incorrect copy, which the author, who was present at that discourse, wrote summarily, to serve him for a memorandum. I have not been able to meet with the first edition; and therefore I cannot tell whether what you have read in another book was contained in it. There is no such thing in the second; for that duke speaks to his wife in the following manner. We have been long united by the holy bond of faith and friendship, having all things in common. You know, that I always loved and esteemed you, as much as any wife can be, and that our mutual affection has been the same all the time we have been married, as I always made it my business to convince you of it, and you have done the like to me. I do not deny that the suggestions and frailties of youth made me sometimes take a course, at which you may have been offended: I beseech you to forgive me. I must needs say, that I am none of the greatest sinners in that respect, as I am none of the least, though I am one of the most guilty in the sight of GOD. But you know how respectfully I have behaved myself towards you of late years, avoiding all occasions of giving you the least discontent. Page 84, 85, 86, 87. This passage has been translated into Latin by John le Vieux in the following manner. Nos enim arduissimo matrimonii vinculo conjuncti & consociati sumus, ut individuam non bonorum duntaxat, sed etiam consiliorum & voluntatum sine ulla exceptione, communitatem societatemque servavimus. Et certe ut nihil mihi optabilius, aut antiquius adhibere fuit, quam ut nodum illum amabilissimum sanctæ consuetudinis tenerem; sic me vicissim inviolabili observantia & officio caluissim. page 30.

(47) Beza, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. pag. m. 18, & seq.

(48) Twice in French, and once in Latin. Those three editions came out in 1663.

(49) Lancelot Carles, ubi supra.

Since Mr de Larroque could not find a copy of the first edition, I can say nothing either for or against Beza. Only I may conjecture, that he has not calumniated the bishop of Riez; for the advertisement, prefixed to the second edition, intimates plainly enough, that the first was in great disorder, and that some passages were left out, or placed otherwise. Now, since the Latin translator thought himself obliged to leave out of the second, what remained in it concerning the amorous intrigues of the duke of Guise; it is likely, that Lancelot Carles left out of the first what he had inserted in it, concerning the gallantries of the dukes. Which shews how necessary it is to keep the first editions, and to distrust translators. You see, that John le Vieux, or John le Vieil (49), did boldly leave out whatever concerned the duke of Guise's adulteries, in the original.

(49) La Croix du Maine, pag. 272, mentions one John le Vieil, who might very well be this person.

GUISE (HENRY DE LORRAIN duke of) eldest son of the foregoing, had a certain mixture of good and bad qualities [A], which made him fit to over-turn a state.

(1) Maimbourg, Histoire de la Ligue, lib. i. pag. m. 18, & seq.

[A] He had a certain mixture of good and bad qualities. A modern author (1) describes this character in the following manner. 'He wanted nothing, either good or bad, that was necessary to make him succeed in what he was fully resolved upon. He was a prince, who . . . had all the noble qualities, and all the perfections of body and mind, that are most proper to charm one's heart, and to procure to those, that are endowed with them, an absolute empire over the people; and indeed they were in a manner bewitched with him, and doted upon him. For he was a man of a tall stature, admirably proportioned, state. He wanted no ability, on the one side, to find out the way of doing it; and, on the other, he was wicked enough to put it in execution. He so far indulged his ambition, that, after he had brought a thousand calamities upon the kingdom, he himself was undone by it. He carried things to such extremities, that no other expedient could be found out to put a stop to his attempts, than putting him to death. The manner how Henry III made away with him, and the cardinal de Guise, in the castle of Blois, during the sitting of the states (a), is so well known, that I shall not dwell upon it. I shall only observe, that many historians have advanced a falsity, in saying, that, soon after the execution of the duke of Guise, the Pope's legate (b) spoke to the king so unconcernedly, or rather so cheerfully [B], that it was thought that prince and the court of Rome acted in concert. It may be said, that the violent resolution of the court of France, upon that occasion, was one of those master-pieces of state-policy, which cannot be excused, but because they are absolutely necessary to the public good; for, if the duke of Guise had not been killed,

tioned, and like that which is ascribed to heroes, having all the features of his face extremely fine, quick and sparkling eyes; a large, smooth, and serene forehead, attended with a pleasant smile, more charming still, than the obliging words he spoke to all those, who were fond of approaching him; a lively, clear, and red complexion . . . He had a grave and stately gate, without any shew of pride or affectation; and there was in his carriage a certain air of heroic grandeur, intermixed with sweetness, boldness, and loftiness, without any thing disagreeable; which inspired, all at once, love, fear, and respect, into all those, with whom he discoursed. This admirable outsize was attended with an inside more wonderful still, by reason of the noble qualities of a truly great soul, being liberal and magnificent, sparing nothing to get creatures, and to gain all sorts of people, especially the nobility and military men; civil, obliging, popular; always ready to do good to those, who made their application to him; generous, magnanimous, incapable of hurting any body, even his greatest enemies, except in an honourable way; extremely persuasive, dissembling under the appearance of a great sincerity; wise and prudent in his counsels; bold, quick, and valiant, in the execution; bearing cheerfully all the inconveniences of war, as the meanest soldier; exposing himself to the greatest dangers, in order to succeed in his enterprizes . . . But as there is no gold mine, wherein that precious metal is to be found pure and without mixture of a great deal of earth; so the great natural endowments of the duke of Guise were corrupted by a mixture of many faults and vices; the greatest of which was his insatiable desire of grandeur and glory, and that vast ambition, to which he made every thing subservient; being, besides, rash, presumptuous, and self-conceited, despising the opinion of other men, without seeming to do so; reserved, cunning, little sincere, and no true friend; regarding no body but himself, tho' he was the most caressing and the most officious man in the world; doing no good to any body, but in order to gain his end the more easily; and always covering his vast designs with the specious pretence of the public good, and the preservation of the true religion; trusting too much to his good fortune; blind in his prosperity, which made him relish his present happiness with so much pleasure, that he took no care to provide for the time to come; lastly, too fond of women, whom nevertheless he cunningly made use of, to promote his great designs, though they were not sensible of it. The dangerous spirit of the Guises, which Francis I did so well discover, that he advised his son to beware of it, grew worse and worse in every generation. 'Hoc adverterat Rex Franciscus I. & levius licet quæ tunc ab illis capta, cavenda nihilominus liberis suis edixerat, ut parva ex quibus magnarum rerum motus orientur: nunquam satis fidam potentiam, ubi nimia est, rebus suis prospicerent, nec majores domus eos crearent, quibus mos erat vim principis complecti, nomen remittere. Utinam Henricus II. patris consilium haud aspernando liberis suis consuluisse, nec Guisianos rebus gerendis præfecisset (2). — King Francis I observed this, and cautioned his children to guard against their attempts, though then but trivial, since great commotions might arise from small beginnings; he represented to them that too great power is never to be trusted; he bid them take care of themselves, nor create those mayors of the palace, who were wont to exercise the sovereign reignty, without the name. It were to be wished, Henry II, remembering his father's advice, had consulted the good of his children, and not have placed the Guises at the head of affairs. What an ancient poet said of the Roman people, may be applied to them.

[B] The Pope's legate spoke to the king . . . in a cheerful manner.] There are few facts more proper than this is to confirm the uncertainty of history. I shall mention it, as I use to do, in the very words of the author from whom I have it.

Davila says, that, after that (4), the king, coming down into the court, walked a long time with the legate, to whom he gave an account of all his reasons, which that historian sets down at large, as if he had been present at that long conference, and heard every word the king spoke to that cardinal; whose political reflexions he likewise mentions, and the answer he made to the king's long discourse. For he says, that, for fear of lessening that Prince's affection to the holy see, he assured him that the Pope . . . He adds, that the king promised him upon his oath . . . that he would allow of no other religion in his kingdom than the Roman Catholic. That, after such an oath, the legate did not think fit to proceed further in that conference and, without speaking to him in favour of the prelates that were prisoners, he treated with him with the same confidence as he had done before. Nay, some say †, that his free behaviour towards the king (for sometimes he whispered in his ear, and laughed with him) created a belief, that the king had acted in concert with the court of Rome: and they add, with Davila, that it gave the king occasion to proceed further, and to make away with the cardinal de Guise, perceiving how little the legate was concerned for the imprisonment of the cardinal. This is what those authors tell us very seriously, as a certain truth; that conference, as they say, having been held in every body's sight, in the court of the castle of Blois. And yet nothing can be more false; and the whole narrative of Davila is one of those fictions, which none but a poet is allowed to invent. The proof of it is evident and unsufferable. We have the printed memoirs of the life of the cardinal Morosini, written in Italian very elegantly, and with great force, by Monsignor Stephano Cosmi, archbishop of Spalato, who was pleased to send them to me from Venice above three years ago; and it appears by the letters † of that cardinal legate to cardinal Montalto, nephew to Pope Sixtus V, to whom he gives an exact account of what happened the twenty third of December, and the following days, that, though he instantly desired, at the request of the dukes of Nemours, to be admitted to the king's audience, that day, in the morning, he could not so much as get into the castle, and had not the desired audience but on the twenty sixth, three days after the cardinal had been killed. What will become then of all those fine discourses, and of all the particulars killed, the states of the kingdom would doubtless have done for him, what they had done in former times for Pepin and Hugh Capet [C]: But the transferring of the crown would have been attended with consequences much more fatal to the whole kingdom [D] in the XVIth century, than they were in the time of Pepin and Capet. The party of the duke of Guise was so powerful, that, notwithstanding the execution of Blois, whereby they lost their head, they maintained themselves in such a manner, as to destroy the king himself, and force Henry IV to change his religion. France cannot remember that time without blushing; for there never was any democracy, where the authority and majesty of kings were so slighted, as they were then in that kingdom. The preachers furiously inveighed against the king [E], and represented the duke of Guise of the pretended conference on the twenty third day, and of the cardinal's appearing so easy, or rather so cheerful, and speaking in the king's ear, and laughing heartily, which made people believe, that he acted in concert with the king, who, perceiving his unconcernedness, resolved to proceed further, and to get also the cardinal de Guise put to death? This is writing a history of one's own invention, that is, a meer fable, as two Protestant writers † have done in this particular, viz. d'Aubigné, and the author of the discourse, De ce qui s'est passé à Blois jusqu'à la mort du Duc de Guise; — What passed at Blois till the death of the duke of Guise. And our Catholic historians, being deceived by those Huguenots, have also deceived their readers (5). If historians are so grossly mistaken about things of such a nature, how can we rely upon a thousand things more difficult to be known, which are related by them with so much confidence? this falsity, though confuted by Maimbourg, is still to be found in modern books: I have just now read it in a romantic history of the duke of Guise (6).

(3) Horat. Od. vi, lib. iii.

[C] The States . . . would have done for him what they had done in former times for Hugh Capet. Doubtless the leaguers designed to degrade Henry III, and confine him to a monastery (7), and to place the duke of Guise on the throne. The duchess of Montpensier, sister to that duke, made no mystery of it. She (8) one day told several people, showing them her gold seizars: *, that they would quickly serve to shave the king, that he might be shut up in a monastery, and that the throne, of which he was unworthy, might be filled by a man better qualified to reign and destroy the heretics. That man was her brother. Mr Maimbourg does not deny, that this duke aspired to the crown, at least after the death of the Valois. He entered, into the League, to be the head of a party, which, after the death of the Valois, might raise him higher still. Among other preparations for it, a genealogy had been published, whereby it appeared that the house of Lorraine derived their original from Charlemagne (9). The design of it was to intimate, that the crown would be restored to the descendants of that king, who had been deprived of it by Hugh Capet. The decrees of providence break through all obstacles, Fata viam invenient: but, humanly speaking, it may be said, that Henry III made way for them, by causing the duke of Guise to be put to death; for if, on the one side, the situation of the king of Navarre enabled him to oppose the usurpation with great vigour; it is certain, on the other side, that never was a more favourable concurrence of dispositions to settle the duke of Guise upon the throne. A modern author rightly observes, that nothing but the power of fate could stop that duke. The event, says he (10), made it appear, that providence, which absolutely disposes of empires, designed to take that of France from the Valois, and to transfer it to the Bourbons; and there was a necessity, that whatever could oppose it should yield to the invincible power of that decree, which no conspiracy, no league, no fortune, no earthly power, was able to resist. Apply here what Horace so well says of fortune:

Te semper anteit sæva Necessitas
Clavos trabales, & cuneos manu
Gestans ahenas; nec severus Uncus abest, liquidumque plumbum (11).

Crowns, books, and melted lead, and wedges load her bands.*
VOL. III.

It was the king of Navarre's good fortune, that he, who was so resolute, wanted resolution, when it was most necessary to him; and that he, who was so weak, appeared bold, when he wanted to be so. Those two things saved his crown. Henry III, awaking out of his lethargy, struck a great blow; but the duke of Guise was not bold enough to give up himself to the torrent of his fortune. The league had certainly crooked him, had he accomplished the crime, for which he was justly punished, as great malefactors are when they want resolution. They are the words of the author of the romantic history of that duke. It is certain, and experience confirms it, that the surest way to succeed in such designs, is not to stop, under pretence, that it would be too great a crime (12).

[D] The translation of the crown would have been attended with consequences much more fatal to the whole kingdom. For the prince, who was to be the lawful successor of Henry III, being a man of an extraordinary merit, extremely brave, and supported not only by the Protestants, but also by a considerable number of Catholics; the usurper would have been obliged to fight a hundred battles, in order to maintain himself, and both parties would have fought almost to the last man. Judge what had become of France during such a furious competition: It would have been the stage of the most horrid tragedies; and, to compleat the scandal, religion would have been, not only the pretence, but also the most powerful cause of those bloody operations; and it might have been said more than ever,

Such tragic acts religion could persuade.

When Pepin and Hugh Capet usurped the crown, the circumstances were not the same. The lawful party was so weak, that no body durst stir to support it; and therefore the revolution was not fatal to the kingdom. From whence it may be inferred, that there are certain times, as well as certain places, wherein such undertakings are not so wicked; because the persons, concerned in them, may be morally sure, that there will be little blood spilt; for the lawful possessor will be quickly forsaken by all his friends, or have so few left, that he will not be able to make any resistance; every body siding with the strongest party. I have said more than once (14), that every thing is of some use in a state: The ingratitude of great men, that unfaithfulness, and want of activity, DOLABELLA and many other faults, are sometimes more beneficial to the public, than the contrary virtues.

They (15) changed their sermons into invectives against the king's sacred person, and described so pathetically the tragical death of the two brothers, whom they extolled to the sky, as if they had been martyrs, that all their hearers melted into tears, and broke out into sighs; and †, instead of proposing to them † St Stephen's example, they inspired them with a violent desire of revenge. Inasmuch, that those, who had no mind to cry or sigh, and were offended at such a way so unworthy of the holy ministry of the word of God, were forced to do as others did, for fear of being knocked down. . . . Francis Pigenat, curate of St Nicolas in the fields . . . preaching the duke of Guise's funeral sermon . . . † carried his fury so far, as to ask his auditors, whether none of them would undertake to revenge the duke's murder by killing the tyrant; and to Loyel, move the people, he brought in the duchess, widow

Guise as a martyr, who deserved to be canonized [F]. The people imitated the fury of the preachers [G]: And what was most strange, was, that the Sorbonne applauded the rebellion, and made some decrees altogether republican [H], of which the Protestants did not fail to take advantage. The parliament of Paris heard the complaints of the duke of Guise's widow, who demanded, that Henry IV should be punished for the death of her husband [I]. I shall set down an encomium, which is to be found in

(16) The furious Guineestre, shewing in the pulpit some small silver candlesticks (17), nicely wrought above a hundred years before, in the shape of satires carrying flambeaux, charged the king with being a forcerer, saying, that they were the idols and the figures of the devils, to whom Henry de Valois used to sacrifice in his retirement at Vincennes, and that they had ordered him to murder the duke of Guise, defender of the faith. To which I add, that (18) the curates and confessors of the faction of the sixteen, making a sacrilegious use of the power, which their holy ministry gives them, of binding and unbinding, refused to absolve those, who declared, in confession, that they could not resolve not to acknowledge Henry III as their king.

[F] . . . and represented the duke of Guise as a martyr. The duchess of Nemours was revered at Paris (19), 'as the mother of two holy martyrs; and the little Feuillant, preaching one day in her presence, was so furious as to turn to her, and direct his speech to the late duke in these words: O holy and glorious martyr of GOD; blessed is the womb that bore thee, and the breasts that suckled thee †.' Thuanus says, that this duchess (20), 'entreated Henry III to restore to her the bodies of her sons; but it was represented to the king, that he should not do it, because, the people being so much prepossessed in their favour, his enemies would not fail to make them worship those dead bodies as reliques of saints, which would make the king more odious: so that care was taken to get those bodies consumed with lime, through a precaution much like that whereby God would not suffer the Jews to know where the body of Moses lay. It appeared by the event, that those, who gave the king that advice, were in the right. For, among other extravagances, that were done at Paris, after the death of those two brothers, Thuanus observes, that their effigies at full length were daily carried to the altars, bloody all over, and having a ghastly look *.' See the first passage quoted by me in the following remark.

[G] The people imitated the fury of the preachers. At the same time, that, by virtue of that unhappy decree (21), he was deprived of the title of king, and only called Henry de Valois, he was abused and reviled by the furious mob, all manner of ways: they vented their rage against him by satires, invectives, libels, calumnies, and all sorts of outrageous words, the least of which was that of tyrant and apostate: they fell with a brutish fury upon his arms, his statues, and pictures, which were broke, tore, trampled upon, dragged through the streets, burnt, thrown into the river, with a thousand curses upon him, whilst the duke of Guise and his brother were revered as martyrs, so far as to place their pictures upon the altars (22). Observe what Maimbourg had been saying. As soon as the decree of the Sorbonne was published at Paris, says he, They proceeded all of a sudden to such horrid extremities, and such an execrable fury, contrary to the duty of subjects to their lawful prince, that, tho' our writers have mentioned them, I think it more proper to say nothing of them, than to profane my history with a relation, that would make it unpleasant and odious. An Act (23) of the pretended parliament, sent to all the towns, that sided with the League, increased the fury of the people, who did still worse things than before: nay, some, through an abominable mixture of parricide, sacrilege, and magical enchantments, placed waxen images, like the king, upon the altars, and pricked them in several places, uttering certain diabolical words at each of the forty masses, that were said for them in many churches, to give a greater force to their charm; and when the fortieth mass was said, they pricked them in the heart, as it were to give him the mortal blow (24).

[H] The Sorbonne . . . made some decrees altogether republican. I have said in another place (25) why I use Maimbourg's words; and therefore I shall not excuse my self again for it. Here follows another entire passage of the same historian (26). 'Those, who made up the town-body . . . proposed to the Sorbonne, not only by word of mouth, but also by an authentic Act, signed by the magistrates, and sealed with the seal of the town, these two great cases of conscience: † one was, whether the French were actually free from the oath of fidelity and obedience sworn to the king? The other was, whether they might take up arms and unite themselves; and whether they might raise money, and contribute towards the defence and preservation of the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman, religion in France †, to oppose the execrable designs and attempts of the king and all his adherents, since he had violated the public faith at Blois, to the prejudice of the Catholic religion, of the edit of the holy union, and of the natural liberty of the States. Whereupon the Faculty meeting on the seventh of January, to the number of seventy doctors, after a solemn procession, and a mass of the Holy Ghost, concluded, in the affirmative, upon those two points, with a common consent, and without any opposition; they are the very words of the decree: And that this resolution should be sent to the Pope, that it might be approved by him, and confirmed by his authority; and that he would be pleased to assist the Gallican church, which was under great sufferings, and very much oppressed.' On the fifth of April of the same year 1589, the Sorbonne made another decree, whereby they declare, that Henry de Valois cannot be prayed for in any ecclesiastical prayer, much less in the canon of the mass, by reason of the excommunication he has incurred; and that these words, pro Rege nostro, ought to be left out of the canon, lest it should be thought that he is prayed for, though the priest, directing his intention to some other person, means those that govern, or him to whom GOD designs to give the kingdom. They ordain, that, instead of those words, three prayers, Pro Christianis Principibus nostris †, be said at mass, out of the canon: they were printed, and are to be seen still. Lastly, they add, that those, who shall refuse to comply, shall be deprived of the prayers and rights of the Faculty, out of which they shall be expelled as excommunicated persons; which was unanimously approved by all the doctors. Those republican principles spread in such a manner among the French divines, that Genebrard, one of the principal deputies of the clergy to the states assembled at Paris in 1593, preached a sermon before that assembly, wherein, instead of exhorting the deputies, by the word of GOD, to think only of the preservation of the state and of religion, which is the greatest support of it, he endeavoured to prove, by very bad arguments, that their assembly might change and repeal the Salic law, which is the fundamental law of the state, and has been always inviolably observed from the beginning of the French monarchy to this present time (27).

[I] The parliament of Paris received the complaints of the duke of Guise's widow, who demanded that Henry III should be punished for the death of her husband. What we read in the General Criticism on Maimbourg's History of Calvinism (28), concerning the action brought against that king, is very curious; but what follows is more curious still. It was imparted to me by a very learned man (29), who has collected a vast number of uncommon things relating to learning, and has a wonderful knowledge of all sorts of books, tho' never so scarce and so little known. He was pleased to

[K] I will relate an encomium which is to be found in Balzac's Entretien. I make no doubt that Balzac is the author of it, and that, being a great lover of an hyperbolic stile, he took care to exaggerate the thing. However it be, these are his words:

'France doated upon that man; for, should I say only, that she was in love with him, I should express my self too faintly. It is no wonder if she departed from her duty as she did. Such a passion came very near idolatry: some invoked him in their prayers; others put his cut in their common prayer-book. His picture was every where; some ran after him in the streets to rub their beads against his cloak: and one day, as he returned from Champagne, entering into Paris through St Antony's gate, the people not only cried, long live Guise, but many sung, Hosanna filio David. Some assemblies, that were not small, yielded in an instant to his good mien. No heart could hold out against his face; he persuaded before he spoke a word; it was impossible to bear him an ill-will in his presence. The first glance he cast upon his enemies did immediately remove their animosity against him, and produced such a commotion in their blood, and so strange an alteration in their humours, that afterwards they could not resume their hatred, without animating themselves a long time; and therefore, what I heard a courtier of that reign say, seems to me to be well observed, that the Huguenots were for the league, when they looked upon the duke of Guise. I leave it to history to give an account of his actions, and to carry curiosity as far as his thoughts. I will not take upon me to explain court-riddles, nor do my speculations reach so far. It is enough for me to believe, without pretending to guess, that he must needs have been a very extraordinary man, since his bare name was sufficient, after his death, to continue the war against two potent kings; and since the greatest captain of Europe, the second founder of this state, Henry the Great, of glorious relates a very remarkable thing concerning that marriage [L]. They were mutually unfaithful [M]: and, if we believe that historian, it was not the husband, who revenged himself upon his wife's lover; he was contented to put her into a violent fright [N]. He left many children behind him (e).

glorious memory, took towns, and won battles, only to ruin the interest of a man, who was no longer in being. I will not omit a saying, which you will not be displeased to know. It is separated from the encomium, and ascribed to marshal de Rais's lady. 'Those Lorrain princes, said she, had so noble a look, that other princes looked like citizens to them' (30).

[L] Varillas relates a very remarkable thing concerning that marriage. He says (31), that the duke of Guise being informed, that Charles IX designed to have him assassinated, consulted the duchess of Nemours, his mother, who told him, he could not avoid the misfortune he was threatened with, but by marrying that very same night (32), and that she undertook to get him a wife. She sent for the princess of Porcien, who did not think fit to refuse that match. Thus the marriage was proposed, negotiated, concluded, and consummated, and the duchess proved with child of a son, who was afterwards the fourth duke of Guise; and all this was transacted in the space of four hours. The king, being told of it the next morning, revoked the order he had given to la Tour-Gondy. Were this true, I should wonder that le Laboureur knew nothing of it. He knew several particulars concerning that duchess of Guise. He tells us (33), that the prince of Porcien, not long before he died, desired his wife, whom he suspected to have a kindness for the duke of Guise, not to marry him. You are young, said he to her, rich, and handsome: these qualifications, attended with a noble extraction, will move several persons to court you. I approve your marrying again, and leave you the choice of a husband all over the kingdom, except the duke of Guise, whom of all men in the world I hate most: and I beg of you, that my greatest enemy may not be the heir of what was the dearest to me. He died of a fever at Paris, in the year 1564: and six years after, his widow, having compared the memory of a dead husband with the presence of so great an object as Henry de Lorraine, duke of Guise, was yielded to his merit, and married him. This account, and that of Varillas, are little consistent.

[M] They were mutually unfaithful. The galantries of the duke of Guise are well known: they make part of the description Maimbourg gives of him, as has been seen above. He spent the night before he was assassinated with a lady belonging to the queen, which was the reason why he came later than others to the council: nay, it is thought, that his bleeding at the nose in the council-hall, which obliged him to ask for some sweet-meats, proceeded from his having exhaled his strength with that woman. If you will not take my word for it, believe at least Thuanus, whose words I quote in the margin †, and admire the injustice of that duke. Notwithstanding his being unfaithful to his wife, he could not endure, that she should be unfaithful to him; for he caused a handsome young gentleman, called St Megrin, one of the king's darlings, to be cruelly assassinated, for some reports that went about him and his duchess. ‡. By the king of Navarre's leave, who had some reasons to approve St Megrin's punishment (34), that action of the duke of Guise was a very great crime (35). We shall see, by and by, that an author says, the duke of Guise had no hand in St Megrin's assassination. However, he was thought to be the author of it, at the court of France (36); and the king of Navarre was so fully persuaded of it, that he said; I am glad my cousin the duke of Guise could not endure, that such a spark as St Megrin should cuckold him: all other court sparks, who pretend to make amorous addresses to princesses, should be served in the same manner (37). But the author, I am going to quote, does not deny the love-intrigues of the duchess of Guise; it is true, he does not pretend to warrant the truth of them.

[N] He was contented too put his wife into a violent fright. † Cassade St Maigrin, a gentleman of Bourdeaux, became a favourite of Henry III, merely on account of his beauty. . . . He was so impudent as to say, that the duchess of Guise had prostituted herself to him ‡. The duke of Guise, being of all men the least capable of jealousy, as to women, was not at first informed of the foolish vanity of St Maigrin; but the thing was imparted to his nearest relations and best friends: and all of them were so pressing upon him, that, in order to free himself from their importunity, he promised them to revenge himself first upon his wife, and then upon her pretended lover. Accordingly, he did not lie with her the night following, contrary to his custom; and the next day, he went into her chamber at four o'clock in the morning, with a dagger in his right hand, and a silver porringer full of a blackish liquor in his left. He awakened the duchess, who was fast asleep, upbraided her in a few words with her unfaithfulness; and, with a look and voice, in which she might discover all the symptoms of fury and despair, told her, he left it to her choice to be stabbed or to drink the poison prepared in the porringer (38). The duchess, not being able to prevail with him by her entreaties, took the pretended poison, and drank it off, and, falling upon her knees before her oratory, waited for the moment she should expire: but as that pretended poison was the best jelly-broth that could be made, she was not the worse for it; and in an hour's time, her husband came to her, and told her, how he had been solicited to make away with her, and what course he had taken. The friends and relations of the duke, having lost all hopes of exasperating him against his wife, resolved to kill St Maigrin. About twenty men on horseback waited for him, at his coming out of the Louvre, at twelve o'clock at night, and gave him thirty three wounds with their swords and pistols, most of which were mortal. The king expressed no resentment, because he was told, that a man had been seen among the assassins, who seemed to be the duke of Mayenne, being extraordinary tall, and having hands like a shoulder of mutton.

Take notice, that this duchess of Guise had been a Protestant, during the life of her first husband; but she turned Catholic in the chapel of the castle of St Germain en Laye, at the pressing request of Catherine de Medicis her godmother (39).

[O] He was surnamed Gash-Face. A famous historian makes an observation, which does not seem to me to be right. The duke of Guise, says he (40), gouverneur of Champagne, charged the Reisters, and defeated them near Chateau Thierry. He was wounded in the left cheek with the shot of an arquebuse, the gash whereof remained all his life-time, very glorious with respect to the Catholics, and very advantageous with respect to the ladies, who think that brave men are so every where. He has some reason to say, that the marks of bravery are very acceptable to the fair sex. Madam de Scudery says (41), that the valour is not Gash-Face. the virtue of women, yet it is certain they love it, and sometimes prove unjust to some other qualities for the sake of this, by preferring some men, who are only valiant, to others, who have several virtues instead of one. It is certain, that a gentleman, suspected of cowardice, will be despised by the ladies (42), and that many of them try the courage of their lovers; I mean, that they expose them to quarrels, in order to see whether they will come off with honour. How many rash actions were done in the French armies, in the XVIth century, for the sake of a mistress, and to deserve her favour (43)? Mezerai's observation cannot therefore be criticized in all respects; but it may be said, that the reason he goes upon is not solid. I grant, the ladies love valiant men, and courageous sparks; but it is not because they fancy they are stout every where, but because the reputation of bravery is attended with great glory, in which those have a share, whose lovers have got such a shining reputation: and therefore, when women prefer soldiers to citizens, and warriors of a distinguished valour to common warriors, they show more pride and vanity than lewdness. They think it much more glorious to captivate

the league; and, in that quality, he exercised a power little different from the royal. He might have taken the title of king [P]; but doubtless he had some reasons to content himself with the title of lieutenant-general of the state and crown of France, really attended with an almost despotical authority. He and the league supposed, that the throne was vacant, and so they overturned the most solemn and the most fundamental laws of the kingdom. I shall set down an act, which has been purloined from the records of the parliament of Paris [Q]; whereby it will appear, that, in what concerns the captivate a great courage, than to conquer a peaceful heart. They get a certain advantage by it; whereas the rest is very casual. Some brave men are not to be compared in their armorous embraces to some others, who seldom stir out of doors. Many a Roman, who had made twenty glorious campaigns, and had been loaded with military rewards, was much inferior in this respect to Ovid and Horace (44), and a hundred fops not fit to handle a sword. I do not think the bravest man in France could have disputed this point with Zacachrist, or that the marshal de Rantzau, who bore so many glorious marks of his valour, and whose face was much more galled than that of the duke of Guise, came near the strength of Voiture.

If we go higher, we shall find, that the ravisher of Helena was not the valiant Hector, but Paris, a coward, and an effeminate man; and it will appear, that Homer, who is so happy, and so natural in describing passions, alleges the example of that coward, to cry down the impatience of those, who care for their wives in the day-time. Paris is the only man in his poems that does it. Nay, he is transported with such an impatience, when he should have been ashamed of having just then ran away from the fight. Did not the poet design to denote by it the venerable strength of poltroons? Plutarch does not say so; but perhaps he might have said it, with as much reason as there is in these words of his (45): to which purpose I shall mention what Homer says of Paris, who, running away from the battle, went to bed with the fair Helena; for, since the poet mentions no other man in his poem, that lies with his wife in the day-time, he plainly intimates, that he takes such a piece of incontinence to be a very shameful thing (46). See, in the third book of the Iliad, how Hector upbraided that run-away with his cowardice: Helena spoke to him thus:

Militia est operis altera digna tuis (47).

On war's rough theme thy tongue be ever mute;

Such boasts but ill with such an aspect suit.

To war's impetuous deity unknown,

Soft Cytherea claims thee all her own.

Let the tough hero's arm the jav'lin wield;

Exert thy prowess in love's gentler field.

For thee let Hector, valiant Hector, fight;

Thy courage, Paris, other wars invite.

[P] The Duke of Mayenne exercised a power little different from the royal. He might have taken the title of king. He heard at Lyons, that the duke, and the cardinal de Guise, his brothers, had been murdered, and immediately he went into Burgundy, whereof he was governor (48). He got some troops together, and then marched towards Paris. He was received at Troyes with the same honours that are paid to kings, and acted there like a sovereign, sending commissions to the duke of Guise's creatures, especially to Rojme and St Paul, to whom he sent orders to command in Champagne and Brie (49). He entered Paris the twelfth of February, 1589, where, as if he had been the duke of Guise raised from the dead, the inhabitants expressed their joy to such an excess, that they exposed his picture with a close crown to the public view, and erected a royal throne to him; and, had he been ambitious and bold enough to place himself on it, perhaps he would have found people enough that would have acknowledged him, in hopes of getting some governments, which he would have erected into duchies and countries with homage, as Hugh

VO L. III.

Capet did (50). But he refused that honour, and afterwards would not suffer, that another should be possessed of it. He was contented, first of all, to settle his authority, by making himself the strongest in the council of the league (51). He ordered every thing according to his mind, in spite of the sixteen, and procured to himself an authority very like the supreme power of kings. For the first thing, that was decreed in that new council, was, that, to denote the almost absolute and supreme power bestowed upon him, he should have, till the meeting of the States, the extraordinary and unprecedented title of lieutenant-general, not of the king, for the league acknowledged none then, but of the state and crown of France . . . (52). He took an oath for this new and odd dignity, on the thirteenth of March, in the parliament, who confirmed the patent, sealed with the new seals, that were made, instead of the king's, which had been broken: and, to begin the exercise of his office with an act of sovereignty, he immediately caused new laws to be published, containing twenty one articles, to unite, under the same form of government, all the towns, that were engaged in the league, and those that would enter into it, the number of which proved very great in a little time (53). He took the field, and attacked the king's army more than once: he brought the Spanish troops into the kingdom; and, if he opposed the design of the Leaguers, who intended to make a king, who should marry the Infanta, it was only because he could not be concerned in that nomination, since he was married, and because it was only designed for the duke of Guise, his nephew. He was so obdurate in his rebellion, that he continued to make war against Henry IV. when the city of Paris had submitted to that prince, reconciled to the church of Rome. He did not submit, till he had such advantageous offers made him by the king, that he could hardly have expected so great favours from a prince highly beholden to him (54). The edict, that was made in his favour, is dated at Folembray, the eleventh of January, 1596 (55).

[Q] I will produce an act, which has been purloined from the records of the parliament of Paris. I have a copy of it drawn from the original, signed du Tillet. here is the tenour of that act.

An extract of the records of parliament.

' This day the Sieur duke de Mayenne, lieutenant-general of the royal state and crown of France, the chambers being met together, and the king's council present, having remonstrated to the court the causes of his coming to this city, and leaving a great army; and that since the fourteenth day of the last month, the said court did not sit (56), and there being no president in it, he thought it necessary to come and advise with them about it, in order to appoint four presidents, that this great chamber, and that of the Tournelle, may not remain without heads, and that he may cause patents to be drawn up for those who shall be elected, being not willing to name any of them himself, but referring the whole matter to the said court: whereupon having several times called upon the court to name them, and the king's council being heard, it has been remonstrated to him by Mr Matthew Chartier, dean, and the eldest counsellor, that, upon a vacancy of the said offices, the court was used to nominate some persons to the king, out of which he chose one or two, who were put in possession of them. But now there being no king, and considering the condition the town was in, the said court referred it to him, and desired him to name some: and at last, after many excuses, he has said, that since the court desired it should be so, and according to the prayer he had put up in the morning to God, and his holy spirit, that this affair might be managed with sincerity, he resolved to name, for the office of first president, the Sieur Chartier, eldest

the nomination of the presidents of that parliament, he exercised all the functions of a king. He assembled the states of the kingdom (f), at Paris, in the year 1593. He made an admiral and four marshals of France in that assembly (g), and declared, they had been called together to proceed to the election of a king who should be a Catholic (h). But, when he saw, that he could not be elected, for he was married, and there was a design to elect a prince, who might marry the Infanta of Spain, he dexterously opposed it; which he did the more earnestly, because he knew, that the duke of Guise, his nephew, was the person, whom they intended to make king. He was extremely vexed at that nomination (i). The duchess, his wife, could not endure it, and advised her husband to make a peace with the king, rather than be so base as to acknowledge, for his master and king, that young lad: So she called her nephew, out of contempt. Those, who consider the several attempts of the Guises, cannot apprehend what the Cartesian philosopher, James Rohault, was dreaming of [R], when he wrote the epistle dedicatory prefixed to his Physics.

'counsellor, before named by the court, to be president, whose virtue, integrity, and ability, are notorious to every body; and, for the office of second president, the Sieur Hacqueville, president in the great council; and for the office of third president, the Sieur de Nully, first president in the court of aids, and heretofore invested with one of those offices; and for the office of fourth president, the Sieur le Maître, the king's advocate, having never seen, that he knows of, the said Sieurs Chartier and le Maître, or any other, whom the court shall think fit to name. Which nomination being approved by the said court, the matter being taken into consideration, and, notwithstanding the excuses and remonstrances of the said Sieur Chartier, on account of his age of seventy nine years, of his being sickly, and lately recovered from a great sickness, and because his age requires a quiet life rather than the toils of such an office, it has been resolved, that he shall take the oath of first president in the said court. And having sworn, that in order to be promoted to that office, he has neither given, nor promised to give, or cause to be given, by himself or others, gold, silver, or any thing else; and besides, that he will faithfully and worthily exercise the said office of first president, he has been admitted into it, and has made a profession of his faith to Mr Stephen Fleury, eldest counsellor. Done in parliament the second day of December, 1591. A collation, has been made.' Signed.

'Charles de Lorraine, duke of Mayenne, lieutenant-general of the state and crown of France, to all those to whom these presents shall come, greeting. The greatest sign of the authority and good will of those who have governed states, and what they have been most esteemed for by their subjects, and admired by foreigners, has been their care of establishing and maintaining the two pillars, on which the preservation of all monarchies is founded, viz. piety and justice. Wherefore, since it has pleased God to call us to the management of the affairs of this kingdom, after we have considered, to the best of our power, the regulations necessary to promote the glory of God, our chief intent has been to fill up the places of the chief ministers of justice, with persons of a probity and integrity suitable to those offices. And whereas it has been remonstrated to us, and we are sensible that it is very necessary to fill up the vacancies of the presidents of the parliament of Paris, lest the course of justice should be interrupted, as it has been of late, having resolved to appoint four of them, that both the great chamber of the Pleas and Tournelle may not be without heads: be it known, that, having this day communicated our desires and intentions to the gentlemen of the said court, the chambers being met, and having named the four persons, whom we have thought worthy of those offices, and whom they have approved, as it appears from the act and decree of this day, here affixed under the counters seal; we, considering the good and acceptable services, which Mr &c. For such is our desire. In witness whereof, we have caused the seal of the kingdom of France to be set to these presents. Given at Paris the second of December, 1591, signed Charles de Lorraine; and upon the fold, by Monseigneur, Pericard.'

Mr Marais, advocate in the parliament of Paris, has been pleased to send me the copy he had taken of this act. He has also imparted to me some observations upon my Dictionary, which give me a great notion of his parts and learning.

[R] Those, who consider the attempts of the Guises cannot apprehend what the Cartesian philosopher, James Rohault, was dreaming of.] He published his Physics in the year 1671, and dedicated them to the duke of Guise, to whom he made this compliment.

'Though I had been at liberty to deliberate upon the choice, what profession could I have desired for the natural truths I offer to the public, than that of a name, which has been all along designed for the support of the greatest truths in the world? your ancestors have defended, with a piety that deserves to be ever proposed as a pattern, the divine truths of religion, against the professed enemies of them. Those illustrious heroes maintained the political truths at the expence of their lives; I mean the fundamental laws of the state, and the immutable rights of our sovereigns (§ a) against foreign enemies, and the domestic fury of the rebels. And it was your highness's lot to be moreover the protector of the truths of nature, having in every thing else all the noble sentiments of your ancestors. Nay, we might see still the same zeal shine, with the same lustre, in the person of your highness, were it not for want of occasion under the glorious reign of the greatest and the wisest monarch in the world (§ 57). Should a poet vent the same things, even in very fine verses, it might be reasonably supposed, that he did it for his sins, and to expiate some great crime. This thought of Horace might be applied to him:

Minxerit patrios cineres, an triste bidental
Moverit incestus: certe furit (§8).

Whatever the guilt that drew down such a curse,
'Tis sure the man is mad, and raves in verse.

What then shall we think of a famous philosopher and a good mathematician, who is guilty of such a folly; had he not committed an abominable action, which deserved he should be given over to so reprobate a sense? but, to use him more gently, has he not dishonoured his character by affirming such a palpable lye? I am willing to excuse his Cartesianism as well as I can; and therefore I will suppose, that Rohault did not write his epistle dedicatory as a philosopher: he wholly divested himself of that character, and assumed that of a panegyrist, which is the unlucky fate of those, who write epistles dedicatory. A good lesson to discourage a true philosopher from such a design! I go farther, and I say that this philosopher, when he appeared under a character so foreign to himself, did not wholly cease to be a philosopher; and that, if he vented a gross falsity, it was not through base flattery, but ignorance. It is likely he was one of those philosophers and mathematicians, who relish nothing but natural philosophy and Euclid, and who despise every thing else, and do not vouchsafe to learn the history of their own country. Perhaps it might be further said, that his great application in making experiments against a Vacuum, and upon the various qualities of the load-stone, refractions of light, &c. did not afford him time enough to read Thuanus and Mezerai; which was the reason why he had but this general notion of the history history of the Guises, that they had very much opposed the rebellion of the Huguenots. He was therefore sincere in some measure: but his ignorance, not being invincible, cannot justify him; he might easily have been cured of it. Any one of his scholars might have given him an account of what the Guises did against Henry III, and Henry IV; and the meanest lawyer, or practitioner in the law, might have told him, that their attempts were diametrically contrary to the laws of the kingdom, and a total subversion of the principles most essential to the French monarchy, and a continued series of the greatest crimes of felony and treason, that can be committed. And therefore if he did not speak against his conscience, he deserves at least to be blamed for neglecting to get himself informed about the things he spoke of. I think this is the only fault he is guilty of, and I cannot believe that he acted against his knowledge, to set up for a flatterer; for had he had any tincture of the history of the XVIth century, he would not have been so bold as to praise his patron in the manner he did. Would he have ventured to commend him for being ready to imitate his ancestors, if there was occasion for it? was it not the same thing as if he had said: When occasion offers, your highness will be always ready to raise a rebellion in Paris; to carry on the barricado's as far as the Louvre; to force the king to run away; to expose him to the most violent invectives of the preachers; to bring an action against him in the parliament of Paris; to depose him; to have him assassinated by a monk; to exclude the Dauphin, and all the princes of the blood from the succession; to bring a Spanish army into the kingdom, in order to prevent their asserting their right? &c. I conclude, that Mr Rohault would not have expressed himself in such a manner, had he known, that his words did really imply such propositions; and therefore, if he deserves to be excused for such a fault, it is because he did not know what he said.

I must observe, that the Protestants are not the only writers, who made a disadvantageous description of the actions and designs of the Guises; some Catholic authors have done the same. Read a piece that is ascribed to Lewis Servin, advocate-general in the parliament of Paris (59).

[(59) B] Baptiste le Grain, l. 6. of his Decad of Henry the Great, p. 635. of the edition of Rouen, 1633, speaking of the duke of Mayenne, says, in express terms, that, as much head of the league as this duke was, he would never suffer the fundamental laws of the state to be broken through; and the edict of Poitiers, of the eleventh of January 1596 * praises the same duke for the affection he shew'd in preserving the kingdom entire, which he would never suffer to be dismembered, even when the success of his affairs seemed to offer him the means of doing it: as he has not since attempted, after being weakened. . . . Probably, Mr Rohault, being a better philosopher than genealogist, took for one of this man's descendants, that duke of Guise, to whom he dedicated his Physics, in 1671. REM. CRIT.]

GUISE (CHARLES DE LORRAIN duke of), eldest son of the foregoing, was born the 20th of August 1571. He was arrested with several others on the day of the execution of Blois, and remained prisoner till the month of August 1591, when he made his escape from the castle of Tours (a). The league made bonfires upon it every where, and the Pope gave public thanks to GOD for it. That young prince was received at Paris with great acclamations (b), and not only the people, but also the nobility concerned in the league, flocked to him. He made a strict confederacy with the faction of the sixteen; but this great prosperity proved the ruin of the party, by reason of the jealousy which the duke of Mayenne conceived upon that account. I have mentioned it in the foregoing article. It is said, that the dukes of Mompensier fell in love with that young duke of Guise her nephew [A]. The latter deprived the leaguers of one of their worthies, by killing the brave St Pol with his own hands [B]. He obtained the government of Provence, when he submitted to Henry IV, in the year 1594 (c). He had some employments by sea and land under Lewis XIII (d); but care was taken to prevent his growing too powerful, and he was even obliged to leave France. It was the effect of the wise politics of cardinal de Richelieu [C]. He retired to Florence (e), and died at Cuna, in the Siensese, the 30th of September 1640. He married, in 1611, Henriete Catherine de Joyeuse, the only daughter of Henry de Joyeuse, marshal of France

Here is a passage of Mr Menage (1). 'The dukes of Mompensier was very much in love with her nephew the duke of Guise, son of Henry Gaspar Face. I have formerly seen some passionate letters he writ to him. Hence it is, that, in the Satire Minippée, when every body is placed according to his rank, the herald cries, Madam de Montpensier, place your self under your nephew.' Mr Menage did not recollect all that the herald said: he forgot a very remarkable clause: there is in the Catholicon, Madam Dowager of Montpensier, as princess in your own right, place your self under your nephew. See the reflexions, made upon this, by the author of the new remarks upon this Satire Minippée (2).

(2) At pag. 300, 301, of the edition 1699.

[B] He deprived the leaguers of one of their worthies, by slaying with his own hand the brave St Pol.] Saint Paul, a souldier of fortune, who got his title of nobility by his valour and good conduct in the art of war (3) was one of the four marshals of France, created by the duke of Mayenne, in 1593. That duke, after the death of the duke of Guise, whose creature this captain was, gave him the government of Champagne, where, after he had made himself master of Rheims, Mezieres, and Vitry, he was so bold as to invade the duchy of Retelois, and take possession of it in the quality of a duke, by virtue of a grant he said he had received from the Pope, as the king wrote from the camp before Chartres to the duke of Nevers. And, at last, his intolerable pride, together with the tyranny he exercised in that province, occasioned his being killed by the young duke of Guise, who thrust his sword into his heart, because that prince having very civilly desired him to withdraw the troops, he had put into Rheims to secure it, that pretended marshal, who was resolved to be absolute master of it in spite of him, told him haughtily, laying his hand to his sword, that he would not do it (4). It is no unusual thing for brave men, who revolt against their lawful prince, to be fond of independency. But they frequently find, that the head of the rebellion requires a greater submission than the true master. I believe Henry IV would have been more indulgent to St Paul, than the duke of Guise was. Note, that Mezerai lays all the blame on the duke, who, says he (5), designing to get the spoils of that brave man, picked a quarrel with him in the streets of Rheims, and ran his sword into his belly. The same historian observes, that Saint Pol, the day before the barricado's, saved the life of that duke's father. See how thankful he was for that great service.

[C] He was obliged to quit France. This was the effect of the wise politics of cardinal Richelieu.] A sad experience had been made of the great power of the name of Guise, even when the league was dissolved. That house was in a manner a state within a state, and it was to be feared, that the folly and the wrong zeal of the people would make an idol of it, as often as any religious war should arise. And therefore prudence required, that their credit should be somewhat lessened, which the first minister took care of under the reign of Lewis XIII.

I shall make a remark concerning the duke of Chevreuse, brother to this duke of Guise [E], and another upon the chevalier de Guise [F], who was also his brother, and

[D] By whom he had several children. I shall only speak of his sons: you may see in another place (6) what concerns his daughters. The prince of Joinville, his eldest son, died at Florence, the seventh of November, 1639, in his twenty eighth year, without being married (7). His second son was called Henry: I speak of him in the following article. The third was called CHARLES LEWIS, and went by the name of duke of Joyeuse, and died in Italy, unmarried, the fifteenth of March, 1637. Lewis, their brother, took then the title of duke of Joyeuse; he was born in 1622. He was great chamberlain of France, and he married, at Toulon, in November, 1649, Frances Mary de Valois, the only daughter and heiress of Lewis Emanuel de Valois duke of Engoulême. He died at Paris, the twenty seventh of September, 1654, of a wound he received, in charging a party of the enemies near Arras (8). His son LEWIS JOSEPH de Lorraine duke of GUISE, Joyeuse, and Engoulême, born the seventh of August, 1650, married, in 1667, Elizabeth of Orleans, younger daughter of Gaston of France, duke of Orleans, and died of the small pox, at Paris, the thirtieth of July, 1671 (9), leaving behind him a son, called FRANCIS JOSEPH de Lorraine duke of Alençon, and of GUISE, Joyeuse, and Engoulême, who was born the twenty eighth of August, 1670 (10), and died the sixteenth of March, 1675 (11). With him ended the males of that famous branch of the house of Lorraine. There are still many of the other younger branches of that of Guise. See the last remark of the following article, and observe, that Roger de Lorraine, the fifth son of our Charles duke of Guise, died knight of Malta, at Cambrai, the sixth of September, 1653, being in his thirtieth year (12).

[E] I will make a remark concerning the duke of Chevreuse, brother of this duke of Guise. His name was Claudius de Lorraine, and he was the second son of Henry duke of Guise. He was born the fifth of June, 1578, and his first title was that of prince of Joinville. He signalized himself in 1596, at the siege of la Fere, and, in 1597, at that of Amiens. The king being displeased with him by reason of some court-intrigues, he was obliged to betake himself to the war in Hungary. He was made duke of Chevreuse, and peer of France, in March, 1612, and knight of the HOLY GHOST, the first of January 1620. He served, in 1621, at the sieges of St Jean d'Angely, Montauban, &c. and was honoured with the offices of great chamberlain of France, and great falconer. He was successively governor of the upper and lower Marche, and of Auvergne, Bourbonnois, and Picardy. He married, as proxy to the king of Great Britain, the princess Henriette Mary of France in 1625, and conducted her into England with a magnificent train. He was at the siege of Rochelle, in 1628. He died of an apoplexy at Paris, the twenty fourth of January, 1657, without male issue. He had only daughters (13). He married in 1622, Mary de Rohan, widow of the constable de Luines, and eldest daughter of Hercules de Rohan, duke of Mombazon (14). It is that duchess of Chevreuse, who was so much talked of, during the broils of the court of Lewis XIII, and during the civil-war of Paris under Lewis XIV. Cardinal Richelieu caused her to retire from the court; she made her escape into Lorraine, from whence she went to Brussels. She had leave to return into France, after the death of Lewis XIII, and quickly renewed her intrigues, being seconded by the duchess of Mombazon, her mother-in-law. We shall see some proof of it hereafter (15). She had stipulated during the imprisonment of the princes, that he daughter should be married to the prince of Conti (16); but it came to nothing.

[F] A remark upon the chevalier de GUISE. He was the son of that duke of Guise, who was murdered at Blois in 1588, and was a posthumous child, and called Francis Alexander Paris (17). He killed Baron de Lux, in the streets of Paris, the fifth of January, 1613; and, within a month, he killed the son of the same baron, and was not in the least molested by the court, nor by the judges upon that account: so great was the authority of that house! the writer, I am going to quote, will make us very sensible of it (18). The chevalier de Guise and Baron de Lux, met one morning at St Honore's street: the Baron was on foot (19), and the chevalier on horse-back, who alighted from his horse, and bad the baron draw his sword, as he drew his. The baron dreamed of no such think, and could not imagine, that it was in earnest; however he drew his sword, but with little success; he was grown old, and was no match for a young prince, who had lately made an end of his exercises. And, indeed, the chevalier gave him only a thrust through the body, of which he fell down dead in a shoemaker's shop. As for him, he very sedately got on horse-back again, and went a slow pace to the king's great stables, as if he had done nothing. Thus died baron de Lux, for boasting, as it was said, that he had been one of the council of Blois against the life of the late duke of Guise. . . . He had a son of the same age with the chevalier de Guise, who heard the news of that accident, with the just grief of an only son for the death of his father. . . . Every one talked differently of what he would do if he was in his place, and every one would have found it a very hard matter. He had to do with a prince, whom he must kill, or be killed by him. If he should kill him, he could not expect to be safe in any place of Christendom; and if he should be killed by the person who had killed his father, he would not satisfy his resentment. To have satisfaction done him by justice, rather than by the sword, was not a thing to be thought of. The chevalier was in the Hotel de Guise, from which he would not have stirred, and where no man would have been so bold as to go and ask for him. It is a misfortune for gentlemen to have to do with princes, who are like iron vessels against an earthen one, which cannot strike, without breaking them. However the king ought to do justice to all his subjects, and no prince is exempt from it (20). The young baron de Lux resolved to challenge the chevalier de Guise. The challenge was carried by his gentleman, who worthily performed his master's order. It was a dangerous attempt; for, if he had been known, and his design had been never so little suspected, he would have been thrown out of the highest windows. But he went thither so early, that every body was still asleep. He entered into the chevalier's chamber, and, awaking him in the name of the baron de Lux, most humbly besought him, &c. (21). The chevalier went to the place appointed, and killed his enemy, and returned to the Hotel de Guise, where he was visited by the braves of the court. Several verses were made upon that duel under the names of Paris and Lucidor, because the chevalier of Guise's name was Paris (22). Take notice, that the poets declared for the conqueror. They wrote, that this prince and chevalier,

Poussé d'un vif ressentiment
Avait fait passer vaillamment
Au fil d'une juste cholere
Celuy-là qui s'étoit vanté
D'avoir peu (chere vanité)
Empêcher la mort de son pere (23).

Urged by strong resentment, had bravely sacrificed to a just revenge him, who had boasted (fond vanity!) that he might have hindered the death of his father.

People did not fail to make their observations upon the inequality of success in combats, where justice seemed to be equal. If the chevalier was to have the advantage in the first fight, because he designed to revenge his father's blood; he should have been overcome in the second, because he was to give satisfaction to the son of a man, whom he had killed; and yet he was as successful in the second as in the first. Many people were and who killed, in a very short time, the barons de Lux the father and son, without being brought into the least trouble upon that account [G]. He signalized himself in the were surprized at it, and made serious reflexions upon it. But, generally speaking, such quarrels are decided according to the greater or lesser skill, courage, and strength, of the combatants, or by the concurrence of some fortuitous causes, and not according to the greater or lesser right. I cannot tell whether any body made two other reflexions, which naturally offer themselves. One is, that, taking things strictly, the first combat was contrary to the laws of good chivalry; for a young man, newly come from the fencing-school, and prepared for fighting, to attack an old man, who expects no such thing, who has been a long time without drawing his sword, who has forgot all the fencing rules, in a word, whose legs and arms are weak, is almost the same thing as if two men should attack one, or a boy of sixteen years should fall upon a boy of ten years. The second reflexion is, that Messieurs de Guise were very unjust under the reigns of Henry IV, and Lewis XIII, to revenge themselves so violently upon those, who had been somewhat concerned in the execution of Blois. They had obtained a general amnesty for all their rebellions, and as many favours as if they had done great services to their king. Should they not have been as indulgent to those, who had only executed the orders of Henry III, or had not dissuaded him from an attempt, he thought most necessary for the preservation of his crown? should they not have comprehended it under the general amnesty, which was so advantageous to them? one might make another reflexion concerning those, who bitterly lament the loss, which, say they, the princes and great lords of France have suffered of their authority. The power, say they, is too much concentrated; it should be divided as it was formerly. But why then do they forget the horrid confusions that kingdom was exposed to, when the court was weak, under the minority of Lewis XIII? do they wish for the return of that pretended happy time, when a chevalier de Guise killed a man of quality in the streets of Paris with impunity, and was not so much as obliged to excuse himself to his prince, or the justice of the kingdom.

This chevalier died at Baux, in Provence (24), about a year after (25). He himself fired a cannon that burst, and carried off one half of his body . . . Being carried into the city of Arles the next day, the people, crying and groaning in a strange manner, unnailed his coffin, ripped open his broud, and, finding no alteration in his face, had his picture drawn, and set up in the town-house, as a warning for the living to lament him, and a monument to posterity to preserve his memory for ever. But what is more surprizing still, the two chief towns of that province, Aix and Arles, having a dispute about his body, and each of them striving to have the honour of burying it, could not be reconciled but by this expedient, which was to give his heart to the one, and to leave the body to the other. He was also lamented at court, not only by his relations, but also by the king and the queen-mother, who paid a visit to the duke of Guise, and consoled with him in his very palace. But especially the princess of Conti, his sister, was so afflicted, that the finest pens of that time made it their business to comfort her (26). Here you see a remainder of the idolatry of the French Catholics for the name of Guise. Had none been found of that name, that great scourge of Heretics, but those, who continually endeavoured to live a Christian life, a philosopher would be less surprized at it; but what sort of men were the greatest idolaters of that kind? those, who were most addicted to the common vices, such as lewdness, drinking, gaming, avarice, lying, flanderings, and envy. These are the men, who, to keep up the temporal prosperity of their religion, and to extirpate what they call heresy, carry their zeal beyond all bounds.

[G] . . . Without being brought into the least trouble upon that account.] This plainly results from the narrative I have taken out of the book, intituled, Vrai & ancien Usage des duels. But I will not use this testimony without examining what I find in Bassompierre (27). 'The queen was very angry, when she heard, that the chevalier de Guise had killed baron de Lux. I went at the same time to the Louvre, where I found her weeping; and she had sent for the princes and ministers to hold a council about that affair, which she laid very much to heart. She told me then; you see, Bassompierre, how I am addressed to, and what a noble exploit it is to kill an old gentleman without defence, and without giving him warning. But these are the tricks of that family, like the killing of St Paul (28) . . . The council met in the other hall, whither I led the queen, hap- pening to be near her. That action occasioned great murmurings, and every body was offend- ed to hear, that there was a great concurrence of nobility in the Hôtel de Guise, and that the duke of Guise was to come to the queen well attended. Whereupon the queen was advised to send Mr de Chateau-vieux to the duke of Guise, to forbid him to wait upon the queen, till she sent for him, and to command, in her majesty's name, all the nobi- lity, that were in the house, to retire . . . (29) Mr de Chateau-vieux observed his orders, and, being returned, said, that some had appeared unwilling to retire, and that the duke of Guise had desired them to go away, since the queen commanded it. And, being asked, who those refractory men were, he named three or four, and, among others, Mr de la Rochefoucault. Some incensed the queen against him, who, being master of the king's wardrobe, should have been more willing to obey than any body else; whereupon it was resolved to turn him out of the court. It was also resolved, that the parliament should take cognizance of that affair, and should be informed of it. The queen was somewhat appeased by the quick obedience of the duke of Guise; and because, when the chevalier came to the palace of Guise, after he had killed the baron, the duke had him go into the country. Marechal de Bassompierre adds, 'that the duke of Guise, spoke to the queen with so much respect and submission, that he pacified her a little; but that Madam de Guise his mother spoke so haughtily to the queen, that she provoked her anew; that Mr de la Rochefoucault was ordered to leave the court (30);' that the duke of Guise sided with the cabal of the prince of Condé, and said, speaking of la Rochefoucault; 'yes, by God, he shall come again, and I shall not be beholden to the queen for it (31).' That the queen was so alarmed at the union of the duke of Guise with the prince of Condé, that she ordered Bassompierre to offer to that duke the sum of a hundred thousand crowns ready money, the general-lieutenancy of Provence for his brother, the chevalier, the reversion of the abbey of St Germain for the princess of Conti, his sister, and the return of la Rochefoucault (32); that the duke of Guise accepted those offers, and promised to leave the cabal (33). I shall conclude with these words of marechal de Bassompierre (34). 'Some few days after, the young baron de Lux sent a challenge to the chevalier de Guise, who killed him. I saw one thing more very strange in the changes of the court. The chevalier de Guise having killed the father, the queen ordered the parliament to take cognizance of it, and to prosecute him; and yet, in less than a week after, though he had also killed the son of the said baron de Lux, the queen sent to him, to know how he did after the wounds he had received in this last combat (35).

Bassompierre's account seems to be inconsistent with what I have said in the preceding remark, building upon d'Audiguier's narrative, which contains nothing, whereby it appears, that the judges took cognizance of that affair, or that the chevalier de Guise was brought into any trouble; but at the bottom those two accounts may be easily reconciled. All that can be concluded from Bassompierre's narrative, is, I. That the queen's council ordered that the parliament should take cognizance of that cause. II. That this order continued till the duke of Guise sided with the prince's cabal. But this interval was so short, that it is very likely the parliament did not begin their proceedings, or that they went on so slowly, that few people heard of them; and therefore d'Audiguier is very excusable for making no mention of them. He supposes, that the chevalier lay every night in the palace of Guise, and yet Bassompierre says, that the duke sent him into the country. I believe the duke told the queen, that he had taken such a course with the chevalier; nevertheless I think d'Audiguier is not mistaken. The duke knew

knew well enough, that no commissaries would be sent to his house, in order to see whether the chevalier was there still. And it is to be observed, that all authors are agreed, that the young baron de Lux sent his challenge to the palace of Guise, when the chevalier was in bed. The latter lay therefore in that house, and consequently his absence had been very short, if he had been sent into the country, as the duke affirmed. But what deserves most to be considered, is, that Bassompierre's narrative shews, still more clearly than d'Audiguier's, the horrid confusion, and the dreadful disorders France is reduced to, when the court wants a sufficient power to make itself dreaded. This is the right way of confuting those republican authors, who continually say, that the happy time is over, when the power was divided between the king and great lords. Oh! what a fine golden age was that, in which the chevalier de Guise killed the father and son in a month's time, and yet obtained general-lieutenancies; and it was but siding with a prince's faction, to put a stop to all proceedings of royal justice, and to be well paid besides! Take notice, that, though Bassompierre was an eye-witness of what he relates, it does not follow, that he gives a better account of the small circumstances of things than other historians do. He is sometimes grossly mistaken in that respect. Here is an instance of it; he reckons (36) but a week between the death of baron de Lux the father, and that of baron de Lux the son; and yet it is certain there was a month between.

[H] He signalized himself in the Carrousel. . . . and was like to carry the prize at the running at the ring.] I shall comment upon these words, not so much to prove what I advance, as to have an opportunity of mentioning a law, that is observed in that sort of exercises. 'When people run at the ring, and some of the competitors hit it an equal number of times, they contend for the prize among themselves, by beginning a new race, till one only has the advantage; and if, upon the same day, the equality of their skill prevents their deciding the honour of the race, the whole company has the privilege of beginning it anew; as it happened in the great Carrousel of the late king, in which the duke of Vendôme, the counts de St Agnan, and de Monrevel, and the barons de la Challegneraye, and de Fontaines Chalandry were equal, each of them having hit the ring twice in three races, which obliged them to run at it again three times; and being still equal, as by their advantage they debarred others from pretending to the prize, so by their equality they lost their pretensions to it, according to the laws of those races; and, in such a case, the right of disposing of the prize belongs to the lady who gives it. Thus the races being put off, the ring remained in dispute between the chevalier de Guise, the marquis de la Valette, and the marquis de Rouillac, who hit it in all their races, so that they were obliged to begin again; and the chevalier de Guise and the marquis de la Valette having hit it but twice, the marquis de Rouillac, who hit it in all the races, carried the prize (37). The chevalier de Guise was of the first troop of the assailants in that Carrousel, and took the name of Olivante de Loro. That troop was that of the knights of the sun, and the prince of Conti was their head (38).

GUISE (HENRY DE LORRAIN duke of), son of the foregoing, was born the fourth of April 1614 (a), and was one of the most accomplished lords of France, well shaped, skilled in all sorts of exercises, and full of wit and courage. There would be no need of many fictions to make his history look like a romance. He was designed for the church, and invested with many abbies [A], and even nominated to the archbishopric of Rheims (b); but having promised to marry the princess Anne of Mantua [B]... cardinal de Richelieu found a way to deprive him of all his benefices, which occasioned his retiring to Brussels, where he married the countess de Boffu [C], whom

[A] He was invested with many abbies. 'Those of St Denys in France, St Remy of Rheims, St Nicaise, St Peter of Corbie, Fescamp, Mont St Michael, St Martin of Pontoise, Orcamp, Chambon, and Montirandé (1). He had five hundred thousand livres a year in benefices, if we believe the author of the State of France (2), printed in 1657. Note, that he was but a child, when he began to have that vast income, the spoils of two rich cardinals. He succeeded, in 1615, cardinal de Joyeuse, his mother's uncle, in his estate, and cardinal de Guise in 1621. This I have read in president de Gramond (3), who observes, that cardinal de Guise had a hundred thousand crowns a year, which the king gave to the young abbot of Fescamp.

[B] Having promised to marry the princess Anne of Mantua. I am going to quote an author, who is so far from saying, that the duke was deprived of his benefices by reason of that engagement, that he affirms he had parted with them before he engaged in that marriage. 'That prince, being a younger brother, was designed for the church, and made archbishop of Rheims: he parted with his benefices, after the death of his brother, and intended to marry Anne Gonzaga, sister to the princess Mary, whom I have spoken of. Cardinal de Richelieu, being sensible that this match was against the good of the state, made use of the king's authority to prevent it, and caused that prince to be confined to a convent. The duke of Guise, being extremely vexed at it, left the kingdom, and retired to Cologne, whither his mistress went to him in a man's disguise; but he sent her back, and went to Brussels, where he found the other exiles (4).

[C] He married the countess de Boffu. The duchess of Chevreuse, who was then at Brussels, brought the duke of Guise acquainted with that countess (5), who was a young widow of a sweet and gay humour. . . . She was brought into a company, where the duke of

Guise was; and she made so many advances to him, that he could not forbear answering them. It is true, that, lest he should have an ill opinion of her conduct, she immediately talked to him of marriage; and the duke declared, he desired nothing more than to unite his fortune to her's, but in such terms, as sufficiently shewed that he intended only to divert himself during his exile. Though the countess saw through his intention, she made as if she had not perceived it, hoping to engage him more easily by a feigned ingenuity. One day she carried him to a fine house she had a league from Brussels, and afforded him all the diversions that could be had in that season, which was the most pleasant in the year. The duke could not forbear expressing his acknowledgement, and talking to her of love as he used to do. The countess told him, that if he was as much in love as he pretended to be, he would shew a more earnest desire to marry her. The duke swore to her, that he desired nothing so earnestly as to spend the rest of his life with so lovely a person, and that she might put him to the trial. The countess, taking him at his word, replied, that she would quickly know, whether his protestations were sincere, since she had in her house a notary and a priest to marry them. The duke was surprized at her discourse, but dissembled the matter, and thought he might grant her desire without any hazard, and that she would be entrapped in her own snares, since such a marriage, made without the formalities prescribed by the canons, and without the king's consent, could not stand. The countess, perceiving that the duke was disposed to do what she desired, called in Manfeste, chaplain to the army, who married them, and dispensed them from publishing the bans, as if he had had the same authority as the archbishop of Mechen. The duke spent the night in that noble house with his bride, expressing so much love to her, that she

he left soon after, and returned into France. Being out of favour again, he retired to Rome, where he had his marriage dissolved. From whence he removed to Naples to command the army of the people, where he was soon after made a prisoner, and carried into Spain (c). This is what I find concerning him, in a book printed at Paris in the year 1657. To which I must add, that the duke of Guise had a hand in the treaty, which the count de Soissons, the duke of Bouillon, and some other male-contents, concluded with Spain (d); that he made a public journey to Brussels for a greater security of that treaty; that he was prosecuted as a criminal; that he was sentenced for contumacy the sixth of September 1641, and made his peace in August 1643 (e); that, some months after, he fought a duel with the count de Coligni [D], and that this quarrel was occasioned by a difference, wherein Madam de Longueville, daughter of the prince of Condé, was concerned. He came off victorious, was well pleased with the happy success of her design. The next day he went home, after he had desired the new duchess, that their marriage should be kept secret, till he had obtained the consent of the court and his family. Notwithstanding the care that was taken to keep that adventure from being made public, it came to the knowledge of the duke d'Elbeuf, and the duchess of Chevreuse, who upbraided the duke of Guise with it, as a very base thing. The respect he had for the ladies, prevented his falling into a passion against the duchess; but he fell out with the duke d'Elbeuf to such a degree, that they would have fought, had not the arch-duke reconciled them. The duke of Guise, having lost all hopes of revenging himself with sword in hand, looked for some other way of vexing the two persons, who had offended him, and thought the most effectual was to bring the countess to his house, and to treat her publicly as his wife. This he did, and ever after he lived in good understanding with her all the time he was at Brussels. The author, who relates this, supposes, that the duke of Guise endeavoured to get his marriage dissolved, for no other reason, but that he might marry Mademoiselle de Pons. I shall set down his own words again (6). The duke of Guise could not marry Mademoiselle de Pons, without getting his marriage with the countess de Bossu dissolved, and therefore he resolved to go to Rome, in order to solicit the dissolution of it at the Rota. The action was already commenced, and the duchess of Guise, his mother, had sent a gentleman thither to that purpose; but, when she heard, that her son was in love with Mademoiselle de Pons, she sent word to her agent to drop the prosecution. The duke set out at last, and, after many dangers at sea, arrived safe at Florence, and engaged the great duke to write in his behalf to Innocent X, lately raised to the pontificate. When that prince came to Rome, he was very kindly received by the Pope, who at his request gave a cardinal's hat to cardinal Mazarin's brother. The duke of Guise hoped, that this service would move that first minister to favour his design; but, on the contrary, the French ambassador was ordered to oppose it.

I must observe, that the question concerning the validity of the marriage of the duke of Guise, and the countess de Bossu, has been debated again, not long ago. We have seen in the public news, that it has been declared valid by the Rota at Rome (7), and that the parliament of Paris has given a contrary judgment. It is therefore still a matter of dispute: Aduc sub judice lis est. I must not forget what marechal de Bassompierre says, that the duke of Guise, who died in 1640, had suffered very much in his family by the loss of his two children . . . and by reason of the ill conduct of the third, who lived not according to his profession (8). He, whom Bassompierre calls the third son of that duke of Guise, was the second, the same who courted the countess de Bossu, who had so many abies, and lived a life so unbecoming those, who are designed for prelacies.

[D] He fought a duel with the count de Coligni. This affair made a great noise, and I believe the readers will be well pleased to find here a particular account of it. It is a remarkable instance of the disorders usually occasioned by the jealousy and gallantry of the fair sex. The following narrative may be depended upon; for, though I take it from an author, who does not put his name to his book, who is sometimes mistaken, and often confounds matters of fact, without taking much care to avoid anachronisms, he was very well informed of the affair, upon this occasion, and relates it much in the same manner as Mr de la Barde, a very exact historian (9). (10) The duchess of Chevreuse, who fancied, that the prince was the chief cause of the duke of Beaufort's confinement, and of Chateaufort's disgrace, resolved to be revenged of him. Though the ladies are apt to flatter themselves in point of beauty, her glais had acquainted her more than once, that her charms, half worn out, stood in need of a younger person, to strengthen her interest, and she was not obliged to look for one out of her family. The daughter of the countess de Vertus, whom the duke of Montbason her father had married, was, as has been said before, the most beautiful woman in France; besides, he had a spite against the prince of Condé's sister, who, having married the duke of Longueville, had deprived her of a lover; and so she found it no difficult thing to bring her over to her interest. The duke of Guise, who, after his return, had declared for that handsome duchess, engaged all the Lorrain princes to side with him; besides, they seemed to be inclined to it out of respect for the duke of Chevreuse, who was of the same family (11). Those two ladies, being strictly united, resolved to begin their revenge by reflecting upon Madam de Longueville's reputation. They published the letters, written by that lady to the duke of Beaufort, who had given them to the duchess of Montbason; they also forged others, which they pretended to have been written by Madam de Longueville to Coligny. The princes of Condé, hearing, that the duchess of Montbason had spread that report, highly resented it, and engaged all her friends to help her to be revenged of her. This quarrel divided the whole court, and made the queen apprehensive it would revive the ancient enmity of the houses of Bourbon and Guise. Those two parties were pretty equal, because the duke of Orleans, who had married a woman of the house of Lorrain, declared for Madam de Montbason; and therefore that quarrel might have been attended with dangerous consequences. Though it was the queen's interest to prevent too strict an union between the duke of Orleans and the prince of Condé, lest their authority should be prejudicial to her's; yet, because it was more dangerous still to suffer them to carry their resentment to the last extremity, she endeavoured to reconcile them. She obliged the princes of Condé, and the duchess of Longueville, to receive satisfaction from the duchess of Montbason; and that duchess declared to the two princesses in her presence, that she had no hand in spreading those reports, and that she disowned them. The two princesses declared also, as it had been agreed upon, that they were willing to believe it, since Madam de Montbason said it: it was stipulated by the same agreement, that this duchess should avoid all occasions of meeting the two princesses; which she did not observe afterwards. The duchess of Chevreuse, having invited the queen to a collation prepared for her in Renard's house, near the door of the conference, brought her mother-in-law with her. The queen was accompanied by the princes of Condé, who, perceiving the duchess of Montbason, had a mind to retire; but the queen detained her, and desired that duchess to walk out somewhere for her sake; which she did so unwillingly, that the queen was very angry with her: and being returned to the royal palace, she sent Guenegaud, secretary of state, to command her to retire forthwith to her seat of Rochefort. That quarrel seemed to be at an end by the removal of the duchess; but Coligny, not thinking himself revenged of those, who designed to set him at variance with the house of Bourbon, and was little afraid of the consequences of that fight, though it was a true duel, fought in the middle of the Place Royale, and though part of the princes of the blood were against him. Notwithstanding those circumstances, and many others, and the informations the parliament of Paris began to make at the instance of the king's attorney-general (f), the duke of Guise appeared in public, and made a campaign the year following (g) at the siege of Graveline, under the duke of Orleans. However, it is not to be doubted, that this duel was the chief reason of his going soon after into Italy. He was at Rome, when the Neapolitans made an insurrection, and desired him for their leader. He accepted their proposal, and set out the 13th of November 1647 (h). The obstacles he was obliged to overcome, in order to get into Naples (i), were such, that la Calprenede and Scudery hardly invented any thing more worthy of a romantic adventurer. The duke was received by the inhabitants of Naples with an extraordinary joy; and it was ordered, the 17th of November, That he should be styled generalissimo of the army, and defender of liberty, with the same honours the prince of Orange enjoyed in Holland, under the protection of the most Christian king (k). He met with many difficulties in the exercise of that new dignity, and gave many proofs of his ability and courage; but fortune proved contrary to him: The court of France not being able or willing to assist him, he could not maintain himself, and was obliged to make dangerous attempts, in which he fell, and lost his liberty. He was taken by the enemies, who carried him into Spain, where he was a prisoner a considerable time. He was set at liberty in August 1652 (l), at the solicitation of the prince of Condé (m); and it is thought, the court of Spain consented to it the more willingly, because they hoped the duke of Guise would occasion new broils and factions in France (n). It has been the common opinion, that the court of France neglected to assist him, because they were not willing he should establish his authority in the kingdom of Naples, and thought it more for their interest, that the inhabitants of that country should be under the power of Spain, than subject to the house of Lorraine. The duke of Guise being returned into France,

Bourbon, to which he had the honour to be related, sent a challenge to the duke of Guise, by the marquis d'Éstrades; the duke accepted it, and took the marquis de Bridieu for his second. The duel was fought in the Place Royale, and the duke of Guise had the advantage: he disarmed his enemy, after he had dangerously wounded him, and then parted the seconds, who fought with great courage, without any advantage on either side. The duke of Guise got a great deal of honour by that duel, which would have increased the consideration his mistress had already for him, if he had continued in his love; but his heart received other impressions soon after (12).

(12) He means, that the duke of Guise fell in love with Mademoiselle de Pons, maid of honour to the queen.

died to a minister's house (16). He died of grief (17) five months after the duel (18).

Whoever makes solid reflexions upon that duel, must needs highly commend cardinal Richelieu's prudence, in sending the duchess of Chevreuse out of the kingdom. Ladies, who make an ill use of their beauty and wit, to intrude into state-intrigues, are the plagues of a court: the best way is to get rid of them as soon as possible, and send them to grace foreign countries. If the duchess I speak of had continued at Paris, after the conspiracy of Chalais, her favourite lover (19), she would have played many tricks. We see that she was hardly returned into France, but she laid the foundations of that unhappy duel, which occasioned the death of the count de Coligny, a young lord, who might have done many services to the crown; a duel, in which Mr d'Éstrades might have been killed, whose ability and sword were very serviceable to the kingdom, as it appeared afterwards by his military actions and important embassies. If you trace the duel of the duke of Guise, and the count de Coligny to its original, you will find the cause of it in the ambition of the duchess of Chevreuse, who made use of the jealousy of another duchess as a proper instrument for it. Those two ladies, who perfectly agreed, tho' one of them was the step-mother (20) of the other, contrived a story, in order to cast a blot upon the reputation of a princess of the blood. This was the occasion of that duel. A plot, attended with such a consequence, without any other consideration, is sufficient to create an horror. But the thing will appear more horrid, if it be considered by what motives it was contrived. Was it out of tenderness for the duchess of Longueville's husband, was it to revenge an injury done to his honour, that a scandalous story was given out concerning that duchess? No, it was through a quite different desire of revenge: the husband's honour, far from being repaired, suffered the more by it. A married lady was resolved to be revenged of the duchess, because she had deprived her of the duke of Longueville her lover, by marrying him. In order to succeed in her design, she spoke some words, which, among other consequences, occasioned a duel mentioned in history. By this means, the step-mother and the daughter-in-law have immortalized their names; for their conduct will be known as long as there are any French histories of Lewis XIV's reign. Some are of opinion, that the true merit of a woman consists in concealing so prudently her best qualities under the veil of modesty, that they may afford no matter for history or conversation (21). This is perhaps too

France, did not think of forming any cabals which might accommodate the prince of Condé's affairs: he was much more taken up with love-intrigues; and, if he undertook an expedition to recover Naples [E], it was rather a meer ostentation, than a solid design: that expedition came to nothing. He was made great chamberlain, that place being vacant since the death of the duke of Joyeuse, his brother (c). He was appointed, in 1656, to go and meet the queen of Sweden, who was coming into France: a more judicious choice could not have been made; for no man was ever better qualified for such commissions, and whatever required pomp and magnificence. He made a great figure in the famous carrousel of the year 1662. He headed the troop of Moors. He was born for such shews and spectacles; and no man did ever better deserve to live in the time of Tournaments, and in the age of the Paladins. We are told a very remarkable thing, concerning the gift he had of making women in love with him. It is said, that those, who loved him, could discover by the motion of their heart, though they did not see him, whether he was present [F]. He died of sickness, at Paris, the second too rigid a morality, and there is no inconvenience in mitigating it, and suffering a lady to have the ambition of being placed in the temple of Fame, and in the writings of an historian: but she should only desire to be mentioned by the authors, who, like Valerius Maximus, make a catalogue of the greatest examples of piety, chastity, conjugal love, charity, constancy, &c. Women might lawfully be ambitious of having a place in such books; but, when their conduct can only bring an eternal disgrace upon them in history, it deserves all the indignation the heart of man can conceive.

For the rest, I shall observe, that authors do not agree as to the manner how the court expressed their resentment against the duchess of Chevreuse, at the time of the affair of Chalais. Some say, she was banished into Lorraine. It is the expression of the author of the history of cardinal Richelieu, printed at Amsterdam in 1694 (22). President de Gramond says only, that she fled, and was not imprisoned by reason of her sex. He adds, that if she had been secured, it had been well for the public, both within and without the kingdom, since she disturbed most of the courts of Europe. Fuga item consulit sibi Ducissa Caprasi multis rea nominibus: sexus fragilitas, & veneratio inbibuerat nuper quo minus & ipsa in carcerem traheretur: certe magnum erat Galliae, magnum principibus externis ab ea detentione beneficium, aulice passim in res novas intra & extra Galliam ea semina, aulamque ferme tota Europa omnium perturbatrice, quod suo infra loco reddemus (23). The true account of the matter is, that, at first, she was ordered to leave the court, and that afterwards she was kept in custody, and found a way to get out of the kingdom. Per difficilia Regina tempora hanc diligentissime coluerat, atque observaverat (Rohana Mombasana) atque ea causa & Ludovico XIII. & Richelieu invidia, Aulæ pulla, in custodiam conjuncta, postremo fugâ sibi consulere, atque in Hispania, & Belgio exulare coacta fuerat (24).

La Barde, who says so, rightly observes, that she became odious to Lewis XIII; for we read in la Rochefoucault's memoirs (25), that the reasons, which made the queen irresolute about the return of the duchess of Chevreuse, were a particular clause of the declaration, and a strange aversion which the king expressed against her, at his death. That lady died in August 1679, in her seventy ninth year (26).

[E] He was much more taken up with love-intrigues; . . . he undertook an expedition to recover Naples. That expedition was in the year 1654. The duke made himself master of Castell à-mare, and lost it soon after (27). I shall set down a passage of Priolo, whereby it appears, that the duke of Guise's liberty was of no use to the Spaniards, nor to the prince of Condé. 'Guiseus ante paucos annos dum electus Reipublicæ Neapolitanæ, & inter favos tumultus captus ac deductus in Hispaniam, nunc libertate donatur, id maxime procurante Condæo. Iberica fuit varietas, Guisum Galliae redonare, & Condæo concedere; ut, qui avorum non immemor, posset rursus moliri nova, & ciere turbas. At oblitus donatæ libertatis, & Condæi negligens, choreas & hastiludia cogitavit. Rursus ab eo tentatum iter Neapolitanum ostentui fuit, renovatum in animo levi spes acceps per vanum ludibrium. Nullus mortalium tam vana concepit, editus atavis, qui tam grandia, tam solida captabant' (28). — 'The duke of Guise, being a few years before chosen leader of the republic of Naples, and amidst cruel com-

* motions taken prisoner, and carried into Spain, is now

* set at liberty by the interposition of the prince of

* Condé. It was Spanish cunning to restore Guise to

* France, and to comply with Condé; since he might * have trod in the steps of his ancestors, and raised new

* troubles. But, forgetful of the gift of liberty, and

* regardless of the prince of Condé, he thought of no* thing but tournaments and balls. The expedition to

* Naples, which he afterwards attempted, was very suc* cessful; no mortal, sprung from ancestors, who had * done such great things, having ever entertained such

* vain conceits.' La Barde says, that the queen-mo* ther had consented to the exchange proposed by the

* Spaniards, who had offered to release the duke of

* Guise, provided France should restore all the pris* oners of their party. But they altered their mind soon

* after; and, hoping the duke of Guise would be a * powerful instrument in the prince of Condé's hands,

* to foment many troubles in the kingdom, they released

* him at that prince's request. But, as soon as the

* duke came into France, he declared, that, since he * had been so ill used by the Spaniards, he would do no* thing for them, nor to express his gratitude to the

* prince, whilst he remained in their interest; but, if

* he forsook it, he would do any thing for him. He * found, that he was highly obliged to the queen-mo* ther, who had consented, that, in order to have him

* released, four thousand prisoners, some of whom were

* considerable men, should be restored to the Spaniards

(29). However it be, he minded love more than war.

He returned to Paris, more in love with Mademoiselle de Pons, than he had been before his imprisonment, and resolved to marry her (30), but, being informed that she was unfaithful to him, he treated her with great indignity, and even sued her at law, demanding the pendants, valued fifty thousand crowns, and a piece of rich tapestry, which he had given her; but he had not the success he promised himself. The loss of his cause increased his rage, and he resolved to go and insult her in her own house (31). She was informed of it, and avoided the insult. Some time af-

ing of her departure (32), embarked in the king's fleet for a second voyage to Naples (33). Being returned into France, he fell in love with Mademoiselle de

Gorce, who loved him more sincerely, and, after his death, she retired into the convent of the Carmelites, where she took the habit (34). All this shews, that if he was a hero, he was not one according to the notions of Corneille, but according to those of Racine and Quinault. He was a hero always in love (35), and sometimes like him of the Æneid: He enjoyed all the privileges of a husband; he made his mistress believe she was his wife, and yet never designed to marry her. Thus she was like Dido (36), and he was like Æneas (37). It does not follow from hence, that his adventures were heroical: there is nothing in them, but what is frequently to be seen among citizens and ordinary gentlemen.

[F] It is said, that the women, who loved him, could discover . . . tho' they did not see him, whether he was present.] I do not give this particular as a certain truth; I only mention what I have read.

Those two lovers, that is, the duke of Guise and the countess de Boffu, must needs have loved one another very much, and I wonder how their love ended before their life. They had an inward foresight, which informed them of their arrival, a long time before they

saw one another: pray, madam, judge whether it was a just foresight. The duke grew jealous of the count de  who was very much in love with the countess; and it is well known, that he was one of the most handsome men that can be seen. She did not love him, and, notwithstanding what has been said to the contrary, Angelique swore to me, that Madam de  loved no body but the duke of . But he was not so fully convinced of his happiness as he should have been: and, being daily informed, that his rival was very constant and passionate, he resolved to know the truth of it, without being perceived, and to that end he came to Brussels incognito. There were great rejoicings at that time for the birth of a Spanish prince, called Baltazar. . . (38).

(38) This is wrong chronology; for Dom Baltazar was born in 1629: the duke of Guise was then but fifteen years of age; and Note, That Father Anfelme, pag. 441, of his book, intituled, Le Palais de l'Honneur, says, that he married, in December, 1641, Honorina de Berghes, daughter of the count de Grimberghes, widow of Albert Maximilian de Henin, count de Bossut.

The duke, being arrived, was told, that many young lords of the country were to make a masquerade of Indians, and to go in that disguise to the countess de Cantecroix, in whose house there was to be a great assembly. He had one of those suits of cloaths brought to him, and found it no difficult thing to have a sight of them, for there was no order to hide them. He got one made for him exactly like them, and, going among the maskers, he entered with them into the hall, where they danced. He saw there Madam de  who appeared more beautiful to him than before, and the Count de  by her; for he was constantly at those assemblies, and she could not prevent it by reason of the respect that was due to his quality. . . as soon as the duke came in, the countess felt a certain emotion, which his presence always produced in her. She could not think that she was deceived by it; and, though her lover had written to her, that he was going to take a journey, she curiously looked for him among the maskers, and discovered him. This made their love very conspicuous; for the lady, in the sudden fit of her joy, could not dissemble her passion; and the lover was likewise so transported, that he forgot the reasons he had still to conceal his love. . . I have seen an original letter of the duke about that effect of sympathy, which, in my opinion, was one of the finest letters that ever was written: he complained in it, that he was too happy; for he owned, that it was a very great happiness to be thus guessed at by one's mistress; but he said, it deprived him of the pleasure of knowing what passed in her heart, when she had no mind to let him know it: such a discovery was, in his opinion, one of the greatest pleasures a lover can enjoy; and nothing appeared to him more moving, than a disclosing of tenderness and sincerity, when there is no ground to suspect, that art and precaution have any share in it (39).

[G] He was carried to Joinville, to be buried among his ancestors. I have said in another place (40), that the barony of Joinville was erected into a principality in the year 1552. It fell to the house of Lorraine by the marriage of Ferri de Lorraine, first of that name, with Margaret de Joinville, eldest daughter of Henry, fourth of that name, count de Vaude-mont, and lord of Joinville: that Ferri was killed at the battle of Azincourt in 1415 (41). Renatus II, duke of Lorraine, left by his will, dated the twenty fifth of May 1506, to Claudius his younger son, the feuds of Guise, Elbeuf, Aumale, Mayenne, JOINVILLE, and others, which he had in France (42). The tombs of the dukes of Guise are to be seen in St Laurence's church at Joinville. See the description of that of Claudius in Remy Belleau (43).

[H] His two sisters died since, without being married. One of them was called Mary, and was born the fifteenth of August 1615, and went by the name of Mademoiselle de Guise (44). I have read somewhere (45) that she was near marrying Uladisslaus king of Poland. The other's name was Frances Renata: she was born the tenth of January 1621, and was put into a convent. She was abbess of St Peter at Rheims, and then of Montmartre (46). After the death of those two daughters, there remained no male nor female issue of the branch of Guise; and it is to be observed, that, tho' the four first dukes of that name had many children, all their posterity is extinct, except that of Renatus de Lorraine marquis d'Elbeuf, eighth son of Claudius first duke of Guise. All the princes of the house of Lorraine, that are now in France, are descended from him; they are still many, and in a flourishing condition. If the title of duke of Guise comes to be bestowed upon any body, it will be a very heavy burden. I do not know who is now in possession of that duchy; I could not receive in due time the memoirs I desired concerning the consequences of the last will of Mademoiselle de Guise. She had been duchess of that name a considerable time, when she died in March 1688. She left, by her will, the duchy of Guise, worth a hundred thousand livres a year, to the younger son of the duke of Lorraine, with the principality of Joinville, which is worth not much less, and her fine house at Paris, upon condition that he should bear that name, and live in France, with the king's approbation (47). The novelist, who published those things, adds: 'But, besides that the king is not well pleased with that donation, the duke d'Elbeuf pretends he has been wronged, since he is the next heir in the male line; and therefore he has already entered an action against it to get it declared void, especially as to the duchy of Guise, maintaining, that the late duchess could not dispose of it to his prejudice. . . (48) The deceased lady is suspected of having had a marriage of conscience with the late Mr de Montefor, a gentleman of quality and merit. Nay, it was said, they had several children, of whom their remained two daughters. This report was particularly spread four years ago, when that princess made a donation to the prince of Harcourt, which however had no effect. It was pretended, that the money he was to give her was designed for the marriage of those two daughters; but whether it be that they died since, or that there was no ground for such a report, it is certain no mention is made of it in her will (49).'

G U I S E (LEWIS DE LORRAIN Cardinal de). There have been three cardinals of that name. The first was brother of Francis de Lorraine, duke of Guise. The second was son of the same duke. Moreri speaks of both (a), but says nothing of the third; and therefore I shall only speak of him. He was the son of Henry de Lorraine, duke of Guise, who was killed at Blois, and he was born in the year 1575. He was a man of such a martial temper, that he breathed nothing but war, tho' he was an ecclesiastic, a cardinal, and archbishop of Rheims. He followed the king in his expedition of Poictou, in the year 1621, and signalized himself among the most valiant and resolute gentlemen of the army, in the attack of a suburb at the siege of St Jean d'Angeli (b). He fell sick some days after, and was carried to Saintes, where he died, the twenty first of June 1621. His suit with the duke of Nevers about a priory turned to a quarrel, and he appeared very willing to put an end to it with sword in hand. I shall mention some circumstances relating to that affair [A]. He repented upon his and more inclined to war than to learning. Many authors have mentioned his quarrel with the duke of Nevers, about the collation of the priory of La Charité, and what passed betwixt them in the house of the judge that was to report their case. Those, who, by their writings, produced in the process, set those two princes at variance, were the occasion of their coming to blows, and going out of Paris, each with their friends, to put an end to their quarrel at the expense of their lives. But his majesty having sent the light-horse to seize their persons, he, who commanded them, and had express orders to arrest the cardinal, executed his majesty's command, and brought him to Paris; where, for fear of a second meeting, because the duke of Nevers was always abroad, he was carried one evening to the

Bastille, and from thence to Bois de Vincennes (2). President de Gramond mentions some other curious particulars, viz. that cardinal de Guise, meeting the duke of Nevers in the judge's house, gave him some offensive words, to which the duke made a smart answer; and that thereupon the cardinal gave him a blow with his fist, in the judge's presence. The prince of Joinville, brother to the cardinal, immediately drew his sword, and struck several times, with the flat side of it, Marecot master of the requests, who with his majesty's leave managed the affairs of the duke of Nevers. The king, being informed, that the duke was resolved to fight a duel with the prince of Joinville, interposed his authority to reconcile them, and obliged the cardinal to ask the duke's pardon. As for the affront done to the master of the requests, it was repaired thus: the prince of Joinville was obliged to use these words before the arbitrators. Mr Marecot, out of consideration for the duke of Nevers, I am sorry I have beaten you: I desire you to forget it, and to believe that I shall be your friend for the sake of the duke of Nevers. President de Gramond makes a very solid observation upon the disorders of that time, when a master of the requests might be beaten with impunity. That disorder proceeded only from the diminution of the royal authority, and ceased as soon as cardinal de Richelieu humbled the princes and great lords, who had usurped a very great part of the sovereign power, and made them submit to Lewis XIII. Does it not favour of anarchy, that, in a country, which has the title of a kingdom, those, who have beaten a great magistrate, should not be obliged to acknowledge, that they are sorry for it, by reason of his character, but only for the sake of the great lord he served? consider these words of president de Gramond. Principum per ea tempora summa erat ratio, affectabantque distinguere ab omni ordine, prerogativa sanguinis. Per injuriam Joinvillius percussit magistratum, & ait dolere se ex persona Niverni, quod percussit; quasi adeo infra positus in quem collata offensas, ut gratis cædi posset. Erat hæc labes ejus ætatis, qua à principibus rex parum distinguebatur; quo jure utitur hodie, nempe anno M. DC. XLIII. quo hæc scribo, externi principes parum à Regni primoribus, parum hi à nobilibus differunt, uno ferme ordine habemur omnes; eoque ventum ut nemo publice, nemo privatim peccare possit sine ultore, quod ejus sapientiæ & æquitati debitum, qui ætate nostra summam rerum tenet in Gallia (3).

(3) Gramondus, Hist. lib. viii, in fine, pag. m. 428.

At that time the princes of the blood were highly considered, and they affected to be distinguished from every order, by the prerogative of their birth. The prince of Joinville had injuriously struck a magistrate, and says, he is sorry for it in regard to the duke of Nevers; as tho' the offended person was so much beneath him, that he might be struck with impunity. This was the reproach of that age, which made little distinction between the king and the princes of the blood; but at present, viz. in the year 1642, in which I write this, foreign princes differ little from the chief men of the kingdom, tho' but little from the nobility: there seems to be but one rank among us: and it is come to this pass, that no one can offend publicly, or privately, without an avenger, which is owing to his wisdom and equity, who, in this our age, has the management of affairs in France. The abbot de Marolles affords some other circumstances. About the beginning of the winter 1620, says he (4), the duke of Nevers had a great quarrel with cardinal de Guise, for the priory of La Charité, which depended on the abbey of Cluni; for, having got it conferred on the prince of Tynarage, his second son, by the court of Rome, upon a letter or promise of cardinal de Guise, abbot of Cluni; and the cardinal going from his word, and intending to procure it to one of the children he had by the lady des Essars, they went to law about it, and their suit divided all the persons of quality at court. . . . The pacifying of that quarrel proved a difficult thing, because some blows were struck on both sides; and the duke of Nevers, who was first offended, mistrusting nothing, had no time to draw his sword, which Fouques his gentleman held out of the judges chamber, where he was alone.

[B] The president de Gramond blames him with respect to his warlike actions. . . . but he spares him as to his concubinage.] He makes use of this antithesis (5):

(5) Gramondus, Militiam affectabat impatiens sui; non miles, quia Cardinalis; non item Cardinalis, quia miles erat. . . . 407.

Indebitum certe characteri, quod in Engieria obdione sæpe ferrum in hostem strinxit, immemor Ecclesiam nescire sanguinem. — He affected the soldier, thro' a kind of self-impatience; being not a soldier, because a cardinal; and not a cardinal, because a soldier. . . . He certainly acted out of character, since, at the siege of St John d'Angeli, he drew his sword against the enemy, forgetting that the church is a stranger to blood. Perhaps it will be said, that he did not mention that cardinal's amours, because he knew nothing of them. But I cannot believe he was ignorant of them; they were too public, and had been attended with issue. The Chronicle of the Favourites, printed in 1622, supposes (6), that there happened a dispute between cardinal de Guise and the duke du Mayne, who should get first into Charon's boat.

(6) Chronique des Favoris, pag. 14.

The cardinal said, he died first, and consequently ought to have the precedence. The duke did not deny it, but represented that he ought to go in first, because he had been killed in the king's service, whereas the other died only of sickness. The cardinal replied, that he had left his wife and children for GOD's cause, of which he desired no other witness than the duke of Nevers, whereas the duke du Mayne had left no such thing. Every body knew then, that this cardinal had kept one of Henry the fourth's mistresses, viz. Charlotte des Essars. The memory of it was the more easily preserved, because that woman had been so fortunate as to marry a great lord; notwithstanding the public disgrace she was under; a king of France, and then an archbishop of Rheims, having got several children by her (7).

(7) Father Andu Hallier, who perhaps would have thought himself

undermatched, if he had married Charlotte des Essars of the Palais de l'Honneur, says, with a clear reputation, did not scruple to make her his wife when she had lost it. He was a man of quality, and brother of a marshal of France (8). He was knight of the order of the Holy Ghost, and captain of the life-guards, and had given proofs of that military virtue, which raised him afterwards to the dignity of marshal of France; and yet, in a lawful marriage, he was contented with the leavings of a cardinal. The public did not fail to take notice of it.

There are so many occasions of alledging such examples, that this sort of adventures are seldom forgotten. Romorantin, and But when people began perhaps to talk more of it, killed in Candia there arose some persons, who laid a claim to Made- in the service of the Venetians, moïsselle de Guise's estate, and revived the ideas of and father of the that object. Read what follows: I take it from the marchioness Mercurie Historique & Politique for April, 1688. d'Acy. I omit what he says of the third son, of count de Gamache, knight of the king's orders, and of the daughters.

The marchioness d'Acy, wife of the younger brother of count de Gamache, knight of the king's orders, and of the daughters, by virtue of a box brought to her by an unknown person, in which she found a contract of marriage (8) Pris, Nicolas de l'Hospital, marquis and then duke of Vitry. between cardinal de Guise and Charlotte des Essars, mother of count de Romorantin, her father, who was always accounted the cardinal's ballard. That contract is attended with the nuptial benediction in due form; and, moreover, with a dispensation from the Pope, permitting the cardinal to enjoy his benefices tho' he be a married man: in short, nothing seems to be wanting, but a sufficient support, to dispute so great a succession with those concerned in it.

nately more common among the clergy than military functions, is an infraction of the canonical discipline. To conclude, I believe some reflexions have been made upon this. That the descendants of the same prince of Condé, whom Francis de Lorraine, duke of Guise, endeavoured to destroy, are become the heirs of the descendants of that duke [C] in the space of 130 years.

However, whatever place that box might come from, it is like to make a noise in the parliament, the more because it is in the hands of a lady who has learned all the chicanery of the law by a long experience, as if she had known that she would have occasion for them one day. Since this happy discovery, she has removed the bar that was a blot in her escutcheon. But it is feared she will be quickly obliged to put it in again: she has to do with the prince of Condé, who pretends to be the chief heir of that house in right of the prince's his wife; and as there is little proportion between them, it is not improbable, that the box will be found supposititious in time (9).⁽⁹⁾ Note, that the author of the Mercurio supposes (10), that this cardinal de Guise was he that was killed at Blois; which is a mistake.

[C] The descendants of the same prince of Condé, whom Francis duke of Guise endeavoured to destroy, are become the heirs of that duke of Guise. Here I shall place the memoir, which I should have inserted in the remark [H] of the foregoing article, if I had received it in due time. This memoir will inform us of the proceedings occasioned by the marriage of the duke of Guise with the countess de Boffu, and of the pretensions of the prince of Condé, who carried the cause.

(11) A memoir,
by Mr Dalcencé.

(11) The sixteenth of November 1641, there was a marriage between the duke of Guise and Honorata de Berghes, widow of the count de Boffu her first husband. The ninth of June 1666, there was a definitive sentence given, contrary to that of the Rota, whereby the marriage was declared valid ad quoscunque effectus, & dictam comitissam veram & legitimam conjugem. Note, that the duke of Guise was dead; but he had produced his reasons and vouchers at Rome in his life-time. Note also, that, during that time, Mademoiselle de Guise obtained some decrees of the parliament, whereby the proceedings of the Rota were declared null, and suing in that court was forbidden, and all the sergeants in France were also forbidden to give any summonses for that court, and to execute its judgments. The countess de Boffu acted all the rest of her life as duchess of Guise. She constantly maintained the validity of her marriage, and always demanded the execution of it. She hoped to get it acknowledged in France by the recommendation or authority of the league, or of the king of Spain, at the treaty of Niméguen, in 1678. But the French party was too powerful, and the ministers of France absolutely refused to hearken to any propositions relating to private persons. The countess de Boffu used vain endeavours, and died in 1679, having made the count de Berghes, one of her nephews, her heir. The count de Berghes settled the affairs of his succession, and gathered together all the writings, concerning the marriage, that were dispersed at Rome, Paris, Madrid, and Vienna, and in the Low-Countries, and elsewhere. By the favour of the truce of Luxemburg, he came to Paris, and put in his demand at the Chatelet, the third of August 1687, against Mademoiselle de Guise, as heiress of her late brother, that the contract of marriage, of the sixteenth of November 1641, might be executed against her, and all rights resulting from it adjudged to him. Immediately Mademoiselle de Guise obtained a decree of parliament, whereby it was forbidden to proceed in the Chatelet, to style the countess de Boffu duchess of Guise, to make any demand on account of that pretended marriage, and all sergeants were forbidden to give any summonses to that effect. On the eighth of March 1688, Mademoiselle de Guise died, after she had made many wills and codicils, the last whereof is dated the second of March 1688. The war broke out soon after, and kept things in suspense. At last, the peace being concluded at Ryfwick, the count de Berghes returned into France honoured with the title of prince and knight of the golden fleece. He renewed his demand the twenty fifth of October 1698, not in the Chatelet, but in the parliament. He demanded, by virtue of a commission under the great seal, to be admitted opponent to the execution of the decree of 1687, and the other two made long before against his aunt: and that justice should be done him upon his opposition, and the appeal brought in by Mademoiselle de Guise, and her heirs, concerning the celebration of the marriage, and the sentence of the Rota, bringing his first demand from the Chatelet, petitioning that all matrimonial rights should be wholly adjudged to him. Upon this illustrious controversy sentence was given on Tuesday in the morning, the fifth of January 1700, in the great chamber, according to the opinion of Mr Daguesseau, advocate-general, Mr Robert, and Mr Nouet pleading for the parties, and Mr de Harlay being president, after fifteen hearings, seven of which were taken up by Mr Robert, six by Mr Nouet, and two by Mr Daguesseau; wherein, considering the petition of the prince of Berghes, the court ordains, that the information made against Honorata de Berghes, countess de Boffu, shall be rejected, without minding the oppositions made by the prince of Berghes to the execution of the decrees of 1665, 1666, and 1687, doing justice, on the appellations, as an abuse both of the celebration and the procedure made at the Rota, and the sentences there intervening; declares the marriage to be void. In consequence whereof, the court rejects the demands of the prince of Berghes depending upon the question concerning the marriage, condemns him to costs, and ordains, that upon other demands, he may take his course.

It plainly appears from the genealogical table, printed during that law suit, that Anne palatine of Bavaria, wife of the prince of Condé, was the right heiress of Mademoiselle de Guise; for she is descended from the duke of Mayenne, son of Francis de Lorraine duke of Guise. This duke of Mayenne had a daughter, who married Charles Gonzaga duke of Nevers, by whom he had Anne Gonzaga, mother of the prince of Condé.

GUYET (FRANCIS), born at Angers, of a good family [A], was one of the best

[A] He was of a good family. He had two uncles, Lezin Guyet, and Martial Guyet. The first, who was a counsellor in the presidial of Angers, made a map of the province of Anjou: the second wrote French verses (1). This is what Mr Portner says. I find some difficulty in it, when I compare it with what I find in Menage (2), viz. that Lezin Guyet, counsellor in the presidial of Angers, who made the first map of the province of Anjou, was an echevin at Angers in 1493. But this difficulty vanishes by consulting la Croix du Maine (3), who says, that Lezin Guyet was born in the year 1515, on the thirteenth of February. From whence I infer, that Menage's printer put one figure instead of another, or that Menage took one Lezin Guyet, who lived before the eldest brother of Martial, for him who made the map of Anjou; for he says, that Lezin Guyet had a son called Andrew, and he mentions two Andrews, one of whom was mayor of Angers in 1550, and the other echevin of the same town in 1519. The last of these two Andrews cannot be the son of him, who made the map of Anjou, since the author of that map was born in 1515. For the same reason, it is not likely, that he was the father of the other Andrew; but both of them might be the sons of one Lezin Guyet, echevin of Angers, in 1493. However it be, Menage calls that family ancient; and having mentioned some other persons of that name, he comes to our Francis Guyet, and calls him the most learned Angevin that be known of.

best critics of the XVIIth century. He was born in the year 1575 [B], and was but a child when he lost his father and mother. The small estate they left him, came almost to nothing, by the ill management of his guardians: which, far from discouraging him from his study, made him more fond of it; and being of opinion, that Paris would enable him to perfect his knowledge and judgment by the conversation of learned men, he took a journey thither in 1599. He quickly got the friendship of Christopher and Augustine du Puy, the two eldest sons of Claudius du Puy (a), who had been the ornament and support of good literature. His farther acquaintance with Peter and James du Puy, the sons of the same Claudius du Puy, proved very advantageous to him, in order to make a great progress in learning; for the most learned persons in Paris did frequently visit those two brothers, and many of them met every day in the house of Thuanus, where Messieurs du Puy received the company. After the death of that president, they held those conferences in the same place. Guyet was constantly at those assemblies. He made a journey to Rome in 1608, and applied himself to the study of the Italian tongue with so good success, that he could make Italian verses, which the best poets of that nation would not have thought unworthy of their pen. He renewed with Reignier (b), who was then in the house of cardinal de Joyeuse, the acquaintance which he had contracted at Paris; and was very much esteemed by cardinal du Perron, and Gabriel de l'Aubespine bishop of Orleans, to whom he proved serviceable more than once, by explaining to him many difficult passages, both in sacred and profane writers. He returned to Paris by the way of Germany, and was taken into the house of the duke d'Epemont to teach the abbot de Granfelve, who was afterwards so well known by the name of cardinal de la Valette (c): Being thoroughly skilled in Greek and Latin authors, he picked out of them what was most proper for his pupil, and explained it to him, not like a pedant, but according to the use, which a man, designed for great employments, would make of it. The pupil did very much improve under so learned a master, and conceived so great an esteem for him, that he always entrusted him with his most important affairs. He took him along with him to Rome, when he went thither, after he had been made a cardinal, and procured him a good benefice, besides that which he had already bestowed upon him (d). Guyet, being returned to Paris, chose rather to live a private life, than in the house of cardinal de la Valette, and pitched upon Burgundy college, to make his abode in it. There he lived the remaining part of his life, minding nothing but his studies, and being contented to make his court when that cardinal was at Paris; for he could not resolve to follow him into the armies and the provinces. He enjoyed every day the conversation of Messieurs du Puy, who lodged in Thuanus's house near Burgundy college; but, after Mr Rigaut's departure, they removed to the king's library, where they held their conferences. He chiefly applied himself to a work, wherein he pretended to shew, that the Latin tongue was derived from the Greek, and that all the primitive words of the latter consisted only of one syllable. Being the first who had such a design, he was willing that none should have the glory of executing it but himself, and shewed his essays to no body. Notwithstanding his long and continual application to that work, his labour proved of no use; for they found, after his death, only a vast compilation of Greek and Latin words (e), without any order or coherence, and without any preface to explain his project; so that one would think he had, even with respect to his paper, the same mistrust which hindered him from explaining to his friends his plan, his method, and principles. He applied himself to something else: The margins of his Horace, Virgil, Lucan, Plautus, Martial, Philoxenus, Hesychius, &c. were full of critical notes [C], wherein he took a great deal of liberty [D]; for he rejected, as supposititious, all such verses

(8) The fair sex conceal their age with the greatest secrecy, and I think it is the only secret they can keep. Many women have entrusted me with their domestic concerns, and even with their love intrigues; but none did ever impart her age to me. I have seen some, that were so reasonable as to resolve upon a thing with great firmness and constancy, when there was occasion for it; but I never saw one so covetous as to tell her age.

[B] He was born in the year 1575. This came to be known only by his heirs; for he would never tell in what year he was born. He was unwilling to be accounted so old as he was (4); and, hoping to live much longer than he did, he was willing that people should not know his age. In all other things he hardly had a confidant; but perhaps there was none he took more care to conceal, than that; and, because he was not grown very hoary in his old age (5); and his strength was not impaired in proportion to the time he had lived, he was unwilling to deceive those, who made him younger than he was. Had he intended to marry, one would be less surprized at his mysterious taciturnity. His sight being so good, that he could read the smallest print without spectacles (6), might have wonderfully contributed to make him appear younger than he was. It is thought that because he hoped to live much longer (7), he neglected to settle his affairs, either with respect to his works or his estate: He died without making his will. Those, who shall read this remark, and have read the letters of the chevalier d'Her.... will call to mind the passage I quote in the margin (8). It is in the thirty sixth letter of the first part. See the remark [C] of the article Gombauld.

VOL. III.

[C] The margins of his Horace, Virgil, &c. were full of critical remarks. Menage bought the books, whose margins were full of those notes. All of them have not been buried in the obscurity of a closet. Those upon Hesiod were imparted to Mr Grævius, who inserted them in his edition (9). Those upon Stephanus Byzantinus have been likewise published (10). I shall observe by the bye, that Guyet was none of those readers, who skip from book to book; he read a book through with the greatest attention, before he applied himself to any other. Thus he wrote upon Terence, Hesiod, Horace, and Plautus. The reading of the ancient authors was his main business. As for modern books, he only read histories and voyages (11). I observe these things, not only because some persons are curious of them, but also because they may give a good opinion of the notes of this great critic.

[D] wherein he took a great deal of liberty. He carried his criticisms so far, that he must needs have been in the wrong sometimes. Guyet struck out many verses in his Virgil, pretending they were supposititious, and that the poems of that great poet were like those troops, among which there are many false mullets; so that he acted like a rigid commissary, as seemed to him not to favour of the author's genius. The most compleat thing, that was found among his papers, was his notes upon Terence; and therefore they have been printed in the Strasburg edition, 1657: they were sent by James du Puy to the learned Boeclerus. He was so happy as to be accounted a man of great learning, though he had printed nothing: it was well done of him to avoid the disputes he would have been engaged in, if he had published some books [E]. He seldom confessed, that he was mistaken. He grew hot when any body denied what he said, and then he would jest in a pleasant manner. He had a very good memory, and was a hearty, sincere, honest man. He was cut for the stone in 1636, and bore the pains of that operation with a wonderful constancy. Abating this, his long life was hardly attended with any illness; and he was so happy as to die of a catarrh, which affected him only three or four days, and did not prevent the curate of the parish performing the usual functions. He died in the arms of James du Puy, and Menage his country-man, the twelfth of April, 1655 (f), being eighty years old. His Life (g) was written in Latin, with great judgment and politeness, by Mr Portner a senator of Ratibon (b), from which I have taken this article.

commisary, who musters none but true soldiers. He looked upon the first ode of Horace, and the secret history of Procopius, as supposititious pieces; and when the cadence, or the turn of a period, did not please his ear or his taste, he immediately concluded it was not genuine, though the ancient Grammarians, and the best manuscripts, were against him. But to be convinced, that he had sometimes a depraved taste (12), and went beyond the delicate fastidii imputed to him, one need only read the verses he made against beer, wherein he speaks of all the Dutch poets with great contempt (13). Grotius made a very good answer to him (14):

Duræ mentis iners, merumque rus est,

GUYET (CHARLES), a French Jesuit, born at Tours in the year 1601, was admitted into the society in the year 1621, where he taught the Belles Lettres for the space of five years, and moral theology for the space of two years. Afterwards he set up for a preacher, which lasted a long time. He got a perfect knowledge of the ceremonies of the church, as it appears by two books which he wrote [A]. He died at Tours the thirtieth of March, 1664 (a).

[A] This appears by two books which he wrote. One of them is intitled, Ordo generalis & perpetuus divini Officii recitandi; and the other, Heortologia, sive de festis propriis locorum, printed at Paris for

[E] It was well done of him to avoid the disputes he would have been engaged in if he had published books. Notwithstanding his bold criticisms, and his intrepidity in speaking out his thoughts in conversation, he was afraid of the public. He dreaded particularly Salmasius (15), who, being in Messieurs du Puy's house, threatened to write a book against him, if he published his thoughts about some passages of the ancient authors. Salmasius would have proved too hard for him; he would have printed a hundred sheets before Guyet had been able to fend four to the press; for Guyet had much ado to please himself (16); and therefore he continued to forbear setting up for an author, even after Salmasius's death. It were to be wished for the sake of the public, that many authors had had such a scare-crow: those, who should forbear to print books upon such an account, would be very glad of it, if they knew their own interest; for how many writers do we see, who verify this thought of Horace, or at least the last part of it?

Happy are those learned men, who, like our Guyet, are contented with being accounted men of learning upon the testimony of others (18). This was Guyet's case: Balzac, among others, was his trumpeter. See his Ludas Poëticus de Hypercritico Gallo (19).

[A] So the Greeks call the philosophers, who went naked. It would be absurd to deny, that there were Indian philosophers that wore no cloaths; but it might be maintained, that the Brachmans were not of that number: for besides the authorities I have alleged in another place (1), it may be observed: I. That the Iarchas (2) of Philostratus (3) strips himself before he steps into a fountain with Apollonius. II. That another Brachman pulls a letter from under his gown (4); a letter I say, which he wrote to a dæmon, to command him with threats to go out of the body of a young man. III. That Apollonius upbraids the Gym-nosophists of Ethiopia with their having left the habit of the Indian Gymnosophists, hoping thereby to make people believe, that they were originally of Ethiopia. There is another question to be proposed: whether those that went naked covered their natural parts. St Augustin maintains they did. 'Per opacas, says he (5), quoque Indiæ solitudines quum quidam nudi philosophentur, unde Gymnosophistæ nominantur; adhibent tamen genitalibus tegumenta quibus per cætera membrorum carent. — There are certain naked philosophers in the shady solitudes of India, thence called Gymnosophists; yet they cover their secret parts.'

was (12), that the Ethiopians came originally from the Indies; that they had anciently been subject there to king Ganges, whom they had put to death; that, since that murder, the other Indians had looked upon them with abomination; that the earth would no longer bear them; that neither their corn ever grew ripe, nor their women with child came to their full reckonings, nor their cattle encreased; and that the ground sunk where-ever they had a mind to build houses; that the ghost of the murdered king followed, and frighted them every where; and that those calamities continued, till the authors of that parricide had been swallowed up by the earth. It is pretended (13), that all these prodigies made those people fly their country, and that they came to settle themselves in that part of Africa, which was called Ethiopia. Others have spoken of that transmigration as has been shewn by the learned Marlhamb (14). He has shewn likewise, that there were two sorts of Ethiopians; the one in Asia, and the other in Africa; and also Indians in Africa: but he pretends, without reason, that, in a passage of Virgil, we ought to understand Ethiopia by the word Indi. Virgil understood, by that, the East-Indies, where he thought the Nile had its source; and you see also, that he makes it run by the frontiers of Persia:

Who border on the Nile's o'er flowing tide,
And o'er their land; in painted vessels ride
And where, descending from black India's shores,
The stream fast by the Persian frontiers pours,

All this fair tract, this salutary coast,
For med'cine fam'd, the healing art can boast.

[C] Among other things, they pretended to remedies against barrenness..] They boasted of three things upon that account. First, To enable a person to beget many children: secondly, to order it so, that they should be boys; or, thirdly, that they should be girls.

have not well maintained the dignity of philosophy, since it was their method not to go to any body; but to put themselves on such a foot, even with respect to kings [D], that, if any body wanted them, they were obliged come themselves to them, or send some body to acquaint them with what they wanted. Therefore Alexander, who thought it not consistent with his greatness to go in person, sent a deputation to them, in order to satisfy the desire he had to be informed of them (g). Nothing can be finer than their way of educating their disciples [E]. They asked them every day, before they sat down to dinner, how they had spent the morning; and every scholar was obliged to produce some good moral action, or some proficiency in the sciences: if they failed, they were sent to their work, without being allowed any thing to eat. We have seen, in the article of the BRACHMANS, the great frugality of the Gymnosophists, and their extraordinary patience, in being a long while in the same posture [F]. It is not unlikely, that the doctrine of the Metempsychosis led them to eat nothing, which had animal life in it; and that Pythagoras borrowed this opinion from them: but it is ridiculous to derive the origin of the Jews from them, as Aristotle has done (b). It was a shameful thing amongst them to be sick; so that those, who would shun that disgrace, did burn themselves (i). Thus Calanus, who was in the retinue of Alexander, made away with himself. We have said elsewhere, that the doctrine of the transmigration of souls inspired the Brachmans with a great indifference either for life or death [G]. Porphyry answers pertinently to those, who objected, What would become of the world, if all men did live as the Brachmans did [H].

Strabo marks all this. Δύνασθαι δὲ καὶ πολυτρόπως ποιεῖν, καὶ ἀπ' αὐτοῦ καὶ ἀλλοῦ διὰ φαρμακευτικῆς. Possē eos & sacundos facere & marium & feminarum procreationem medicamentis præstare (16). This was a sure means to make themselves necessary or acceptable to several sorts of persons: for there are those, who wish for a numerous family: others, having none but girls, with passionately for a boy; and others again, having none but boys, would fain have a girl also. This last is principally the desire of mothers: nor is it unreasonable; for a daughter is a more convenient help and companion for a mother, than a boy.

[D] Even with respect to kings. This ought not to be generally understood of the Gymnosophists; for, according to Nearchus, the Brachmans went to court, and followed kings in the quality of their counsellors (17).

[E] Nothing can be finer than their way of educating their disciples. All that Apuleius says about it deserves, in my opinion, to be copied. 'Est præterea, sicut de (18), genus apud illos (Indos) præstabile, Gymnosophilæ vocantur. Hos ego maxime admior: quod homines sunt periti, non propagandæ vitis, nec inoculandæ arboris, nec proficindendi folii. Non illi norunt arum colere, vel aurum colare, vel equum domare, vel taurum subigere, vel ovem vel capram tondere vel pascere. Quid igitur est? Unum pro his omnibus norunt. Sapientiam percolunt, tim magistri senes quam discipuli minores. Nec quidquam apud illos æque laudo quam quod torporem animi & otium oderunt. Igitur ubi mensa posita, priusquam edulia apponantur, omnes adolescentes ex diversis locis & officiis ad dapem conveniunt. Magistri perrogant, quod factum à lucis ortu ad illud diei bonum fecerit. Hic alius se commemorat inter duos arbitrum delectum, sanata similitate, reconciliata gratia, purgata suspitione, amicos ex infensis reddidisse: inde alius, sese parentibus quidpiam imperantibus, obediisse: & alius, aliquid meditatione sua reperisse, vel alterius demonstratione didicisse. Denique ceteri commemorant. Qui nihil habet adferre cur prandeat, impransus ad opus foras extruditur. — There is also, among the Indians, an excellent kind of philosophers, called Gymnosophists. These I particularly admire for their skill, not in cultivating the vine, not in inoculating trees, nor in ploughing the ground; for indeed they are ignorant of agriculture, of managing the house, of taming the bull, of sheering or feeding the sheep, or goat: what is it for then? One thing they know worth all this: they cultivate wisdom, both the old that teach, and the young that learn. Nor is there any thing more commendable in them, than that they hate all manner of sloth and idleness. When therefore the table is spread, before the repast is set before them, all the youth assemble from diverse places and employ. The masters examine what good action each has done since day-break to that time. Here one relates, that, being chosen umpire between two, he had reconciled and made them friends: another, that he obeyed some order of his parents: a third, that he had 'found out something by his own meditation, or learnt something from another. He, who can give no good account of himself, is sent back to his work, without a dinner.'

[F] We have seen . . . their patience in being a long while in the same posture. Besides what has already been related upon that subject in the remark [A] of the article BRACHMANS, I shall say here, that that hard constraint was not unusual even among the Greek philosophers. Socrates put himself sometimes to that trial, in order to lay in a good provision of patience for necessities to come. 'Stare solitus Socrates dicitur pertinaci statu perditus & pernox, a summo lucis ortu ad solem alterum orientem, inconvulsus, immobilis, iidem in vestigiis, & ore atque oculis eundem in locum directis, cogitabundus' (19). (19) Anl. Cell. Socrates is said to have stood, from sunrise to sun-set, in one posture, without winking, and with his eyes directed to one and the same place, in profound meditation. We should look upon this as a piece of folly. I have heard people mention, as a great sign of softness and stupidity, the custom, a certain monarch had, towards the beginning of the XVIIth century, to leave his hat just as those, who dressed him, set it upon his head. But let us remark, that there can hardly be a more insupportable punishment, than the being condemned to keep all one's life-time in the same posture. That, which we look upon as most convenient, I mean, sitting, would cruelly fatigue at the long run (20).

[G] The transmigration of souls inspired them with a great indifference for life or death. To this relates what Trajan said of the Getæ (21), that they were the most warlike of all men, not only by reason of the strength of their bodies, but also because of the opinion, which Zamolxis had persuaded them of: for, as they looked upon death only as a change of habitation, they prepared themselves more easily to die, than to undertake a journey. This is sufficient to cover Christians with shame, in whom, generally speaking, the near hopes of heaven cannot extinguish the immense love they have for life.

[H] Porphyry answers pertinently to those, who objected, what would become of the world, if all men lived as the Brachmans did? He could not fail to commend those Indian philosophers in his book of abstinence, since they practised so well what he taught. He makes (22) a very advantageous description of their frugality, good morals, and contempt of life. As to the objection of the worldlings, he confutes it after the same manner as Pythagoras has done. If all men, says he, became kings, human life would be strangely troublesome: must men therefore renounce being kings? And if all men followed virtue, they would ever continue in public employments; for those that should be possessed of them, ought never to forfeit that recompence of their probity: nevertheless, no body is so foolish as to pretend, that it is not the duty of all men to tread cheerfully in the paths of virtue. There are several things, which the laws tolerate in the people, and which would not be allowed in a philosopher. The

The laws do not forbid the people to divert themselves with women of pleasure, or to spend their time in taverns; but they account the keeping of such company, and such a kind of life, to be scandalous, even in persons of moderate probity. Therefore what is suffered in the common people, is not to be allowed in the virtuous: a philosopher ought to prescribe to himself the holy laws which the gods, and the ministers of the gods, have established. These maxims of Porphyry may serve those, who press the observation of the strictest morals, and who recommend so much celibacy. What would become of the world, say we to them, if every body followed your advice? Do not trouble yourself about that, may they answer (23); few people will take us at our word. The Anabaptists make good use of the like answer, touching their condemning the holding places of magistracy: they know well enough, that masters will never be wanting; and that, let their censures and exhortations be never so pathetic, there will ever be more competitors than employments. This puts me in mind of a divine of the church of England, whom some endeavoured to persuade, that the tenet of passive obedience ought to be renounced, as entirely opposite to the public good: Never fear, answered he, that the people will thereby be more apt to suffer themselves to be oppressed: for, as you do not fear, by preaching warmly against revenge, to expose thereby your neighbour to insults, for you know well enough, that, for all your sermons, he will take care that his insensibility of a box on the ear does not draw more affronts upon him; so, &c. Note, that Porphyry thought, that the laws do not forbid the people, &c. may be confirmed by this passage of Cicero (24). 'Aliter leges aliter philosophi tollunt astutias:

leges quatenus tenere manu res possunt: philosophi quatenus ratione & intelligentia. — The laws provide against fraudulent practices one way, the philosophers another: the laws, so far only as the hand can reach; the philosophers, as far as reason and understanding extend. And by this passage of Seneca (25): (25) Seneca, de Quam angusta innocentia est ad legem bonum esse? 1ra, lib. ii, cap. quanto latius officiorum patet quam juris regula? xxvii. quam multa pietas, humanitas, liberalitas, justitia, fides exigunt? quæ omnia extra publicas tabulas sunt. — How confined an innocence is it to be good only in the eye of the law? how much farther does the rule of duty extend, than that of law? how many things do piety, humanity, liberality, justice, fidelity, require; all which are without the writ of law? See Grotius, in the tenth chapter of the third book, De Jure Belli & Pacis.

For the rest, the thought of St Augustine, which I point out in the margin (26), puts me in mind of a philosopher. 'Your philosopher, says he (27), is not over-wise, when he designs to marry, to propagate his race in France. If he was of the race of emperors and sovereigns, I would not hinder it for any thing in the world. What! Does N. fear the world should fail? If it failed in him, it could never end more gloriously. Let a courtier, a magistrate, or a mechanic, marry with my consent: but that a philosopher should take upon him the charge of a wife and children, nay, a philosopher of the family of Zeno, is a sort of prodigy, which deserves more to be expiated, than that of the cows that spoke, and said formerly, with a dreadful voice, Rome look to thyself!'

HACKER (a) (JAMES), was professor of divinity at Friburg in Brisgaw, about the beginning of the XVIIth century. I only speak of him, to have occasion to discover a pseudonymous writer [A], who has not yet been mentioned that I know of, in the catalogues of this kind of authors.

(1) In the year 1609, according to the catalogue of the Bodleian Library.

[A] I only speak of him, to discover a pseudonymous writer.] Hacker having published (1) a dispute about predestination, was answered by a monk of Mantua, under the false name of Daniel Neidinger. He defended himself, in a reply, with this title, Disputationis de Prædestinationis causa falsa & ementito auctore Dan. Neidingero, vero autem & germano ejus fabro Fr. Anar. Ursiano Ord. Min. Obl. reg. in urbe Mantuana nuper editæ, & ibidem à tredecim diversorum Ord. Fratrum & Patrum susceptæ, in quatuor ex quibus coaluit, elementa, mendacia, hereses, antilogias, sordes sermonis, Analysis. Autore J. Hacker.

Dorscheus, professor of divinity at Strasburg (2), makes use of this example, to shew that the Roman Catholics accuse one another of Heresy. He says, that this reply of Hacker was printed in 1618, but since it is put in the Oxford catalogue, printed at Friburg in 1614. I suppose the first edition was not known to him. The same catalogue mentions two volumes of James Hacker, on Thomas Aquinas. They were printed at Friburg, the first in 1619, and the second in 1621. Mr Konig does not distinguish this, and gives the title wrong.

HACKET (WILLIAM), and English Fanatic in the XVIth century, was first servant to one Mr Hussey, and expressed his fidelity to him by an action perfectly brutal [A]. He afterwards married a rich widow, and ruined her in a little time by his luxurious expences. He had never studied, but had a great memory, which he abused in repeating the ministers sermons over his cups. This he did only to laugh at them, and had no design in hearing sermons, but to furnish his memory for this ridiculous exercise. He was a very great lover of wine and women; and he corrupted a maid who came to his house to ask his advice (a). He robbed also upon the highway. At last he set up for a prophet, and declared, I. That England should feel the scourges of famine, pestilence, and war, unless it established the consistorial discipline: II. That for the future there should be no more Popes. He named the time of this desolation of England, which, according to him, was to be the same year he threatened it. He began to prophesy at York and Lincoln, where, in punishment of his boldness, he was publicly whipped, and condemned to be banished. He had a wonderful fluency in extemporary prayer; and had choice and very pompous phrases, and this made the people believe it was an extraordinary gift of the Holy Ghost. He had a very great confidence in his prayers [B]; for he said, that if all England should pray for rain,

[A] He expressed his fidelity to his master by an action perfectly brutal.] A tradesman of Oundle in Northamptonshire, did something that caused an enmity betwixt him and a gentleman who had Hacket in his service. Observe how this servant revenged his master. He familiarly and friendly accosted this tradesman's son (1), and was received in the same manner: then suddenly took him by the throat, threw him down, and bit off his nose, and instead of returning it to the surgeon, who pretended to set it on again, eat it; eique nasum dentibus evulsit, nec chirurgi volentis restituere tradidit, sed (ut fertur) barbara immanitate devoravit (2). Camden does not relate this fact with the same circumstances. He says, that Hacket embracing the school-master, in sign of reconciliation, bit a piece of his nose off, and that it was the school-master who desired him to restore it, that it might be sewed on while the wound was fresh. Ad vindictam adeo effertur (Hacquetus) ut ingenuo Ludimagistro, dum redintegrati amoris specie amplecteretur, nasum mordicus absciderit, & coram misero desuper supplicante ad redderet, quo vulnere adhuc recente afficeretur, canine ut ferunt (3) devoraverit (4). The variety of these circumstances is not such, as that we may conclude from thence, that the fact is false; we may only observe therein a sign of the laziness or infirmity of a man's memory. They that hear a story, attend principally to the main point and essence of the fact, and this they best retain; but not having the same attention to all the circumstances, for that would be too troublesome, they forget many of them: They are not at the trouble of loading their memory with them, which besides is not strong enough to bear all the parts of the burden, and thus some hours or days after, if they would tell the same story, they are forced to supply the circumstances they have lost. Every one makes this supplement according to the particular character of his genius; and hence come infinite variations, which creep even into the very accounts of historians.

[B] He had a very great confidence in his prayers.] Thou hast the power, said he, to God, and I have the faith, therefore the thing shall be done. He used imprecations, in his prayers, against himself, and pretended that the efficacy of his imprecations was certain. He boasted, that in disputing with a papist, he proposed to him this condition; I submit instantly to eternal damnation (5), do you do so too, and one of us shall change his religion, according to the unhappy or happy success of our imprecation. This was very absurd; for the effect of the imprecation was to be the sudden death of one or the other, and consequently, neither of them could change his opinion. The dead man could not do it, and the survivor would have been far from doing it, since the bad success of his adversary's imprecation, had given so authentic a testimony to his religion. But it must not be expected, that such extravagant visionaries should avoid contradictions. Hacket having accused too great lords of treason, proposed to them a like form of prayer (6): for this was the name he gave his execratory oath. If after you have done it, says he, you do not die, I will submit to the lex talionis. But if you refuse to do it, and I do it, without any harm, you shall be condemned to lose your head. The judges sent him away as a mad man.

He imposed on abundance of people by this sort of prayer, and persuaded them, that for the sins of rain, and he should pray, to the contrary, it should not rain. Edmund Coppinger, and Henry Arthington, two persons of some learning, joined with him: The first by the title of the prophet of mercy; and the second by the title of the prophet of judgment. Arthington gave out, that they had an extraordinary mission, and that next to JESUS CHRIST, none upon earth had greater power than William Hacket. Coppinger declared, that Hacket was the sole monarch of Europe. They afterwards went farther, and equalled him in all things to JESUS CHRIST, without being opposed by Hacket; for he said in his prayers, Father, I know thou lovest me equal with thyself (b). They would have proceeded to the ceremony of unction, but he would not suffer them, being already anointed, he said, by the HOLY GHOST in heaven. They asked him at last, what he had to command them, and protested they would pay him an obedience without reserve. He ordered them to go and proclaim through all the streets of London, that JESUS CHRIST was come to judge the world, and lodged in such an inn, and that no body could put him to death. They obeyed with so much haste, that Arthington had not time to take his gloves. They added this to their master's instructions, England repent, repent. They drew together, by their bawling, such a concourse of people, that being come to Cheapside, they could go no farther, nor be heard; but finding an empty cart, they mounted upon it, and discoursed of the important commission of William Hacket [C]. They returned to him, and, when they saw him, Arthington cried out to the people, Behold the king of the earth. This happened the sixteenth of July 1592 (c). They were profecuted and tried. Hacket was sentenced to be hanged and quartered the twenty eighth of July, and the sentence was accordingly executed. Coppinger famished himself in prison: but Arthington was pardoned (d). The blasphemies contained in the prayer that Hacket made upon the scaffold, are so horrid, that I shall only relate them in Latin (e) [D]. We shall see, in the remarks, some particulars of his fanaticism, complicated with rebellion. He was filled with hatred against queen Elizabeth [E]. The truth of this ought not to be questioned, on pretence that I have it from the book of a Jesuit; for Camden's annals, contain most of these facts, and even with greater force.

men, the devils and witches had for two months, inflicted on him the very pains of hell, or within a little of them (7). Camden says, that by swearing by his eternal damnation, and with the most execrable imprecations, he seduced Coppinger and Arthington, and made them believe he frequently conversed with God, and that the devil had stigmatized him. His frequent and most fervent prayers, the outward shew of an holy life, and the custom of fasting every Sunday, contributed to persuade them of the same things (8). Poor human reason, how great are thy errors, and how great is their efficacy!

[C] Coppinger and Arthington discoursed of the important commission of William Hacket. They said, that he partook of the nature of glorified bodies, and was to convert all Europe to the consistorial discipline; and that the power of judgment was committed to him. They added, that such as desired to see him, should find him in such an house, and we foretel, that all who refuse to obey this king of all Europe, shall kill one another, and that the queen shall be dethroned (9). Before they made this extravagant folly, they went to a puritan minister, called Wigginton, and protested to him, that the night before, JESUS CHRIST appeared to them, not in body, but by his principal spirit, by which he dwelt in William Hacket, with greater fulness than in any other, and that Hacket was the angel who was to come before the end of the world, with a fan and crook in his hand, to separate the goats from the sheep: that he was to trample Satan under his feet, and totally overturn the kingdom of Antichrist (10). The day they went to preach up this new kingdom through the streets of London, Hacket commanded them to say, that JESUS CHRIST was come, with his fan in his hand, to judge the world, and that this was as true, as that God was in heaven. They punctually discharged their commission, and when they were on the cart, they declared, that Hacket, already glorified as to his body, participated of JESUS CHRIST by his principal spirit, and that he was there with the fan to establish the gospel in Europe.

[D] He spoke blasphemies . . . which I shall only relate in Latin. They exceed those of Caligula (11), and yet they were the conclusion to a most devout prayer, whence we may infer, that there is nothing so extravagant of which the heart of man is not capable. Hec fuit ultima ejus oratio. Deus cæli, Potentissime Jehovah, Alpha & Omega, Domine Dominorum, Rex Regum, æterne Deus. Tu me nostri verum illum Jehovah quem misisti. Miraculum aliquod ex nubibus ostende his infidelibus, & libera me ab his inimicis meis. Sin minus cælos succendam, & te ð throno detractum manibus meis lacerabo (12). Camden having related the same blasphemies, almost in the same words, adds, that Hacket pronounced others still more execrable, Aliaque magis infanda. Conversus ad carnificem loquebamur, Tunc spurie, inquit, Hacketum Regem tuum suspendes? Laqueo innodatus oculis in cælum sublati, Hoccine, inquit frendens, pro regno collato rependis? venio ulturus (13). This historian observes, that this enthusiast and his two companions, did not take their hats off before their judges, and impudently answered, they were above the magistrates; that afterwards, Hacket owned himself guilty (14), but answered in so blasphemous a manner as made all that heard him tremble. There was in this perhaps a good deal of fraud; for who knows but that he had a mind to make his judges believe, that he was distracted. However, his other gestures, and affected gravity, shewed no sign of madness (15). This we have from Camden. Note, that Arthington repented, and even printed a book to testify his repentance (16).

[E] He was filled with hatred against queen Elizabeth. He would never pray for her; and his design was to rob her of her crown and life, and change the whole form of the government. He heard the sermon bare-headed, but he put on his hat when he perceived that the queen was mentioned in the prayers (17). He confessed to the judges before whom he was tried, that he had stabbed the effigies of this princeess to the heart, with an iron pin; and that he never owned her for queen. Julii 20 & 23. palam confessus est Hacketus Regine imaginem se transfixisse ad cor stylo ferreo, eamque pro Regina non habuisse (18). A little before he was hanged, he cursed her with all manner of imprecations (19).

HADRIAN

HADRIAN (PUBLIUS ÆLIUS), a Roman emperor, would furnish a very long article, should we omit nothing of his principal qualities and actions. I must content myself with some of them, and repeat as little as may be, what we find in Moreri's Dictionary, in which this article is not very full of faults [A].

Hadrian was born at Rome the twenty fourth of January, 76 [B], lost his father ten years after [C], and had, for his guardians, Trajan, his relation [D], and Cælius Tatianus a Roman knight. His genius so enclined him to the study of the Greek tongue, that it exposed him to several railleries (a). He served early in the armies, and was tribune of a legion before the death of Domitian. The army of the lower Mœsia chose him (b) to compliment Trajan, adopted by the emperor Nerva, and it was he that brought Trajan the first news of Nerva's death. He regained the favour of this emperor, which he had almost lost by his excessive expences, which had brought him into debt. He married (c), a grand niece (d) of this prince [E], and he had in the empress a great patroness (e). The speech which he made before the senate when he was quaestor (f), was so unpolished, that he was hissed for it: upon which he applied himself hard to the study of the Latin tongue, and became very well skilled in it, and very eloquent. He attended Trajan in the expedition against the Daci (g); and to make his court effectually to him, he drank stoutly, and was nobly rewarded for it. He had been tribune of the people (h), before he went with Trajan to the second Dacian war. He did some noble actions there, and received a present, which gave him some hopes of succeeding to the empire (i). He was made prætor some time after, and afterwards commanded

[A] In Moreri this article is not very full of faults. It is one of the best. I have however observed, without entering into a general discussion, ten or twelve things which I think cannot be proved. I. That there was in Italy, a city called Italica. II. That Hadrian rebuilt Adria. III. That upon his return from England, he heard in Languedoc of Plotina's death. IV. That he built a temple at Nîmes to her. V. That Quadratus and Arifides were assisted by Severus, one of the emperor's lieutenants, when they presented books in favour of the Christian religion. VI. That Jerusalem and Ælia were two different cities in Judæa. VII. That Plutarch was Hadrian's tutor. VIII. That Hadrian recalled Epictetus, Numenius, and other learned men to Rome. IX. That he sent others to Alexandria, to teach the sciences there, before he went himself to that city. X. That he understood the mathematics, and wrote tracts of them. XI. That he died the twelfth of July, in the year 138, having reigned twenty years, ten months, and twenty nine days. XII. That Phavorinus was his secretary. We see, in my article, that Hadrian, died the tenth of July, and began his reign on the eleventh of August. If he had died the twelfth of July, it must have been said, that he reigned twenty years, eleven months, and one day. Let it be observed, that I will not deny that he received a letter from Serenus Granius, proconsul of Asia, exhorting him to equity towards the Christians, and that he studied geometry. Spartian says it expressly (1), and Mr Moreri has done well to say so too; but besides this, he makes mention of mathematics. They that deceived him, did not know, that matheſis, in Spartian, signifies only astrology. 'Matheſis sic ſciſeſibi viſus eſt, ut ſero Calendis Januariis ſcripſerit quid ei toto anno poſſet evenire. --- He imagined that he underſtood astrology ſo well, that in the evening of the fiſt of January, he wrote down whatever ſhould befall him, thro' the whole year.' I paſs over what Mr Moreri ſays, concerning Hadrian's memory; he exaggerates the matter. He ſays, he, ſo happy a memory, that he knew the names of places and rivers where he had paſſed, and even of all the ſoldiers of his armies. This idea exceeds what Aurelius Viſtor gives us in theſe words: 'Memor ſupra quam cuiquam credibile eſt, locos, negotia, milites abſentes quoque nominibus recenſere. --- He had an incredible memory; and could name particularly places, affairs; and even the abſent ſoldiers.' Spartian is ſtill more particular but yet falls ſhort of Moreri. 'Nominina plurimis ſine nomenclatore reddidit quæ ſemel & congeſta ſimul audierat, ut nomenclatores ſæpius errantes emendaverit. Dixit & veteranorum nomina quos aliquando dimiſerat: libros ſtatim lectos & ignotos quidem plurimis memoriter reddidit: uno tempore ſcriptis, dictavit, audit, & cum amicis fabulatus eſt (2). --- He called many by their names, without the aſſiſtance of the roll, tho' he had only heard them once named; and without any order, ſo that he frequently corrected the miſtakes of the men who read the names. wiſe repeat the names of the veterans, whom he had at any time diſmiſſed. He recited books which had been juſt before read to him, and even ſuch as he was a ſtranger to, before a great many people: he all at once wrote, dictated, heard, and converſed with his friends.'

[B] Hadrian was born at Rome January 24, 76. What makes me believe that Eutropius is miſtaken in ſaying, that Hadrian was born at Italica, is the account Spartian gives us of this emperor's family. He obſerves, that Hadrian's anceſtors, originally of Adria in Italy, ſettled at Italica in Spain, in the time of the Scipio's &c. He cites Hadrian himſelf, who had thus written in the hiſtory of his life. Doubtleſs Spartian had read in the ſame book, what he adds at the ſame time, that Hadrian was born at Rome IX. Kal. Feb. in the ſeventh conſulſhip of Veſpaſian, and the fifth of Titus.

[C] Lost his father ten years after.] His name was Ælius Hadrianus Afer. It is conjectured, that the government of Africa gave him the ſurname of Afer, and that he ought not to be diſtinguiſhed from the preſident Hadrianus, in Veſpaſian's reign, who put to death the holy martyr Leontius, at Tripoli. The acts of this martyrdom, inſerted in Metaphraſtus's collection, ſay, that the preſident Hadrianus, who in perſon judged Leontius, was a ſenator. Now Suidas obſerves, that the emperor Hadrian's father was a ſenator, and that he had been prætor. Theſe grounds of Mr Triſtan's conjecture, are reaſonable enough. (3) I do not know why Caſaubon (4) has found fault with theſe words of Xiphilin; ἢν δὲ Ἀδριανὸς γένος μὲν Ἀδριανῶν Ἀππελῶν; for after all the ſtir that is made, it muſt be owned, that theſe words may ſignify, that Hadrian was the ſon of Hadrian Afer. This is doubtleſs their true and natural ſignification, as Salmaſius (5) declares. So that one would be much to blame to cenſure Xiphilin for corrupting Hadrian's geneſalogy, in his abridgment of Dion, and making an African family of a Spaniſh. It is true, Cedrenus, miſtaking Xiphilin's meaning, fell into a groſs error, in ſaying, that the emperor Hadrian was of African extraction. Let us not forget, that Domitia Paulina, Hadrian's mother, was born at Cadiz (6).

[D] Trajan, his relation.] Hadrian's father, was Spartian. In Vita Trajani. (7) Eum Trajanus quæſum conſideravit filium vixit noluerat adoptare. --- Trajan would not adopt him in his life-time, though he was ſon to his couſin-german.

[E] He married a grand niece of this prince.] I ſhall ſay ſomewhere elſe, who ſhe was, and how ſhe ſucceeded in her marriage. It ſuffices to ſay here, that they who affirm (8), that Hadrian was married to Trajan's daughter, are miſtaken. It does not appear that Trajan had any children, or that Hadrian had any wife beſides Sabina, daughter of a niece of Trajan. The author of the chronicle of Alexandria, has given us a pleaſant chimera, viz. that the emperor Hadrian married the daughter of that Aquila, who made a verſion of the Bible.

in the empire which he did not honour with his presence. And as he was magnificent, and desired a personal knowledge of every thing, he every where left some marks of his liberality, and exactness in examining the conduct of the governors. It is supposed he began his travels in the year 120. He visited Gaul, Germany, and Britain, where he built a wall to hinder the Islanders, under his obedience, from being ravaged by those who had shaken off the Roman government. He returned into Gaul in the year 121, from whence he went to Spain; it is thought it was at that time, he went to Mauritania. His first journey to the east was pretty long; for he did not return to Greece till the year 125. He passed the winter at Athens, and was initiated in the mysteries of Ceres. He was at Rome in the beginning of the year 129 (9); and it is believed he went into Africa the same year, and that, after his return to Rome, he set out again for the east in the year 130. Having passed through Asia, where many kings came to compliment him, he went into Egypt in the year 132. He spent the winter at Athens in 135, and the spring following came back to Rome. He adopted Lucius Aurelius Annian Ceionius Commodus Verus, who, though he had names enough already, took besides, that of Ælius. After this adoption, Hadrian retired to Tiber, where he built sumptuous edifices [I], and gave himself up to effeminacy, and then to cruelty; for he put many people to death, either by open violence, or clandestine ways, and spared not his own brother-in-law Servianus, though ninety years of age. Lucius Verus dying the first of January 138, Hadrian adopted Titus Antoninus, and charged him to adopt Marcus Annian Verus, and the son of Lucius Verus. This emperor's dropsy oppressed and vexed him to that degree, that he grew as it were raging mad [K]. All imaginable remedies were employed to cure him. The relief which the magical art gave him, lasted not long (r). Abundance of physicians were sent for, and, some say, he attributed his death to them [L]. To deliver him from his despair, it was pretended sayings, said he never saw a finer fire in his life. Agellus, one of the Lacedæmonian Ephori, made use of this thought on a like occasion. Kai τὰ παρὰ τὸν Χρυσῶν γαμματεῖα συνεισενέγκαντες εἰς ἀγορὰν, ἃ κλάρια καλεῖται, καὶ πάντα συνδύντες εἰς ἐν, ἐνέπρησαν. ἀρδεῖσας δὲ φλογός, οἱ μὲν πλάσιοι καὶ δαυρικοί, περιπατῶντες ἀπὸ τῶν, ὃ δὲ Ἀγελῆλαος, ὡς περ ἐρυβρίζων, ἐκ ἐρη λαμπρὸτερον ἐπακένει οὗς ἡδὲ πῦρ ἐκείνη καδάρωτερον. Ita congestas in forum debitorum syngraphas, quas claria appellat, omnes coacervatas concremaverunt. Sublata flamma pecuniosi & sceneratores, qui ibi deambulabant, digressi sunt. At Agellus, quasi illudens illis, negavit clarius se lumen vel ignem lucidiorum vidisse (22). — And having heaped together the creditors' bonds, called Claria, in the market place, they set them all on fire. At the sight of the flames, the rich and the usurers, who were walking there, went away. But Agellus laughing at them, said, he had never seen a more shining light, or a brighter fire. [I] After the adoption of Lucius Verus, he retired to Tiber, where he built sumptuous edifices.] Aurelius Victor (23) gives a lively description of the effeminate life this emperor led in his retreat, whilst Lucius Ælius Cæsar governed at Rome; but he makes a gross blunder in Chronology. He says, that Hadrian at this time plunged himself into the infamous amours of Antinous; which is not to know, that Antinous's death preceded the adoption of Ælius Verus. As for his buildings, these are his words (24): 'Rus proprium Tiberi cessit, permixta urbe Lucio Ælio Cæsari, ipse uti beatis locupletibus mos, palatia exstruere, curare epulas, signa, tabulas pictas. — He retired to his villa at Tiber; having left the city to the government of Lucius Ælius Cæsar: whilst he, after the manner of the rich, built palaces, gave grand entertainments; and collected statues and pictures.' Add to this a passage of Spartian (25): 'Tiburtinam villam mirè exadificavit, ita ut in ea & provinciarum & locorum celeberrima nomina inscriberet: velut Lyceum, Academicum, Prytaneum, Canopum, Pæcilem, Tempe vocaret. Et ut nihil prætermitteret, etiam inferos finxit. — He built his villa at Tiber in an admirable manner: and gave the names of the provinces, and most celebrated places, to different parts of it, as the Lyceum, the Academy, the Prytaneum, Canopus, Pæcile, Tempe. And that he might omit nothing, he had a place representing the infernal regions.'

He had this advice from an oracle. 'Et Orestiam quidem urbem Hadrianus suo nomini vindicari jussit eo tempore quo furore cœperit laborare, ut ex responso quum ei dictum esset ut in furiosi alieni domum vel nomen irreperet. Nam ex eo emolitam insaniam serunt, per quam multos Senatores occidi jussit, quibus servatis Antoninus Pii nomen meruit, quod eos post ad senatum adduxit, quos omnes jussu principis interfectos credebant (26). — Hadrian likewise ordered the city of Orestia to be called by his name, when he began to be seized with madness, in obedience to the oracle, which advised him to take privately the house or name of some mad-man. It is reported, that by this means his madness abated, during the continuance of which he had commanded many senators to be put to death, and by saving them, Antoninus obtained the name of P I U S; having brought them into the senate, when everybody believed that they were put to death by the emperor's order.' The Sieur Tristram (27) fell into two gross mistakes in this passage. He makes Lampridius say, that Hadrian recovered of his phrensy, after he had visited the town of Orestia, and that this happened at the beginning of Hadrian's reign. It was easy to perceive, that Lampridius speaks not of a voyage of this emperor, and that what he says, must relate to the time when Antoninus was already adopted; which was but a few months before this prince's death.

(27) Comment. Hicet, pag. 453.

[L] Some say that he attributed his death to the great number of his physicians. Xiphilin relates (28) that Hadrian died with these words in his mouth, the multitude of physicians have killed the king, πολλοὶ ἱατροὶ βασιλῆα ἀπέκταν. He adds, that these words were a kind of proverb. Pliny assures us, that there was an epitaph, which contained a proposition like to this (29): Hinc illa infelicis mentis inscriptio TURBA SE MEDICORUM PERISSE. I wonder that St Epiphanius has not touched upon this circumstance of Hadrian's last moments, in the passage where he says, that he sent for all the physicians of his empire, and laughed at them, after he had found the vanity of their prescriptions, and even wrote a satirical letter against their art and profession. Οἱ δὲ πολλὰ κικιμήκτες καὶ μὲν ἀνύσαντες ἐκώφεον ὑπ' αὐτοῦ, ὡς καὶ ἐπιστολὴν ἀνείδεικτον γράψαι κατ' αὐτῶν τὴν τήχην αὐτῶν αἰτιωμένων ὡς μὲν εἰδύσαν τὴν περικείμενην αὐτῷ νόσον ἐνεκα. Cum omnem operam sine ullo fructu posuissent, ab imperatore risu ac ludibrio habiti sunt, usque adeo ut mordaci in illos epistola professionem ipsam artemque damnaret, ut quæ nihil de ægritudine sua extricare potuisset (30). If this ancient father was no better informed about the fact itself, than the circumstance of time, his authority is of no weight, for he says, that after he had written this vious, unchaste, superstitious, and addicted to magic. What more abominable than his passion for Antinous (y). I omit his excessive curiosity [P]. He published no edict against the Christians; 'tis however believed, that his excessive superstition occasioned their being persecuted. He had regard to the apologies which Quadratus and Aristides presented to him on their behalf. The Jews having again taken arms in his reign, defended themselves for three years against the forces he sent into their country: after which they were worsted, and treated with the utmost severity (z). They tell a ridiculous story, about a question they pretend was put by this emperor to a rabbi on the article of the resurrection. I speak of it in the article BARCHOCHEBAS (aa), as also the things done then in Judæa. Many particular facts which serve to acquaint us with Hadrian's character, his jealousy against those that excelled in arts, &c. will be found in several places of this Dictionary as we have occasion to speak of the persons concerned in these facts. The alphabetical index will point out the particulars. The senate only granted the continuance of Hadrian's acts, to the tears and intreaties of Antoninus (bb); for they had resolved to repeal them. But when once this resolution was evaded, Antoninus obtained whatever he had a mind to, viz. the Apoltheosis of Hadrian. He built a temple to him at Puzzolo, and established there some games with some societies of priests, and other things belonging to the deification (cc). Hadrian had not waited till that time to taste divine honours, having himself seized on the celestial crown. He consecrated to himself an altar in Athens in the temple of Jupiter Olympius: And as he passed through many cities of Asia, he multiplied the temples he built to himself (dd). There is no probability, that he designed them for JESUS CHRIST; and no body knows whence Lampridius took what he says upon that head [Q]. It does not appear that the more liberty to commend himself. Phlegon, one of his freed men, a learned man, put his name to his master's work (49). Hadrian composed some books in imitation of Antimachus, a Greek poet, of whom he was a great admirer (50). These books were very obscure. Spartian had preserved the title of them; but it is a question whether the manuscripts retained it right. So that this very title is a riddle, and a rack to the critics. Salmastius turns himself a hundred ways, in order to draw his conclusion; and after he has fixed the reading that he thinks the only good one, he is as much at a loss as before. 'Solam eam esse veram (lectionem) mihi persuadeo; quomodo tamen explicanda sit juxta cum ignarissimis scio' (51). — I am persuaded, that this is the only true reading, but am quite ignorant how it is to be explained. If this work of Hadrian had been handed down to us, it might have well been said to the author when he was writing it: You are going,

To make racks for future Salmastius's;

The very title will make them submit and give up their arms. It is not well determined, whether Hadrian wrote concerning the military art. It is certain he made some fine regulations (52), and established an excellent discipline among his troops. Vegetius owns that he made use of Hadrian's regulations; but as he acknowledges the same thing with respect to those of Trajan and Augustus, which yet affords no grounds to pretend that these two emperors wrote books upon this subject, it is plain that Gesner had no reason to say, on the authority of this passage of Vegetius, that Hadrian wrote concerning the military art (53). Some will have (54) him to have written on Tactics, and that Urbicius's work upon this subject is Hadrian's, excepting Urbicius's additions. Rigaltius has published a fragment of it.

[P] I omit . . . his excessive curiosity. I might give it this name, tho' he had not desired to penetrate into futurity, so much as he did either by astrology or magic. There are other reasons enough to make him be thought of too inquisitive a spirit. He is called by Tertullian (55), curiositatum omnium explorator — An enquirer after all sorts of curiosities; and by Ammianus Marcellinus, futurorum sciscitationi nimis deditus — too much addicted to enquiries about futurities. I shall not examine whether it became a prince to be so fond of beholding upon the place, whatever he met with in books concerning the several countries of the world. Peregrinations ita cupidus ut omnia quæ legerat de locis orbis terrarum, præsens vellet addicere (56). The voyages he undertook to satisfy himself in this point, were not useless to the provinces; therefore let us not cavil with him on this account. Let us suffer him to ascend Mount Aetna to see whether the rising sun has the same colours as the rainbow (57), and to get upon Mount Cassius to see the same luminary rise (58): but who can pardon him for employing an infinite number of spies, to inform him of all the secrets of families: what a woman wrote to her husband, what an husband said to his wife. Erat curis non solum domus suæ, sed etiam amicorum, ita ut per frumentarios oculos omnia exploraret, nec advertent amici sciri ab Imperatore suam vitam priusquam ipse hoc Imperator offenderet (59). It is not to be doubted but that the intelligence the spies gave him facilitated his enterprizes of galantry; for he gave no better quarter to his friends in these matters, than to indifferent people. It is thus I could willingly understand the words of Spartian (60). Et hoc quidem vitiosissimum putant (he speaks of his spying) atque hinc adiungunt quæ de adulterum amore ac nuptiarum adulterii, quibus Adriani quidem servaverit fidem. Sovereigns have so many other ways to make themselves formidable, that they ought to leave this to parasites, and yet you see some in all ages, who spare nothing to be exactly informed of all that is said in houses. Hadrian's curiosity was doubtless the cause, that almost all his greatest friends, and they whom he had raised to the greatest dignities, incurred his enmity. He greedily swallowed all reports brought him concerning his friends, Facile de amicis quidquid insurrebatur audiebat (62). For the rest, since I have considered him in this remark, as a curious traveller, I will finish it, by saying, that he marched on foot as a common soldier (63), and that he never covered his head in any weather (64). He suffered by it at last (65).

[Q] It is not at all probable, that he designed the temples, which he built, for JESUS CHRIST; and no body knows whence Lampridius took what he says on that head. However let us see what Lampridius says (66): 'Christo templum facere voluit (Alexander Severus) eumque inter Deos recipere, quod & Adrianus cogitasse fertur, qui templa in omnibus civitatibus sine simulacris iusserat fieri, qui hodie idcirco quia non habent numina, dicuntur Adriani, quæ ille ad hoc parasse dicebatur, sed prohibitus est ab iis qui consulentes sacra repperant omnes Christianos futuros, si id optato evenisset, & templa reliqua defendera. — Alexander Severus resolved to build a temple to CHRIST, and to receive him into the number of the gods. Hadrian is reported to have intended to do the same, and ordered temples without images to be built in every city, which because they are not dedicated to any particular deity, are called Hadrian's. These he is said to have designed for that purpose, but was hindered by some, who having consulted

* the oracles, found, that if he should do so, all the world would turn Christians, and the other temples be deserted.' Cafaubon, without doubt, is not to be blamed, for rejecting this as a fable. What I think probable here is this fear of the Heathens, that their temples should be deserted, if Christianity was publicly tolerated. This does more honour to the Christian faith, than the alarms that have appeared in the writings of a refugee minister (67), who, opposing the toleration of religions, has said, amongst other things, put a Ma-bometan, a Socinian, a Papist, and a Calvinist preacher, in the same town, and let not the magistrate intervene by his authority, nor GOD by his spirit and his miracles, and you will see quickly the truth intirely oppressed. Here you see people who are afraid they should preach to walls and benches, vox clamantis in deserto, unless there be no body besides themselves in a town. I do not wonder then they are such enemies to a toleration (68).

(68) Compare with this, what is said in the remark (E) of the article L. V. BIENIETZKI.

H A D R I A N, cardinal, priest of the title of St Chryfogonus (a), was a native of Cornetto, in Tuscany [A]. He was nuncio to Innocent VIII, in Scotland [B], and then in France: and after he had been clerk and treasurer to the apostolic chamber, he was honoured with a cardinal's cap by Pope Alexander VI (b), whose secretary he had been (c). This cardinal's life was a scene of odd changes, the end whereof was far from being honourable. He narrowly escaped on the day in which Alexander VI poisoned himself by a mistake [C]. Afterwards he so incurred the enmity of Julius II, that he was forced to hide himself in the mountains of Trent, fulminated with the severe decrees of this Pontiff (d). Being recalled by Leo X, he had so little gratitude for this favour, that he engaged in a conspiracy against him [D]. This Pope forgave him this fault; and granted letters of pardon for him (e); but the cardinal did not trust to them [E]; or had not the power to withstand the remorse of conscience, which the presence of the objects might render more importunate: he made his escape by night, and it was never certainly known what became of him [F]. He was one of the first that attempted the reformation of the Latin tongue

[A] In Tuscany. I speak this with respect to the ancient division of Italy, for at present Cornetto is in the country called St Peter's Patrimony.

[B] He was nuncio in Scotland. I do not find he was nuncio in England, yet notwithstanding it is true that he gained the affection of king Henry VII, who made him bishop of Hereford, and of Bath and Wells (1).

[C] He escaped narrowly the day when Alexander VI poisoned himself by a mistake. There is something very singular in this adventure. It is thus related by one of our historians (2). Alexander the sixth's bastard longing for cardinal Hadrian Cornet's spoils (3), had agreed with the Pope to go and sup with the cardinal at his villa, and had ordered thither some bottles of excellent wine, but which he had prepared with a mixture to poison their host. Now it happened, that the father and son coming betimes, and being very thirsty, by reason of the heat of the season, asked for some wine, and whilst the servant, who knew the secret, was out of the way, another gave them some of this. The father, who drank it pure, died the same day, which was the seventeenth of August 1503. The son, who was more vigorous, and had diluted it with water, had time to have recourse to antidotes, and having caused himself to be wrapt up in a mule's belly, he escaped; but it left him so weak, that he was not able to act when he had the utmost occasion for it. Hadrian had not been promoted to the cardinalship above two or three months. Guicciardin deserves to be read concerning the death of this Pope (4).

[D] He engaged in a conspiracy against Leo X. Cardinal Alfonso Petrucci was the head of it; they aimed at Leo the tenth's life. Some (5) say, that our Hadrian engaged in it with the hopes of being Pope, and that these hopes were grounded upon some prediction, which promised the Papacy to one Hadrian of mean birth, but illustrious by his learning. As all this agreed to Hadrian de Cornetto, he applied it to himself, and thereby lost all his honour, and the repose of his life. We may venture to say, that there are no greater pests to mankind, than those pretenders to predictions; for they find but too many ignorant and turbulent spirits, whom they engage in fatal enterprises. A well governed state ought not to suffer such people, which way soever they boast to have consulted heaven, whether by the stars, or by the apocalypse. Most of them are impostors, who have no other aim, than the disturbing the public peace. He who deceived cardinal de Cornetto, was a magician in the Apennine mountains, as Mr Varillas says, who tells this story at large. See the 276th page of his Secret History of Florence. But Paul Jovius says, it was a sorcerer's. Certam spem adipiscendi Pontificatus conceperunt ex oraculo fatidicæ mulieris. Thus he speaks about the beginning of the fourth book of the history of Leo X.

[E] Leo X granted letters of pardon for him; but he did not trust to them. Mr Varillas observes, that two things made cardinal Hadrian dissident; one was, that cardinal Soderini and he were fined ten thousand crowns a-piece, though they had prostrated themselves at the Pope's feet, and the Pope had declared, in a full consistory, that he would pardon the cardinals, who were accomplices in the conspiracy, if they confessed their crime immediately, and asked his pardon before their brethren. The other, was the marks of indignation, which, in spite of his endeavours, appeared in Leo's countenance. See the 283d, and 284th pages of the Secret History of Florence.

[F] It was never certainly known what became of him. It is worth while to hear Pierius Valerianus upon it, who places our cardinal at the head almost of his catalogue of unfortunate learned men. Nesci clam fugam arripuit, neque quid abierit, neque ubi sit quatuordecim jam annorum spatium quispiam potuit explorare. He adds, that it was thought his servant killed him, for the sake of the pistoles the cardinal had sewed up in his waistcoat. Conflans tamen opinio est eum in furo in interiorum toratem auro oneratum comitis famuli perfidia oppressum, atque surrepto cadaver in solitum aliquem locum abjectum occultari. Father Oldoini observes, that he was divested of the purple and his benefices; that he fled into Turkey, and died clandestinely, on what day or year no man knows (6). This agrees with Leander Albertus, in his description of Italy, Nostra insuper ætate, says he, magna illustrandæ patriæ principia jecerat Adrianus Cardinalis ex hac urbe (Cornetto) cum literarum studio, tum cæremoniarum, sed qui metu Leonis X. Pontif. Max. clam Roma profectus, exinde nunquam apparuit. The author of the Secret History of Florence says (7), that cardinal Hadrian went from Rome in the disguise of a reaper; that he travelled only by night till he came into his country, where he spent the rest of his days in changing hiding-places; so fully persuaded was he of the magician's prediction.

Here are two things borrowed from Paul Jovius (8); the rest is perhaps the author's invention. Guicciardin is still more general than Paul Jovius. Adriano partitè occultamente, quello che s'avenisse di lui, non fu mai più, che si seppe, nè trovato nè veduto in luogo alcuno (9). He says this under the year 1517, whence we may conclude, that Pierius Valerianus's dialogues, de Infelicitate Literatorum, were composed in 1531. Mores has placed our Hadrian's flight in the year 1518. Why did he not follow Guicciardin's chronology? He sends this fugitive to Venice and Riva, in the diocese of Trent. I fear he confounds the exile under Julius II with that under Leo X.

in a right manner. He studied Cicero with excellent success, and made abundance of admirable discoveries concerning the purity of this language. The treatise he wrote de Sermone Latino, while he absconded in the Alps, is a proof of it. Whilst he was labouring upon this he laid aside a very considerable work, which was a Latin translation of the Old Testament [G]. Some reckon it amongst the works he composed (f). It is pretended also, that his tract de Poëtis is still extant. As to his treatise de Vera Philosophia, there is no doubt it was printed at Cologne in 1548. He wrote in verse [H].

HADRIAN VI was born at Utrecht, in the year 1459 (a) [A]. The genius which was discovered in him in his childhood, obliged his father [B] to design him for learning, though he had not wherewithal to maintain him in the schools. But the university of Louvain, supplied this domestic indigence. The young man was admitted in a college, where a certain number of scholars were maintained gratis. We are told, that he used to read by night, by the light of the lamps [C] that were hung up in churches, or the corners of the streets: which was both a sign of his poverty and of his studious temper. He made very great progress in all kinds of sciences, and if he was not a poet [D], nor a polite writer, it was because

[A] He was born at Utrecht. This town, in Latin, is called Trajectum ad Rhenum, as Maëricht is called Trajectum ad Mosam. Some (1) who only say, that Hadrian was Trajectensis, have caused others (2) to make him a native of Maëricht. So true it is, that the least inaccuracy occasions some author to stumble. Probably Father Labbe perceived Bellarmin's negligence; for in his commentary upon this Jesuit's ecclesiastical writers, he does not use the word Trajectensis, but Utrechtensis. It is so certain, that Trajectum alone rather signifies, Maëricht than Utrecht, that Mr de Marolles is not excusable for taking (3) Trajectensem urbem for Utrecht, in the second book of Gregorius Turonensis. The subject was concerning the retreat of St Servatius, bishop of Tongres, and that was another reason for his not mistaking Maëricht. I doubt not but the learned Onuphrius Panvinus has taken Trajectensis here, for a man born at Maëricht. Adrianus VI, says he (4), Trajectensis, Flander vel Brabantinus. An error a thousand times more pardonable than that of a German writer, who says (5), Adrianus VI. patria Dertbuisiensis Germanus. Some make him born in Italy (6): Ut plane ridiculi sunt qui in suis ad Alphonsi Ciacconii historiam additionibus natales Adriani majorese Italie vindicant. Jerome Niger, an Italian author, said of this Pope, he speaks Latin always well enough for a Spaniard (7).

[B] His father. His name was Florent Boyens, and he got his living by barge making, Nauegus (8). Others make him a weaver, and others a brewer. I think the first opinion is the rightest, since Valerius Andreas, who has made a great many enquiries concerning Pope Hadrian VI, says not a word of the other trades ascribed to his father. As for the son, he was called Hadrianus Florentius, that is, Hadrian, son of Florent: It was the custom of the country, and still remains amongst the vulgar.

[C] We are told that he used to read by night, by the light of the lamps. This I have from Gabriel Naudé: 'Non secus omnino, says he (9), ac olim fecere maximi illi viri, Euclides dum noctu Megaris Athenas proficereetur ad audiendum Socratem. . . . Adrianusque præterea ejus nominis Pontifex sextus, & Augustinus Steuchus Eugubinus, quos inter luctandum cum studiis & angustioris vitæ miseris, sæpe videre fuit ad elychnios noctu in templis aut compitis collucentes legendi desiderio accessisse. — In the same manner as these great men in ancient times did, Euclid while he travelled by night from Megara to Athens to hear Socrates . . . Pope Hadrian VI, and Augustinus Steuchus of Eugubio, who while they struggled with their studies, and the miseries of a narrow fortune, were frequently seen reading by the light of the lamps, in the churches or in the streets.'

[D] And if he was not a poet. One of the things that made him derided by the Italians, was his slighting of poetry, and delicacy of stile, two things by which a great many under Leo X had made their fortunes, and upon which they had valued themselves most in that country, for fifty or sixty years. Hadrian had his reasons for it, for the poets had produced the same ill effects, which they afterwards produced in France (10). 'Quod unum ei viri elegantes desuisse prædicant, eloquentiæ cultioris flores, & poetarum amoenitates conternere erat solitus, sive quod putaret eas sibi aliquid de gravissimorum studiorum autoritate detrachere, sive quod castis & piis ingeniis poetarum lusus pravos mores importare & religionibus officere arbitraretur' (11). — In this only he was deficient, in the opinion of the admirers of polite learning, that he used to despise the flowers of eloquence, and the charms of poetry: whether because he thought they would lessen the application to his more severe studies, or because he was of opinion, that the licentiousness of poets corrupted the morals of chaste and pious minds, and were detrimental to religion. He was so little disposed to favour them, that one of the reasons of Paul Jovius's experiencing his kindness, was because he had not joined poetry to the study of the liberal arts. 'Jovium omnino eo . . . sacerdotio esse perornandum, quæ audivisset optimis disciplinis liberaliter eruditum, & scriptorem annalium valde elegantem, nec tamen esse poetam, ut cæteri qui cultio res literas sectarentur' (12). — That Jovius should certainly have that benefice, who, as he was informed, was well versed in the most useful learning, and a very elegant annalist, and yet not a poet, as at that time all those were who cultivated polite literature. The Paganism which the poets scattered in their works, contributed not a little to this Pope's coldness for them, for he understood not rallery in this point. He was no complainant man in these matters (13). He turned away his head when he was shewn the statue of Laocoon, and said these were the images of impiety. 'Ornamenta insignis pietatis & statuarum præfæ artis nequaquam magni fecit, adeo ut Vianefio Bononiensium legato commendante statuum Laocoonis, quam in Belvederii viridarii Julius ingenti pretio coemptam ad loci dignitatem collocarat, averfis statim oculis tanquam impie gentis simulacra vituperaret. — He was no admirer either of fine painting, or of antique statues: so that when Vianefius, the ambassador from Bologna, was com-because he did not value it. His manners were exemplary; and no man was ever known to intrigue less than he. A living was given him in Holland [E], without his expecting it. The meek reputation of his probity and learning, sued for him with those that raised him (b). He took his doctor's degree at Louvain, the twenty first of June, 1491. A little after he was made canon of St Peter and divinity professor in the same city, and afterwards dean of St Peter, and vice-chancellor of the university. He was removed from this collegiate life, to court, in 1507, in order to be preceptor to the arch-duke Charles, then seven years of age (c). He made no great progress in Latin under him [F]; and it was said, that Chievres, this young prince's governor, was the cause of it (d). There is nothing commonly more disagreeable to children than study; corporeal exercises are much more their delight. It was therefore said, that Chievres, desiring to have the sole possession of his pupil, and all the glory of his progress, cultivated his inclination and his bias, and was indifferent about his improvement by the lessons of the Louvain professor. However, the preceptor had as noble recompences as any man of that employ ever had; for it was Charles the fifth's interest that raised him to the Papacy [G]. Before this he

He turned away his eyes, to show his contempt of the images of that idolatrous people. Paul Jovius (14) informs us of this particular. Judge whether the lovers of the fine arts, whether the Italians, who admired this masterpiece of sculpture, could have an esteem for such a Pope. The poets made him sensible, that it was not said without reason, Genus irritabile vatum. — Poets a touchy race. Here is an epigram that Sannazarius regaled him with.

I will transcribe below, Pierius Valerianus's invective. Pasquin's statue was continually checkered with satirical verses against Hadrian. I shall say in another place (15), why he did not demolish it as he had resolved.

[E] The living which was given him in Holland.] Paul Jovius says (16), that Margaret Maximilian the emperor's daughter, governess of the Netherlands, procured him this living, and that he was a little after preferred to the deanry of Louvain. He is mistaken in making this princess governess of the Netherlands at that time: for she was not so till after the death of the duke of Savoy, her second actual husband. I use this word, because the first prince (17), to whom she was betrothed, returned her before the consummation of the marriage, and because I give no credit to those who say the duke of Savoy did not consummate his marriage with her (18). At the most, since he died in 1504, it is clear, that Margaret of Austria was not governess of the Netherlands, when Hadrian was promoted to the deanry of Louvain, which was in the year 1497 (19). Paul Jovius must have confounded this Margaret, with the widow of Charles the Hardy, last duke of Burgundy, sister to Edward the fourth king of England. She was also called Margaret, and was at the charge of Hadrian's promotion to his doctor of divinity's degree (20). They who tell us this, say indeed, that this doctor had the deanry of St Peter's at Louvain; that of Notre-Dame at Antwerp; a canonry, and the treasurer's office at Notre-Dame le Grand of Utrecht, and the provostship of St Saviour in the same city; but they speak not of any benefice, with cure of souls, or any parochial church. This parish is perhaps another confusion of Paul Jovius. Cardinal Pallavicini (21), has corrected nothing in this narration of that writer.

[F] Charles V. made no great progress in Latin under him.] Every body has heard how this emperor, upon hearing a speech made to him in Latin, and not understanding it, cried out, with a sigh, Hadrian told me how it would be. Paul Jovius speaks of it, as of a thing that happened in his presence (22): Audivi ego Cæsarem, quum Genæ Latinam orationem à quodam recitatum nequaquam præclare intelligerat, suspirantem hæc verba ore protulisse: agnosco, inquit, nunc maxime & cum dolore quidem magistri mei divina monita, quam hos flores & elegantias Latini sermonis percipere nequeam, & meminere eum sæpe prædixisse, me aliquando puerilis incuria pœnas daturum. This historian had been saying, that Hadrian, not being able to stand it out against Chievres, contented himself with forewarning his young scholar, that he would repent his negligence hereafter. Hadrianum auctoritate impari, & natura lenissimum, officio facile decessisse, ita tamen ut discipulo perblande diceret, futurum aliquando ut eum præsentis negligentia pœniteret. Charles V experienced it at Genoa, and frankly confessed it. Camerarius (23) would have Hadrian responsible for this emperor's using an interpreter, when speeches were made in to him Latin, as if he had been more solicitous to instruct his pupil in the Catholic religion, that in good letters; but this confession of the emperor, is sufficient to excuse the tutor. Mr Varillas (24) enters into a long dispute against the Spanish historians, pretending that it is false, either that Chievres was guilty of what he is accused of with respect to his pupil's Latin, or that Charles V was ignorant of this language, or that he was un luckily sensible of this defect upon the hearing an oration which was made to him. As to the last fact, which the Spaniards, as he says, suppose to have happened in Germany, he maintains, that it is not related in any author of other nations. Would he have spoke thus, had he known the story of the oration at Genoa, mentioned by Paul Jovius?

[G] It was Charles the fifth's interest that raised him to the Papacy.] Paul Jovius observes, that Hadrian had a share in the numerous promotions of the year 1517 (25), by virtue of Maximilian the emperor's letters (26). He adds some other reasons. As to the Papacy, it is a very common opinion, that Hadrian came to it, by the strong interest of the emperor Charles V. Cæsare urgente Leoni demortuo absens (rare & inusitato sanè exemplo) Pontifex Max. undequadragesima patrum purpuratorum suffragiis creatur (27). — In compliance with the pressing solicitations of the emperor, he, upon the death of Leo, was, tho' absent, (a thing very uncommon) elected Pope, by the suffrages of thirty nine cardinals. It is said, that Amyot owed the place of grand-almoner of France, to a conversation which happened on the subject of Charles V, at the table of Charles IX. This emperor was praised for many things, but especially for his making his preceptor Pope. . . . The merit of this M O T.

action was so heightened, that it made an impression on Charles IX, so as to say, that if occasion offered he would do as much for his (28). It is therefore a pretty general opinion, that Pope Hadrian VI, was the creature of Charles V. But yet it seems, that this emperor procured him the papacy, but indirectly, and by accident. Paul Jovius, who has dived well enough into the intrigues of this conclave, tells us, that Julian de Medicis, the head of the strongest faction, did not concern himself for Hadrian, till Tom. II, p. 8. he found he could do nothing for himself (29). It is true, Hadrian's attachment for the interest of Charles V, made Julian's faction very favourable to him, when they could not carry it for the latter. They mention an inscription wherein Hadrian owned when resigning himself obliged to his imperial majesty for all his greatness (30). This inscription was composed, say this Pope, they,

was sent ambassador in Spain, to king Ferdinand, and some say he managed things with much greater address [H], than could be expected from a man who had so long imbibed the university air. He softened this monarch, who was much dissatisfied with his son-in-law's treatment of him, and with the zeal the nobility had expressed for the Austrian princes. Hadrian removed these ill impressions, the consequences whereof were to be feared, and was honoured a little after with the bishopric of Tortosa [I], and continued his embassy notwithstanding. He discharged the functions of it till Ferdinand's death (e). After which he shared the regency with cardinal Ximenes (f) [K]. It is true, his share was the least, to say no worse (g): but there came they, in these words, Ultrajectum plantavit, Lovanium rigavit, Caesar vero incrementum dedit; that is, Utrecht planted, Louvain watered, but the emperor gave the increase: upon which some body said, there is nothing left here for GOD to do. Deo istuc nec fertur, nec metitur. This doth not hinder the creation of this Pope to have been only an effect of chance and spleen. Read these verses of Pierius Valerianus, which are as fine as satirical (31).

Whilst such was look'd for on Liguria's shores,
Where Adria, or the Tyrrhene ocean, roars;
On Leman hills, or on the banks of Po,
Thro' various countries as it's waters flow;
O'er ev'ry coast of the wide western main,
In German realms, in Frante, and distant Spain;
Or where the foamy flood Sarmatia waves,
Or ibrows around Britannia's isles it's waves:
Faction, to an unusual frenzy grown,
Sent us this man, to fill the Papal throne:
From the far distant Rhine, obscure of fame,
Untaught of, undesir'd by all, he came.
O sea and land! the universal voice
Makes Hadrian Pope . . . a most unwilling choice:
Heav'n's secret councils so decreed, that they,
Who scorn to own the floating vessel's sway,
May learn from hence the viper to obey;
That the grave fathers, swoll'n with mutual gall,
Might abuse a leader hated by them all;
And be, to a'rd all with malice prepossess'd,
Revenge on each the malice of the rest.

Naudé relates (32) that Peter Martyr, not the Florentine heretic, but the apostolic protonotary, a native of a little town of the duchy of Milan, said, speaking of the election of Hadrian VI: Cardinalibus hoc loco accidit quod in fabula de Pardo ac Leone super Agno raptando scribitur; fortibus illis strenue se dilacerantibus, quodcumque quadrupes iners aliud prædæ se dominum fecit. That is, according to Lewis de May's version, author of the notes on the Coups d'Etat. It happened to the cardinals, on this occasion, what the fable tells of the leopard and the lion, in contending for a lamb: whilst these two generous animals were tearing one another, in contending valiantly for the prey, one of the most cowardly and brutish of beasts, made himself master of it.

(32) Naudé, Coups d'Etat, pag. m. 23.

[H] In his he embassy managed things with address.] Mr Varillas is of another opinion. According to him (33), Hadrian was fit for nothing but to dictate in a college; he understood neither politics nor court intrigues, for which this is given amongst other proofs, that, in his embassy to Arragon, he did not answer Chievres expectation. But who told Varillas that this was a sign of his inability? Hadrian hated Chievres on many accounts (34); and instead of negotiating according to his views, he did him ill offices underhand. This no doubt was ill answering this lord's hopes, but was no sign of inability.

Many authors (35) whom I have consulted, agree, that Ferdinand gave Hadrian this bishopric. But Mr Varillas says (36), that it was given him after this prince's death, as an amends for the power he was deprived of. We must know, that cardinal Ximenes, nominated regent of the kingdom by Ferdinand's will (37), would fill that post in spite of the commission that Hadrian had brought from Flanders, to be regent of Castile and Arragon, in case of Ferdinand's death. The cardinal was more resolute than Hadrian in his pretensions; for the latter was brought to be content with part of the regency, and Mr Varillas supposes he was made bishop (38), to make him amends. I have just been looking in a book (39) later than Mr Varillas's, where I find, that the author supposes our Hadrian was not bishop at the time of the dispute about the regency. Relating the circumstances of this dispute, he calls him only dean of Louvain, and he says (40), that Ximenes pretended that this dean having consented to have it only as a second, the dignity and rank he bore in Castile, not permitting a SIMPLE PRIEST, as the dean was, to pretend to a precedence over a cardinal archbishop, he would allow him only what share he thought fit. The bishop of Nismes says expressly (41), that the dean came not to the bishopric of Tortosa, but by Ximenes's recommendation after Ferdinand's death; and as he cites Alvara Gomez (42) and Peter Martyr (43), it is probable that Paul Jovius and the Biographers of the Netherlands, are mistaken. The manner of Ferdinand's receiving the dean, does not intimate that he made him a bishop: He had penetrated the true subject of his embassy, he had treated him as a spy, and when Hadrian solicited for a second audience, he angrily answered what would he have? does he come to know whether I am dying? tell him I am not to be seen to day. However he saw him a few days after, by the advice of his ministers, and told him, that he was not well enough to treat with him about business, and ordered him to retire to Guadalupe, to the convent of St Jerome He gave him officers, in appearance, to serve him, but in effect to guard him, and to binder suspected people from having any commerce with him (44).

[K] He shared the regency with cardinal Ximenes.]

There is great probability in one of the circumstances related by Mr Varillas. He says, (45) that one of the arguments urged to the dean of Utrecht (46), during his dispute with Ximenes about the regency, was the representing came a time when his authority was much greater. Ximenes took too much upon him, for which reason the arch-duke Charles sent him home, when he went in person to take possession of his kingdoms of Spain; and some time after he gave the government to Hadrian in a very honourable manner, I mean, when he departed for Germany, where the imperial crown called him (b). Hadrian found himself much embarrassed with the government of so many kingdoms, because there arose a dangerous sedition, which he could not have been able to surmount, had he not had two colleagues assigned him, viz. the Constable and Amirante of Castile. The invasion of Navarre by the French, was another great trouble during his government. He came off with honour, and while he was enjoying the satisfaction of having recovered Navarre, he received the news of his election to the papacy (i). I have omitted to say, that Leo X, gave him a cardinal's cap in the year 1517. After his death, the several factions of the conclave terminated in the election of Hadrian (k), which highly displeased the people of Rome [L]. The new Pope embarking in Catalonia arrived at Rome the thirtieth of August [M]. He refused to change his name; and in every thing expressed his aversion to pomp and pleasures, which was a thing against which prescription was very old. His Pontificate lasted but till the fourteenth of September 1523. He had a great partiality for the emperor Charles V, and very little satisfaction in his triple crown [N]. It was perhaps his discontent, that gave representing to him, 'that if he attempted to execute the commissions he had brought from Flanders, he would kindle a civil war in Spain, and be answerable to God for all the murders, and other crimes, that should be committed; as he himself had previously confessed, in his excellent commentary on the Mass of the Sentences, where he had taught, that a man raising disturbances in a state, when he might forbear it, without hazarding his conscience, and his honour, was responsible for all the subsequent calamities. We have seen, above, that the death was an honest man, and that he was not well skilled in the matter he pretended to. He was so charmed with the deference that was paid him, in referring to himself an affair wherein he was a party, and with the honour done him in citing the writings he had formerly dictated in the university of Louvain, and afterwards printed, that he promised to submit to what the council of Spain should determine, provided an expedient was found to secure his reputation, and hinder the arch-duke's commissions from being turned into ridicule.' Here is exactly the fable of the Raven and the Fox, only with this difference, that the Raven lost his prey for future praises, whereas honest Hadrian lost his, for praises given his singing in times past.

[L] His election highly displeased the people of Rome. What they call in the conclave, being elected by inspiration, had a great share in Hadrian's fortune. The cardinal de Medicis, at the head of all the young cardinals, a faction more powerful than that which is sometimes called the Flying Squadron, had no sooner resolved upon the election of the cardinal of Tortosa, but he made his party promise to give him their voices all at once. This was done. The opening of the ballots, shewing that a candidate was proposed, of whom it seemed no body had yet thought, caused a great surprize. Cardinal Cajetan gave fresh encouragement, by advising those that were nearest him to take this side, since it was as he said, that of God and men (47). Immediately many of them espoused his interest with a good grace, by I know not what motive of religion; others, who knew not so much as the cardinal of Tortosa's name, hesitated, but nevertheless followed the prevailing opinion: the torrent of inspiration hurried them along, and made them forget all their interests. None but cardinal Urfini resisted this inspiration of the conclave. Julian de Medicis was overjoyed, but the others fell into a sad dejection; and the people were so enraged at their choice, that they loaded them with a thousand abuses, upon the coming out of the conclave. Id populus adeo indignanter tulit, ut quum patefacto Conclavi Cardinales domum redirent, passim maledictis incesserent, quod infamibus committi non modo urbem Romam suo antistite orbam prodidissent, sed quod infamie proximum videretur, Italiani etiam Pontificatus honore spoliassent (48). — The populace were so enraged at it, that they loaded the cardinals with curses as they went home, upon the breaking up of the conclave, calling out, that they had by their infamous cabals, not only betrayed the city of Rome, which was deprived of its head, but had also, which appeared to be next to madness, robbed Italy of the honour of the popeedom. One of them thanked the people, for suffering them to come off so cheap, whereas if they had had their deserts, they should have been stoned. Adaperta conclavi quum globus Cardinalium Hadriani pontem esset prætervehtus, & episcopi puerique minacibus oculis vocaque & manibus obfrepent, nec à sacratissimis prebris abstinere, Sigismundus Gonzaga Cardinalis videntem vultu his egit gratias, quod adversus extrema supplicia meritis contumelias essent contenti, nec lapidibus publicam injuriam vindicarent (49). The peoples indignation was founded upon their having had no regard to the stain of original sin, and the fear that the new Pope would keep this see elsewhere than in Rome.

[M] He arrived at Rome the thirtieth of August. Francis Swertius (50) says, that Didacus Stunica has made a relation of this voyage. I doubt it much; for Nicolas Antonio does not speak of it, tho' he speaks of another relation of a voyage written by this author, of less consequence than this would be. Probably Swertius has confounded the one with the other. The relation mentioned by Nicolas Antonio, is that of a voyage which Stunica made to Rome in 1520, which Schottus has inserted in the end of his Spanish Bibliothèque. Instead of Didacus Stunica, he should have called him Blaise Ortiz, for it is he who composed a relation of the voyage of Hadrian VI. It was printed at Toledo, in the year 1548. The author went from Spain to Rome with this Pope (51).

[N] He had very little satisfaction in his triple crown. This is signified in the inscription he would have engraven on his tomb; Adrianus VI hic situs est, qui nihil sibi infelicis in vita duxit quam quod imperaret — Here lies Hadrian VI, who esteemed no misfortune, which happened to him in life, so great, as his being called to govern. Father Labbe (52) says, this epitaph was put on his tomb in the church of St Mary dell'Anima, but he is mistaken; the cardinal, who erected him a mausoleum in this church, put a much longer and more pompous inscription on it. It is to be seen in abundance of authors. The other was only engraven on the tomb where he was provisionally deposited in St Peter's church. See Paul Jovius at the end of this Pope's life. We need not wonder that Hadrian VI thought the papal crown so heavy, for the general affairs of Christendom were in great confusion in his pontificate, and he was not sufficiently acquainted with the genius of the Italians, to avoid offending them in a thousand instances. The news he daily received of the progresses and menaces of the Ottomans, and his little experience in the affairs of Italy, so disturbed his head, that he could not forbear saying, he had more satisfaction in governing a college of Louvain, than in governing the whole Christian church. Necesse erat Pontificem rerum Italicarum penitus ignarum, & tum primum urbium suarum & provinciarum regularumque nomina perdiscentem, in omnibus consiliis vubementissimè conturbari, adeo ut quum his curarum fluctibus jactaretur, aliquando diceret, sibi fuisse jucundius Lovanii gymnasium cum studiorum laude moderari, quam Romæ pontificiam in sede Christianam rempublicam administrare (53). If he had not been able to know, of himself, that his irresolutions and delays caused mischief and murmurs, he occasion to such a behaviour, as made him pass for a hater of mankind [O]. The Italians have published heinous calumnies against him [P]; and even they, who instead of defaming him in his morals, acknowledge his probity and zeal, fail not to say, he was not fit to be Pope [Q]. His very sobriety has not escaped raileries [R]. The joy that was expressed for his death, was in reality a great commendation would have known it by the reproaches he received from Ferdinand's ambassador, even to his face, who began his speech thus: 'Fabius Maximus, sanctissime pater, rem Romanum cunctando restituit, tu vero pariter cunctando rem Romanam simulque Europam perdere contendis. — Most holy father, Fabius Maximus, by delays, restored the affairs of Rome; but you, by delays, endeavour to ruin, not only Rome, but all Europe.' This exordium so confounded the Pope, that as the cardinals hated him, they were ready to break out into laughter (54).

[O] His behaviour made him pass for a hater of mankind.] Pierius Valerianus (55) makes him a man who avoided human society, and who in the cavalcades kept at as great a distance as possible from the courtiers; he put spurs to his horse when he saw others approach him. To see this author's satire in all its extent, we must choose certain editions, for there are some that have been expunged in this particular. That of Basil, of 1575, is not of this number, as Father Theophilus Raynaud has observed (56), who has taken this Pope's part, against the humanists of that time.

I do not mention the Capitolo of Bernai against this Pope; I only say, that this passage is not to be taken literally:

Basta ch'egli hanno fatto un Papa santo Che dice ogni mattina la sua Messa,
E non s'el tocca mai se non col guanto.

Sufficient 'tis we have got a saint for pope,
Who every morning mutters o'er his mass,
And toucheth not himself without a glove.

It is a burlesque, familiar, and even a proverbial hyperbole amongst the Italians, Gli hypocriti, says Aretin Giorn. I della II parte, che non sel toccano mai se non col guanto. — The hypocrites who never touch themselves but with a glove. I owe this observation to Mr de la Monnoie.

[P] The Italians have published heinous calumnies against him.] They were not contented to accuse him of prodigious avarice, but gave out (57), that they had at last discovered the reason of his retiring every day into a corner of the Vatican, where he suffered no body to enter; that it was not like Numa, to consult heaven how to govern well, but to careen a handsome woman; his nymph Egeria. They added, that the distemper he died of, proceeded from too much use of venery (58); and that he was not contented to divert himself with women, but also must have handsome boys (59). This was not all. They published that he was a magician, and that his friends, desiring to elude the proofs that were taken from I know not how many magical instruments, which were found in his chamber after his death, said, that laboured to find the philosopher's stone. As it could not be denied, that he had the outward appearance of an honest man, and was a lover of reformation and justice, they saved themselves by saying, that he was only a hypocrite; and that this vice is more common in Germany, than is imagined. See, concerning all this, a letter of Christopher Battus, to Jerome Saulius, in the second volume of Wolfius. We read in the supplement of the abbot of Ursperg's chronicle (60), that they found amongst this Pope's secret papers, some magical books, and that some pretend he came to the Papacy by this wicked art.

Note, that Gerard Moringus observes, that this honest Pope understanding that the Italians formed evil suspicions upon his bringing some youths from Spain, sent them immediately back into their own country. 'Si quando antea, tum maxime speciem omnem impudicæ amovit. Roque cum adolescentes aliquot honestæ tum indolis tum stirpis in gratiam parentum in familiam ascitos, ex Hispaniis secum in urbem duxisset, intellexissetque Italos ex convictu illorum, nescio quæ abominanda, nostratibus inusitata suspicari, statim in Hispanias remisit, in academia Salmanticensi plenius licetis imbuedos, quibus antea domi ipsius à pio simul & erudito viro Theodorico Hezio secretario ipsius utcumque imbuti fuerant eo jubente (61). — If at any time before, he then more particularly removed the smallest appearances of impurity. Therefore, having brought over with him from Spain, some youths of good parts, as well as of good birth, whom he had, at the desire of their relations, taken into his family: and hearing that the Italians took occasion, from this, to suspect I do not know what abominable practices, quite unknown to our countrymen, he presently sent them back to Spain, to finish their studies in the university of Salamanca, which they had begun, while in his family, under the pious and learned Theodorico Hezius, his secretary.' The same writer expresses an extreme indignation against the author of the letter I have quoted, which Wolfius has inserted in the second volume of his lectures. Battus quidam Parmensis quandam de ejus defuncti relicta fama epistolam edidit, Latinam quidem illam ac tersam, sed adeo impudentem mendacem, ut ipsa mentiendi impudentia, dicam an inficitia, vel apud malevolos fidem sibi abroget. Quid os impurum eo impulerit, nihil esse aliud reor, quam id quod Comicus habet, Mala mens, malus animus (62). — Battus of Parma published an epistle concerning his character, in elegant Latin indeed, but filled with such notorious falsehoods, that the grossness, or shall I say the folly, of his lies, will deprive him of credit even among the most malicious. I cannot imagine what could tempt him to such impudent abuse, except, as the comic poet has it, mala mens malus animus, the wickedness of his own heart.

[Q] Even they who acknowledge his zeal, fail not to say, that he was not fit to be Pope.] Few will read this place, without perceiving that cardinal Palavicini is pointed at, and thinking of the new gospel, in which many maxims of his history of the council of Trent have been so severely censured. Hadrian VI was, in the cardinal's opinion, an excellent ecclesiastic, but an indifferent Pope. Fu Ecclesiastico ottimo, Pontefice in verità mediocre (63). He was less esteemed in the opinion even of the people, who judge of things only by the event; for, in consequence of the bad success of his reign, he was reckoned even less than an indifferent Pope (64). This honest Flemming, not finding in Italy the candour and sincerity, in which he had been trained up, entered into a general mistrust: he believed that snares were laid for him every where; he durst trust only those of his own country, who, with their openness, without experience, did him more injury, than the Italians would have done with their dissimulation. The Jansenist, who wrote the new gospel, has made a malicious use of all cardinal Palavicini's concessions concerning the good qualities of this pope; but at the bottom, the cardinal is not so much in the wrong, as may be pretended. It is true, if the Christian church was what it ought to be, the same virtues which would furnish out a good clergyman, would suffice for a Pope; but (65) in the state in which the church of Rome has long continued, under an head whose spiritual power is so incorporated with the temporal, that the preservation of the one depends upon that of the other, it is folly to pretend, that a Pope, who understands not the arts of courts, and the flights of politics, can discharge his duty. See the remark [U] of the article BELLARMIN, at the end. To accomplish the Protestants' prophecies, there need be but four or five Popes successively, such as some have been, who were otherwise rigid moralists. However, it is worth while to see Dr de Launoi's letter (66) wherein he makes our Hadrian's apology against cardinal Palavicini.

[R] His very sobriety has not escaped raileries.] He was so little used to the dainties of Rome, that there was no fish he preferred before fock fish; so that the price of this fish rose considerably in his pontificate, not without the laughter of all the fish-market. Instead of praising him for this, Paul Jovius has had the boldness to say, that he had no better taste with respect to good dishes, than judgment for the administration of affairs. I so weaken the force of this author's Latin, that it is necessary dation of him [S]. I cannot tell whether they were Catholics or Protestants, who gave out first that he permitted sacrifices to be made to the heathen gods, in order to stop the pestilence [T]. Guicciardin has not spared him more than others; for he pretends (1) that they who elected this barbarian to the popedom, were led rather by a blind fury, than by choice and deliberation (m); and that being unable to assign any reason for their extravagant conduct, they excused themselves by imputing it to the HOLY GHOST, who was used, as they said, to inspire the cardinals, during the election of the Popes (n). Hadrian's body was deposited in the Vatican church, betwixt those of Pius II and Pius III, and removed afterwards to St Mary dell' Anima. William Enckevort, the only cardinal he had made, took all the care of it, and rat juventutis corruptores, ejus enim criminis non omnino falsa suspitione urbs ipsa conviventibus legibus infecta credebatur. Quâ inopinatâ & gravi severissimâ legis mentione, maculosos quosdam cum aulæ tum civitatibus vultu desperata publica securitate terruerat, ades ut non defuerint petulantissimi juvenes, qui Joanni Antracino Pontificis Medico postea fella fronde per intempestam noctem protinus exornarent, cum titulo uncialibus literis inscriptis in hæc verba, Liberatori Patriæ S.P. Q.R. (70). Could the joy at such a sovereign's death, be any thing else than a proof of his virtue? Paul Jovius relates, that this joy was excessively great. 'Morte ejus plerique & præsertim veteris aulæ sectatores effusissime sunt lætati, & secundum eos nonnulli Romanorum qui detrimenda rerum suarum fenerant. — Most people, especially the courtiers of the former Pope, rejoiced exceedingly at his death; and next to them, some of the citizens of Rome, who had suffered in their particular affairs.

[T] I cannot tell . . . who they were, who first gave out that he permitted sacrifices to be made to the heathen gods, in order to stop the pestilence. I have not yet had time to proceed far in the search of the original of this lye. I have only traced it to a book printed at Amsterdam, in 1661 (71), wherein are these words. 'Is (Adrianus VI.) ad avertendam pestem quæ gravissime in urbe sæviebat, Mago Demetrio Græco J. d. n. Letus, concessit sylvestrem taurum Diis Gentilium ad placandum eorum iram mactare, cessavitque lues. — Hadrian, in order to avert a plague which then raged violently in the city, allowed Demetrius, a Greek magician, to sacrifice a wild bull to the heathen deities, to appease their wrath, and accordingly the plague ceased.

The author cites Paul Jovius in the twenty first book of his history; but we must believe in charity, and for his honour, that he had not read this historian. Let us see what Paul Jovius says; the passage deserves relating. He only says, that the Pope did not severely forbid the communication with the infected houses, and that this method, which was very different from the customs of Italy, occasioned the death of abundance of people. He is not said to have given leave to the magician to make this sacrifice; it is only said in general, that no body durst oppose the populace, who favoured this Demetrius: besides, it is not said that this man pretended to sacrifice the bull to the heathen Gods; and as to the success, it is only said, the plague decreased. What then do they think of, who cite Paul Jovius, when they vent so many circumstances which he has not mentioned? 'Exorta est in Urbe pestilentia lues, quæ quum sevis legibus more nostro Pontifici minime coercenda videretur, contactu ægrorum ita exarsit, ut multa funera in compitis viserentur, appareretque vastari Urbem, laud multo dierum spatio, nisi Græculus quidam nomine Demetrius Spartanus, sedandæ pestilentia, faventi ei turba hominum, negotium suscepisset, nemine superstitionem vetare auso. Nam ferum taurum, cui dimidium cornu dissecarat, magico carmine dextram in aurem prolato repente ita mansuetum reddiderat, ut injecto tenui filo ad integrum cornu, quo vellet perducens, pestilentia placando numini ad Amphitheatrum immolaret. Nec credulæ multitudinis spem ex toto fessellit, quum ab ea inanis sacrificii prospera litatione, mittere morbus cepisset (72). — The plague broke out in the city, and the Pope not ibinking it proper to confine the infected, by severe laws, according to the custom of Italy, it raged so, by the touching of the sick, that the streets were crowded with funerals, and it seemed as if the city would have been laid waste in a very few days, if one Demetrius Spartanus, a Greek, had not undertaken to stop the pestilence, who, being favoured by the populace, no body durst oppose his superstition.

and erected a stately monument to him (o). Let it not be forgotten, that this Pope was an author [U]. It is somewhat strange, that a man who owed his advancement to his learning, so little countenanced men of letters [X]. The collection of the letters of princes, contain (p) some particulars of this Pope's humour. His life has been amply written by Gerard Moringus, a divine of Louvain.

He did not dissemble the great abuses he observed in the church; he publicly acknowledged them, and that in a very strong manner, in the instruction he gave the nuncio who was to speak in his name at the Diet of Nuremberg [Y]. He therein deplored the sad life of the clergy, and the corruption of morals which had appeared in superstition. He took a wild bull, and having cut the half of one of his horns in two, by repeating some magical verses in his right ear, he became presently so tame, that leading him about at pleasure, by a slender thread, which he tied about his entire horn, he sacrificed him at the Amphitheatre to appease the deity. Neither did he entirely beguile the hopes of the credulous multitude, for from the time of this vain sacrifice, the plague began to assuage.

[U] Let us not forget that this Pope was an author. His Quæstiones and Expositiones upon the fourth book of the Master of the Sentences, were printed at Paris in folio, in the year 1512, and in 1516 (73), and his Quæstiones quodlibeticæ duodecim, at Louvain, in octavo, in 1515, and at Paris in folio, the year following. During his stay in Spain, he composed Computum hominis agonizantis, & Sermonem de saculo perituro. After his pontificate, he published Regulas Cancellariæ Apostolicæ, and writ many letters to the princes of Germany, &c. which were printed with the Councils, or elsewhere.

I have something to observe concerning his work upon the Master of the Sentences. The Sieur Konig (74), deceived by their ambiguity, who have said in iv sententiarum quæstiones & expositiones (75), affirms, that our Hadrian published questions on the four books of the sentences. Here is a new proof of what is said in the first remark of this article, that an author cannot be ever so little unexact but he throws another into falsehood. Would it not have been better to have said in quartum sententiarum, or in iv librum sententiarum, than to use the number IV, which signifies as well Quatuor as Quartus. Father Oldoini (76) has committed the same error as the Sieur Konig. Mr Varillas deserves to be heard concerning this book of Hadrian: his commentary, says he (77), upon the Master of the Sentences, was admired, and certainly if this book was not the subtlest of three hundred of the same nature, which were then to be found in the libraries; it was at least the clearest and most methodical. The author had maintained (78) in the most decisive manner imaginable, that it was certain the Pope might err even in matters belonging to faith, and it is pretended he did not change his opinion when he was Pope, as did Pius II, for he altered nothing in this part of his book, in the edition of it which was printed at Rome, during his pontificate.

[X] It is strange . . . that he so little countenanced men of letters. We have seen, in the remark [D], his notions of the poets. This might more easily be pardoned him than the sinking the funds which had been employed for the maintenance of learned men, who came from Greece into Italy, to whom the west is indebted for the resurrection of polite learning. Cardinal Bessarion maintained at Rome, part of these great genius's, and established an academy for them in the Vatican. But the greatest number subsisted upon the bounties of Pope Nicolas V. . . . (79) Of all his successors, there was none but Hadrian VI who suppressed these gratifications, by an economy which doth no honour to his memory (80). Let us see the observation of another author (81). 'All the learned of his time promised themselves advancement on his coming to the pontificate, because he owed all his fortune and exaltation to learning. And therefore they could not but be astonished to see him so ill disposed towards all who delighted in polite literature, calling them Terentianus, and treating them in such a manner, that it was thought he would have brought in barbarism again, had he not died in the second year of his supremacy dignity. Paul Jovius ingeniously says * that he thus ill treated the wits of his age, with the same sense and judgment, as he preferred the Dutch stock-fish, before all other dishes, and the best fish in Italy.' Paul Jovius does not say this. See his text in the remark [R]. The reader will be glad to know where la Mothe le Vayer has taken what he says; for that reason I shall give a fine passage here, of Plerius Valerianus. 'Fuit & sub Hadriano VI par bonarum omnium litterarum infortunium. Nam cum is Leoni Decimo suffectus esset, ad quem upote litterarum Principem magnus litteratorum numerus confluerat, dum non minora de Hadriano sibi quisque pollicetur, ecce adest mularum & eloquentie, totiusque nitoris hostis acerrimus, qui litteratis omnibus inimicitias minaretur, quoniam ut ipse dicebat, Terentiani essent, quos cum odisse, atque etiam persequi cepisset, voluntarium alii exilium, alias atque alias alii latebras querentes, tandem latuere, quoad Dei beneficio altero Imperii anno decisset, qui si aliquanto diutius vixisset, Gotica illa tempora adversus bonas literas videbatur suscitaturus' (82). — Learning laboured under the same misfortune, under Hadrian VI. For he having succeeded to Leo X: to whom, as to the great professor of learning, a great many learned men had flocked, and they expected no less favour from Hadrian; but he, on the contrary, proved a violent enemy to poetry, eloquence, and all polite learning; and threatened all scholars with his displeasure, because of their being Terentiani, as he called them. They therefore being thus bated, and some of them persecuted by him, retired, some into a voluntary banishment, others into such retirements as they could find; where they continued till, by the goodness of GOD, he died in the second year of his Pontificate, who, if he had lived a little longer, would probably have plunged us again into Gothic barbarity and ignorance.

[Y] He acknowledged the abuses . . . in a very strong manner, in the instruction he gave to the Nuncio, who was to speak . . . at the Diet of Nuremberg. This Nuncio's name was Francis Cheregat. This was a part of his instruction. 'Dices nos ingenuè fateri, quod Deus hanc persecutionem à Lutheranis illatam, ecclesiæ suæ inferri permittit, propter peccata hominum, sacerdotum maxime, & ecclesiæ prælatorum. Clamant scripturæ peccata populi derivari à peccatis sacerdotum, proptereaque, ut ait Chrysostomus, Salvator noster curaturus infirmam civitatem Jerusalem, ingressus est prius templum ut peccata sacerdotum primo castigaret, instauraret boni medici, qui morbum à radice curat. Scimus in hac sancta sede aliquot jam annis multa abominanda fuisse, abusus in spiritualibus, excessus in mandatis, & omnia denique in perverum mutata, nec mirum, si ægritudo à capite in membra, à summis Pontificibus in alios inferiores prælatos descendit. Omnes nos prælati, videlicet ecclesiastici declinavimus, unusquisque in vias suas, nec fuit jam diu qui faceret bonum, non fuit usque ad unum. — You shall acquaint them that we ingenuously own, that GOD has suffered his church to be persecuted by the Lutherans, because of the sins of men, especially of the priests and prelates of the church. The scriptures testify, that the sins of the people proceed from the sins of the priests. For this reason St Chrysostom observes, that when our Saviour was about to cure the city of Jerusalem of it's diseases; he first of all went into the temple, that he might first chastise the sins of the priests, like a good physician, who strikes at the root of the distemper. We are sensible that for some years past, there have been many abominations in this holy see, abuses in spirituals, excesses in mandates, and, in fine, every thing changed to the worse; and it is not to be admired, if the disease has descended from the head to the members, from the Pontiffs to the inferior prelates. All we prelates, I mean ecclesiastic, have gone astray, every one into his own paths, in the persons of some Popes. He had long wished to introduce among the clergy, a reformation of manners. He had laboured to effect this, whilst he was dean of St Peter's at Louvain, but the fruitlessness of his pains had obliged him to desist from his enterprize [Z]. The justest censure which can be made of him, is his contradicting the good rules he had given against the plurality of benefices [AA]. Note, that when he canonized patris, and there has not been one for a long time who has done good, no not one. A Protestant writer imagines, that the cardinals so strongly resented this Pope's dishonouring the court of Rome in this manner, in the diet of the empire, and burning a man for the crime of bestiality, that they shortened this Pope's life. Nec tamen tam stulticibus ad perfectum Popatum rudimentis profecit, quo minus illi purpurata Parce offensa, quod comitiis Noriberghensibus dedecorasset rem Romanam, & quod quendam jumento suo pro suo arbitratu usum, homo Batavus & ad Papalem venerem frigidus, cremasset: filium illud diu regnandi, & videnti, abrumperent (83).

[Z] He had laboured to bring about a reformation of manners, whilst he was dean, but the fruitlessness of his pains made him desist from his enterprize. As soon as he was raised to the deanry of St Peter's at Louvain, which is a very considerable preferment, with fine privileges annexed, he set himself more than ever to preach by his own example; knowing that his endeavours to bring his colleagues into the right way, would be more effectual, if he himself practised the duties of temperance. He persisted to live frugally; there was more neatness than magnificence at his table; and when he entertained, he pressed no body to drink, and never began those healths which oblige the company to drink round. Neither did he suffer any person to begin any such healths to him; he set himself above all this pretended German civility. His feasts lasted but an hour, and he caused some piece of scripture to be read part of the time: he would have had it read during all the meal, but for fear of disgusting some of his guests. Neque temere ultra horam accumbere, etiam si convivas magnos haberet, atque interim fere adhibito lectore, qui aliquid e literis sacris recitaret, ut non minus mente, quam ventre convivia delectarentur, sed id tantum ad tempus ne lectio longior cuiquam fortassis molestia esset (84).

He also continued a very chaste life: There was nothing of wantonness in his gestures or discourses: nor would he suffer any obscene words in his presence; though otherwise he delighted in a virtuous facetiousness. Nor did he only abstain from all actual impurities, but carefully avoided the appearances and suspicions of it. He particularly made it his duty to possess his colleagues with the same practical morality. He vehemently exhorted them to it, in the discourses he made at the chapter meetings, and sharply censured such as he knew addicted to drinking and gaming, and especially those who kept concubines (85), omitting nothing that could oblige them to refrain from that evil commerce. But he met with so many obstacles, because some of the more aged and potent opposed his design, that he renounced it. His zeal had like to have cost him his life; he had been poisoned, if his physician had not found a good antidote against arsenic. It was thought this was done by a canon's concubine, were he was invited to dinner. Sed in re longe honestissima tantum difficultatis habuit, obnitentibus quibusdam e senioribus ac potentioribus, & praesertim non suppetente auxilio, sine quo bujusmodi non temere confici queunt, ut negotium magna ex parte infectum relinquere debuerit. Quintimo parum absuit, quin per eam ipsam causam, veneno perierit. Id concubinae unius e Canonici, a quo ad prandium vocatus erat, bolusculo ejus, quod primum omnium mensae inferri solenne est, indidisse putabatur (86). When he saw there was no hope of reformation, and that his endeavours procured him many enemies, he totally desisted and declared, that the deans of chapters were much less responsible for these disorders, than the bishops, for the deans were obliged to receive those whose corruption was grown inveterate. But nothing obliged the bishops, or their vicars, to confer orders and benefices, as they did, upon infamous debauchees. Dum spem nullam fructus conspiceret, nihilque aliud sibi quam odium & malevolentiam queri intelligeret, in totum conatu suspensedit, satis habens, significasse sibi displicere, postquam aliud praeterea non posset, praedicans tamen culpam eam non tam Decanis Collegiorum, qui jam obstinatos & in sordibus illis in- veteratos exciperent, quam Episcopis, eorumque vicariis praestandam, qui quoscunque sine delectu, quantumvis probrosos & infames, ad ordines & beneficia admitterent, nulla aut exigua, in retroactam vitam inquisitione facta (87). All this is taken from a book written by a priest. Let it not then be objected, that these are flanders of Protestants.

It is certain, that the dean shewed the true cause of the evil: the negligence of the bishops, or their vicars, was the source of the disorder. They did not examine whether they, who were admitted to benefices, had lived well, and given good proofs of a constitution which could abstain from bodily pleasures. This want of enquiry was a gate through which abundance entered into the church, who were already bent towards sensuality: a bent which is difficultly rectified, which gathers strength continually, till it grows into habit, an almost incurable disease. You see then why our Hadrian's exhortations could have no effect upon canons long practised in drunkenness, and the pleasures of concubinage. They were so besotted with this course of life, that they could not imagine how it was possible to live without it. It is infinitely harder to persuade a bachelor of forty five or fifty years to marriage, than a widower of sixty, who has just lost his wife: so great is the power of custom. The concubine, on her part, finds it as hard to part with her canon, after having been so many years at bed and board with him. Where shall I go, says she, what shall I do? where shall I find so good a bed, so good a table, so good a fire? and therefore you will find her, and her companions, very ready to oppose the designs of a reformer. The dean of Louvain needed a more undaunted courage; for the poison of these concubines was as formidable as the dagger of an assassin. Not finding he had any call to martyrdom, he chose rather to leave things as they were, than to expose himself to hatred, and even death, by going to reform them. In magnis voluisse sat est, was doubtless his maxim.

[AA] He may be justly reproached with having contradicted the good rules he had given . . . against the plurality of benefices. When he was only professor of Louvain, he maintained, that this plurality was vicious; and that a man, who had once gotten a living that was sufficient to maintain him handsomely, ought to be content with it, and stop there. But when he was at the arch-duke of Austria's court, he accepted many preferments, and forgot his former doctrine. This inconsistency gave scandal to some people. Honores & sacerdotia quadam magnifica accipere, non sine admiratione, & fortassis offensione aliquorum, qui eum diversum facere incusabant, atque aliquando docuisset. Docuisse quippe, non esse fas cuiquam multa habere beneficia, sed uno aliquo ad honestam mundanisque sustentationem vitae sufficiente, quietum ac contentum esse debere (88). The author I borrow these words from, declares he will not examine whether this conduct was censured justly or unjustly (89); but yet he undertakes to justify it, and uses the most plausible arguments which can be offered upon such a subject. He says, amongst other things, that it should not be thought strange, that Hadrian thought that lawful in himself, which would have been unlawful in others, who had not the same extraordinary qualities, or posts at court, that he had. The great talents that God has given a priest, are much more serviceable to the church, when they are accompanied with a large revenue; and it cannot be denied, but that an ecclesiastic, who has employments at court, is necessarily obliged to greater expences. The author adds to this, many other arguments of the same nature, and which have all the fault of being fit to be employed in an apology for the casuists, like that of Father Pirot. I mean, they may serve to justify those, who being in great posts, heap all the vacant places upon their own heads. May not it be said on their behalf, that they will make a better use of them than others, and that they are necessary for them, that their great qualities may have liberty to act in their whole extent, for the profit and advantage of the state. The author adds, that it is false, that Hadrian, canonized Antoninus and Benno, he did not suffer the expences which were usual in such sort of ceremonies, forbidding them as a thing repugnant to the sanctity of canonization (q). A learned Jesuit was censured for having cited this fact [BB]. This Pope's successors, were of another opinion; they have tolerated worldly pomp in canonizations, to that excess as to offend the vulgar by it [CC].

Hadrian opposed the plurality of benefices, either in his books or lectures. He has rather countenanced it, continues he, as appears by his commentary upon Lombard. Neque vero ipse Hadrianus usquam diversum aut docuit, aut scripsit, ut ei falso intendunt, sed potius contra. Legat eum qui vellet, in quantum Petri Lombardi scribentem, ubi de restitutione agens, questionem illam ex professo differit (90). All that this author mentions afterwards from this commentary, is not much to his purpose. If what he pretends might be inferred from it, it would only be by an oblique and very indirect consequence; and he says nothing of the quodlibetic oration, that it is affirmed Hadrian printed against the plurality of benefices. We will cite a Protestant writer, who tells us the answer this Pope made to those that asked him why he did not remove a corruption, which he had so well condemned.

Imò cum Lovanii olim edidisset Quodlibeticam Orationem contra pluralitatem beneficiorum, monentibus cur ipse qui jam potestatem tollendi haberet, quod ante reprehendere tantum potuisset, omnia beneficia maxime ex Inferiore Germania supplicantibus interciperet, respondit: cum parvuli essemus loquebamur, sapiebamus, faciebamus ut parvuli; nunc autem postquam viri facti sumus, reliquimus ea quæ sunt parvuli. Sic homo Traiecti non solum ex vilissimis parentibus ortus, verum etiam usque ad ipsum magisterium, mendicitate, & eleemosynariis sumptibus educatus, ad insuetæ fortunæ pruritus exiliit, sic in illa sede promovit, hanc reformationem promissit (91). — He having long before published at Louvain a quodlibetical oration against plurality of benefices, some took the liberty to ask him, why he, who now had the power of removing that abuse, which before he could only condemn, did now himself lay hold on all the vacant benefices, especially in the Low-Countries, he answered, when I was a child, I spake as a child, I thought as a child, and acted as a child, but when I became a man, I put away childish things. In this manner, that man born at Utrecht, of mean parents, and who, till he arrived at the degree of master of arts, was maintained by the charity of others, was swelled with his uncommon fortune, and thus when he arrived at the Papal chair did he promise this promise of reformation. I imagine, the Walloon minister I am going to cite, took the following reflexion from this Latin (92): 'Pope Hadrian VI. preceded him. There were some who wondered to see him act against a certain oration he had made at Louvain, being there Magister Noster, disapproving the multiplicity of benefices, and their crowding them under one hat: when, being Pope, he did the same thing, especially with respect to the benefices in the Netherlands. He answered them in the words of St Paul, When I was a child, I spake as a child, &c. 1 Cor. 13.' Mention is made of this, in the News from the Republic of Letters, 1684 (93).

[BB] He prohibited the expences . . . of canonization. A learned Jesuit was censured for having cited this fact. He found himself publicly accused of maintaining, that the charges of canonization are contrary to the purity and holiness of this act. His accuser's name was Sebastian of St Paul; he had been divinity professor at Louvain, and twice provincial of the Carmelites in the Netherlands. Observe how this Jesuit defended himself. He said (94), that he only reported what he had read in Blasius Ortizius, canon of Toledo, and a domestic of Hadrian VI. II. That having cited this in Italian, and named his author, he had reason to complain of being calumniated by his critic, who has suppressed these circumstances; for an accusation is not only unjust, when it affirms a falsehood, but also when it conceals the truth. An ignoras certam esse apud Theologos sententiam, quod accusatio esse possit graviter injusta, non tantum ex falsi impostione, sed etiam ex reticentia veri (95). III. That from his alleging a thing as glorious to Hadrian VI, it does not thence follow, that he taxes the other Popes with error, who approve or appoint the great expences of canonization. IV. That he praised Hadrian as a pious man moved with an honest zeal, and acting according to the instincts of conscience, of which we may, and on many occasions ought, to follow the innocent error (96). V. That he did not give his approbation to Hadrian's motive, which was, that these expences were repugnant to the purity and holiness of canonization. VI. That he doubts not but they are founded upon many weighty reasons. VII. That Hadrian VI might err in that point as a private doctor, without prejudice to the infallibility of Popes pronouncing ex cathedra. VIII. That Baronius relates some much more notable errors of some Popes without being obnoxious, to be accused of injuring the holy apostolic see.

Who doth not here see the fatal marks of pre engagement? A Roman Catholic is a true slave in his judgment: there are a thousand instances in which he cannot commend good actions. Can any thing be more self-evident than that Hadrian VI merits approbation both for what he did, and for the reason why he did it? And yet here is a Jesuit, who not being able to praise him without indirectly censuring the other Popes, is forced to tread upon thorns in justifying himself; nor can he get off but by supposing our Hadrian in an error, but that his errors, being accompanied with a good intention, excuse him. This is all the glory a Pope can promise himself, who sets up to reform corruptions. He shall be excused for the errors of his conscience, and he said to have erred, not as a Pope, but as a private doctor. Great goodness indeed.

[CC] . . . His successors have allowed them to that excess as to offend the vulgar by it. Every body was scandalized in Paris, in 1622, to see the pomp wherewith the barefooted Carmelites celebrated the canonization of St Theresa. There came out the same year a little book, wherein it is feigned the good women murmured very much. One of them complains that she was burnt there. Pray, cousin, says a young married woman, was you at this fire? For my part, I never saw such disorder, nor so much mischief: one of my brothers too had his whole face destroyed, and there is no likelihood of his recovery. But to what purpose are all these superfluities, says a toothless old woman? In my younger days I never heard of canonizing saints in this fashion, it is rather canonizing than canonizing. Softly, softly, aunt, says a merchant's wife of St Denis's street, a great deal more has been done at Rome. These are public rejoicings; there is no danger sometimes in superfluities, when we are induced to them by a pure and sincere affection; and besides, what the Carmelites have done, was by the command of the queen, who has supplied this expence, because St Theresa was a native of Spain. No matter for that, says a citizen's wife, living near Saint Leu, GOD has been a thousand times more offended than honoured by it; and I promise you, I do not at all approve of these things: how many maids do you think have been run away with? All the corn round about is beaten down and burnt: they have taken the month of August for it, rather than July. For my part, says an advocate's wife of the great council, I would have been of opinion, that all these superfluities should go to the adorning their church, at least it would have remained there for them, and they would have been more esteemed for it, and not to evaporate so much wealth into smoke, this would have kindled the fire of devotion in the hearts of those who came to visit them; whereas, on the contrary, all the air and fields round about have been set on fire with these fusties: I had a ruff of five stories utterly spoiled: besides, if the fire had been lighted at eight of the clock, so many cloaks had not been lost: all the scholars were there in arms (97). After all, it must be said here, as on many other occasions, there is nothing but is good for something or other; the greatest abuses have a fair side. If canonizations could be made without vast expences, they would be more common: it is well that the impossibility of supplying the expence is a barrier to the greediness of the monastic orders. Subjects of canonization would not be wanting; every community would have as many of them as the others; and if the charge was but little, the other engines would easily be prepared.

HADRIAN

HADRIAN (CORNELIUS DE), in Dutch Hadrianfen (a), a famous Dutch preacher in the XVIth Century, was of Dort: he became a Franciscan, and was guardian of the convent, and lecturer of divinity (b). He understood Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, well, and publicly taught these three languages (c). He preached thirty years at Bruges, and never was concerned at the slanders which were published against him. He died at Bruges, at sixty years of age, the fourteenth of July, 1581. He composed a treatise concerning the seven sacraments. John Lernutius had seen in manuscript many very learned sermons of this friar (d). The works which came out under his name, after his death, were mixed with buffoonry, and immodesty jests. Sanders pretends, that the heretics foisted them in, to defame the memory of this good and innocent monk (e). He ought to have proved this, or not to have said it. The Protestants speak of this Franciscan, as of a violent declaimer (f); and there are books which say that, he had introduced among women, a new sort of devotion, which was, that he appointed them certain days, in which they were to strip themselves stark naked before him [A], that he might give them a gentle discipline for the expiation of their faults (g). There is nothing that these people are not able to persuade women to, under the specious pretence of devotion [B], when they have the talent of prating, and are celebrated for their preaching. I have read somewhere, that George Cassander, who taught the Belles Lettres at Bruges, whilst Cornelius de Hadrian taught divinity there, found himself obliged, in the year 1554, to banish himself [C], in order to avoid the calumnies of this colleague.

[A] His devotees were to strip themselves stark naked before him. If Gyges's maxim were true, that a woman divests herself of her modesty with her cloaths (1), our Hadrian's affairs had been in a good case, supposing him not to have been visionary enough to fancy, that his giving some lashes to the naked bodies of the penitents, would have a singular virtue to expiate their sins. The world is so ready to construe things perversely, that there are few who will attribute the conduct of this friar, to any other principle than what somebody calls an inquisitiveness into the pleasures of others.

Εοικε η τε μοιχεια, πολυπερσχυροσυνη της αλλοτριας ηδονης ειναι, και ηττισι και ερσυνα των φυλαττομενων και λανθανοντων της πολλας. Videtur adulterium curiosa in alterius voluptatem esse inquisitio eorumque indagatio, quæ absconduntur & plerisque latent (2). — A curious prying into other peoples pleasures, and breaking in upon their secrecy, seems to be a sort of adultery. If it were true, as some learned men have affirmed (3), that in the primitive church, those who were baptized, of what age or sex soever, were as naked as they came into the world, one might better apprehend how this man, by his fine tongue, and great airs of piety, might bring his devotees to his ends. The sacrament of penance, said he perhaps to them, ought to be administered as baptism formerly was; the punishment of the lash, to which I condemn you, makes part of this sacrament; therefore, &c. Meteren (4) relates so fully, and with so many circumstances, what concerns the devotees of this friar, that one may believe it to be true.

Henry Stephens tells a story that has some relation to this. 'They went so far, says he (5), as to require (as I have read it) that they should be allowed in confession to handle the parts which have been the instruments of the sin that is confessed. And one of them who made that request, being told by a bishop that it would be a shameful thing, if men and women were obliged to shew them their privy-parts; he answered, that if a confessor may honestly consider with the eyes of the mind, (which are much more precious than those of the body) not only the members that have committed filthy actions, but also the very filthiness committed by them, which are discovered to him in confession; much less ought it to be thought an immodest thing to look upon those very members with the eyes of the body.' He further alleged, 'that a confessor, being a spiritual physician, ought to feel his patient, as the physician of the body feels and handles his patient. And mixing some blasphemies and prophanations with his jesting discourse, he brought in these words of our Lord, Go, and shew thyself to the priest, as if it had been the custom to strip, and shew themselves naked to the priest.'

sere non pertimescam, Historiam hominis cucullati & cordigeri conventus Brugeois anno circiter MDLXVI cui nomen erat Cornelio Adriano (7) origine Dordracensis, adversus hæreticos Gueziis stomachosissimi concionatoris; qui puellas cum sceminis quoddam Sacramento fidelitatis & obedientiæ sibi adstrictas & specie pietatis devotas non quidem asperatis & modestis funibus verberabat, sed nudata earum femora, & nates inboneis virgibus rorantes virgis betulæ aut vimineis iisibus molli-ter infligebat, ut refert Emanuel Meteren Historiæ Belgicæ fol. clij. & cliij. edit. Amstelædamensis ann. 1570 (8). These words are to be found in his curious Historia Flagellantium. The French translator has not understood them; for he translates them as follows: 'Amongst all these woeful examples of rigid piety, I shall venture to report, on the testimony of 'Meteren', a story of a Franciscan of a convent at Bruges, called Cornelius Adriano, originally of Dort, who lived about the year 1566, and was a violent preacher against the Heretics, called Gueux: this monk had some girls and married women, who, under the appearance of religion, and under the oath of fidelity and obedience, were so devoted to him, that he was not satisfied with beating them with cords, with large knots; but besides, he gently whipt their thighs and naked hips, with rods of osier, or birch.' The Latin passage is so far from saying that this monk made use of cords with large knots, that the contrary is evident from it.

[B] There is nothing but these people are able to persuade women to, under pretence of devotion. I have spoken elsewhere of the great docility of the sex. See the remarks of the articles FRATRICELLI and GUILLEMETE.

[C] George Cassander . . . found himself obliged . . . to banish himself. The passage which I am going to quote, as a proof of this, contains a parenthesis, which concerns the whipping I spoke of above. John Sturmius (b). Father Alegambe deserves a little censure (c). We must not confound John Hay with a Jesuit of that name, who was banished by a decree of the parliament of Paris [B]. They both pretended to be of the family of Hay (d), mentioned in the foregoing article.

[B] A Jesuit of his name, was banished by an arrêt of the parliament of Paris. His name was ALEXANDER HAY. He was convicted of several seditious discourses against the king, after the reduction of Paris, so far as to say, that if he passed by their college, he would gladly throw himself headlong out of the window to break his neck by that means. This we read in Mezerai's great history (3). The author of the Anti-Coton will inform us of the date of the decree of the parliament. There were informations given Alexander Hayus, a Scotch Jesuit, who had taught publicly, that we ought to dissemble and obey the king for a time seemingly, frequently saying these words, Jesu ita est omnis homo. — A Jesuit is all to all men. This Jesuit was moreover charged with often saying, that he would be glad, if the king passed by their college, to throw himself from the window, and break his neck. For which reason, by a decree of parliament, of the tenth of January, 1595, the said Hayus was condemned to perpetual banishment, and enjoined to continue it, upon pain of being hanged and strangled, without any form of process (4). The author of the Remerciment des Bourriers, having said the same thing, adds (5) that this Jesuit having afterwards repeated and confirmed these words in the city of Prague, and as the grandes of the kingdom having solicited to have him brought back into France on that account, it was answered, that he had eaten some pecked barley, not well boiled, and was found dead as suddenly as the provost-marshal of Pluviers, . . . who was strangled at the Chatelet, with a string of his drawers, which was not strong enough to bridle a fly. Alexander Hayus, if we believe Palquier (6), in the time of the troubles, was teacher of the first class of the Jesuits college at Paris.

HAILLAN (BERNARD DE GIRARD lord of) historiographer of France, descended from an ancient and noble family [A], was born at Bourdeaux about the year 1535. He set up early for an author, and after having appeared in the Republic of Letters, in the quality of a poet and translator [B], he applied himself to the writing of history, and succeeded so well, that by his first performances of this nature, he obtained of Charles the IX, the title historiographer of France, in 1571 [C]. In 1576;

[A] He was descended from an ancient and noble family. When he speaks of the materials he collected to compose the History of France, he does not forget the assistances of his relations. Francis de Girard, my brother, lord of Haillan, says he (1), sent me from Bourdeaux, many papers, concerning the affairs of Guienne, collected by the late Lewis de Girard, our father; and by Giles, Mark, and Richard de Girard our grand-father, and great-great-grand-father; the two last whereof lived in Bourdelois, in honourable posts, at the time that the city of Bourdeaux, and the country of Guienne were reduced to the obedience of the French in 1451. He tells us, in another place (2), that his father was a curious man in the antiquities of his country, who for above forty five years was lieutenant in the admiralty of Guienne; and afterwards, adds he, Francis de Girard, lord of Haillan, my brother, was for above ten years in the same admiralty, under the late kings of Navarre, Henry and Antony.

[B] After having appeared in the quality of a poet and translator. In 1559, he published a poem at Paris, intitled, The Union of the Princes, by the marriages of Philip king of Spain, and the lady Elizabeth of France, and of Philibert Emanuel, duke of Savoy, and the lady Margaret of France (3). He published in the same city, the same year, another poem, called The Tomb of the most Christian king Henry II, and a Latin work, intitled, Regum Gallorum Icones à Faramundo usque ad Franciscum 2. Item Ducum Lotbaringerum à Carolo primo usque ad Carolum tertium versibus Latinis expressæ (4). I may take for a translation, the tract concerning the duties of men, which he printed at Blois in 1560, in 8vo; for he took it from Tully's Offices. He published the same year at Paris (5); The Roman history of Eutropius, containing, in ten books, all the transactions in peace and war, from the beginning of Rome, to the year MCXIX, of the same, translated from the Latin. Eight years after he printed (6) The Lives of the greatest, most virtuous, and most excellent Commanders, and other illustrious persons, both Greeks and Barbarians, written by Æmilius Probus, and translated from the Latin (7).

[C] He obtained of Charles IX the title of historiographer of France, in 1571. This he tells us himself, in an epistle dedicatory, dated at Paris in July, 1576, where he thus speaks to Henry III (8). It is now five years since the late king, your brother, your self, Sir, and the queen your mother, having seen my book concerning the State and Success of the Affairs of France, which was printed, and the two first books of the History of France, only in manuscript, it pleased the late king, at your's, and the queen your mother's request, to command me (and you, Sir, did the same) to write in French the History of the kings of France, your predecessors, hitherto ill written by our countrymen, and negligently or erroneously handled by strangers. And to furnish me with means and courage to undertake this work, it pleased the king, your brother, at the instance and request of Mr de Villequier, who always loved me, and my writings, and who is at present almost the only worthy witness of the long services, which, in more ways than one, I have done you since your childhood, to give me the place of historiographer of France, and to promise to raise and prefer me, which also, Sir, you assured me of on your part, and that my long and faithful services, and my ordinary labours, should receive their fruit. As this passage may serve for the proof of a thing which I have advanced in the text of this article (9), I was willing to give it intire. But that we may not be obliged to mention this again, here is a stronger proof still. This historiain having said that Henry III, loved always to bear and speak the truth, gave hopes to men of learning, that he would be their support, and sometimes would read and bear histories (10), adds, which I can truly say, as having known it from your infancy, at the time when I had the honour to be near your person, to serve you, and that not in the lowest rank, sometimes to discourse with you about many fine histories, both of the kings your ancestors, and of other kingdoms and states. The passage which I take from the epistle dedicatory of his State and Success of the Affairs of France, is still more decisive. I have learned, Sir, says he, addressing himself to Henry III, by the education I have had, and the communication of the affairs which I have seen, being near you, for the space of twelve years before your accession to the throne; and by many affairs which I have managed and seen for the service of the kings your predecessors, and your's, both within and without the kingdom, how one ought to speak and write of kings and their affairs (11). See also what will be related in the remark [L] (12).

Note, that he published at Paris, in 1571, A brief History of the earls and dukes of Anjou, from Godfrey Grifigennelle, to Henry, son and brother to the kings of France, and duke of Anjou, Bourbonnois, and Auvergne (13). He also published there the same year, A Pro-

He had him in his own service before his coming to the crown (b). The reasons which induced du Haillan to conclude his work with Charles the seventh's death, are very good, and shew that he understood the duties of an historian [E]. However, he afterwards promised to Henry IV, to continue mise and Design of the History of France (14). Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who tells me this, does not speak of a work which du Haillan had published in 1570, intitled, Of the Fortune and Power of France, with a summary discourse on the Design of a History of France (15). He published the same year a book (16) that has been reprinted very often (17), which he dedicated to the duke of Anjou. He says in his advertisement to the reader (18): 'This book, concerning the State and Success of the Affairs of France, which I present to you, clad in a new dress, much longer and finer than it wore formerly, was born ten years ago, and was presented to you at it's birth, being then very small. Two years after I took it out of it's infancy, and cloathing it in a longer habit, I gave it, by your command, to the late king Charles your brother.' Thus he speaks in the epistle dedicatory, of an edition in which this work appeared in a dress entirely new, and much larger, finer, and richer than it was before (19). The author revised and enlarged it in 1594, and dedicated it to Henry IV. Zeiller says, this book is often cited and commended; and that he has, in his 190th letter, given d'Aubigné's judgment about it (20). 'I have not seen that letter, but I am certain it contains a blunder: for d'Aubigné in the preface which Zeiller cites (21), passes no judgment on du Haillan's writings, contenting himself only to name him. His criticism only concerns la Popelinière, and Thuanus. This therefore is a great fault of Martin Zeiller; his omission is not a small one, for that author did not know that du Haillan writ the History of France. König likewise is ignorant of it.'

[D] Henry III shewed how well satisfied he was with it, by the advantageous and honourable gratifications he made the author.] La Popelinière, omitting the title of historiographer of France, conferred on du Haillan by Charles IX, touches only the recompences of Henry III. This omission may be excused, considering the difference which is betwixt a bare title, and a place settled, with a salary annexed to it. Now such was the employ that Henry III conferred on him. However, let us see what la Popelinière says (22). 'Henry III, the first of princes, ancient or modern, not only gratified the Sieur du Haillan of Bourdeaux, one of the secretaries of his finances, with several bounties, as an acknowledgment of the pains he had taken in the first body of his French history. But also honoured him afterwards with the first place of historiographer of France, which he erected into a lasting title of office, with a fixed salary of 1200 crowns per annum, and made him one of his privy-counsellors, at the instance of chancellor Chiverny, that he might there be the better instructed in the knowledge and account of the most important affairs of the kingdom. So that Henry III was the first who raised the bare and simple title of historian, to the honourable degree and title of historiographer of France, in the person of Bernard de Girard, Sieur du Haillan, after his dedicating and presenting to him his History of France, collected from preceding authors, as the first body of history in a French dress.' We read in the French Mercury (23), 'that Henry III as an acknowledgment of the pains du Haillan had taken in the first book of his French history, gratified him with a place of secretary of his finances.' I do not know what this first book of the History of France, is, which was recompensed in this manner: for du Haillan published the History of France all at once; and he does not say in his epistle dedicatory, that he had already obtained any recompence. He only says (24), that Charles IX had given him the place of historiographer, with fair promises, and that Henry III, then duke of Anjou, had also promised him some benefactions. I fancy that the compiler of the Mercury was afraid of being censured for transcribing the passage of la Popelinière word for word, and that to prevent it, he quoted him with some alterations, but he did not succeed well in it. He changed the first body of his French history, into the first book of his French history. These two phrases are widely different. The former signifies, that du Haillan was the first who published a body of French history: the other signifies, that the first book of the French history, written by du Haillan, was printed by it self, before all the rest. The author of the Mercury supposes, moreover, that this first book procured him the secretaryship of the finances, from Henry III; but la Popelinière, the Mercury's author, says no such thing; he supposes that du Haillan was secretary of the finances before the publishing of the History of France. It must however be acknowledged, that his narrative is somewhat confused: he has inserted an afterwards, which perplexes the sense; it being a term which but ill agrees with the words following. The Mercury adds, I. that after the recompence for the first book, the historian obtained a better, when he dedicated his History of France to Henry III, for he was honoured with the place of counsellor and historiographer of France. II. That he afterwards wrote the State and Success of the Affairs of France: this is false, this book was printed before the death of Charles IX (25). III. That he was made genealogist to the knights of the order of the HOLY GHOST, at the creation of that order. He might have said, that he had, in commendam, an abbey which the famous Abelard had possessed (26). Note, that in the first edition of his history, he only styles himself historiographer of France, but in the latter he is styled counsellor to his majesty, secretary of his finances and chamber, and historiographer of France. Note also, that in 1584, he was not yet rewarded. We shall see his complaint below (27).

[E] The reasons which induced him to conclude his work with Charles VII, . . . shew, that he understood the duties of an historian.] I mean chiefly, the reflection he has made, that a man exposeth himself to an unlucky alternative, who writes the history of monarchs lately dead. He must either dissemble the truth, or provoke persons who are most to be feared. The first of these inconveniences shocks an historian's honour and conscience, the other offends against his prudence. It is best therefore to say nothing. This was one of du Haillan's reasons with respect to the reigns that followed Lewis XII (28). He adds (29) a general reason of great weight; viz. that there were already particular histories of all the reigns after Charles VII, and that in the common opinion it was almost impossible to equal the writers of some of these works. This consideration ought to affect an honest man, and a famous historian. He ought to save the reader the discontent of purchasing the same thing twice. The respect he owes the public requires this, and justice will not allow him to transcribe the histories which others have wrote: this is robbing another of his property. His own reputation and prudence, oblige him to seek a more difficult and certain way to glory. To copy or give a new form to the writings of others, is too cheap a labour to be honourable, and exposes you to the infamy of plagiarism. You will be reckoned a vain man, if you pretend to equal their glory who are thought incomparable, and you run the risk of being still accounted inferior, though you should equal or exceed them. Ought a wife man to encounter the prepossessions of the public? It is pity but such reasons should make as great impressions on every body, as they did on du Haillan (30), libraries would not be so thronged with books, containing the same things. Let us here give the description he has made of the inconveniences which the authors of the history of their own times fall into. 'For as much as all those histories which treat of king Francis I were written in his, or his son Henry's time, the authors have perhaps more enlarged on the praises of this king, than was suitable to his merit, (though he was a great and excellent prince) or to the duty of an historian, or to truth. This is the constant fault of those who write the history of their own times, and of the princes under whom they live. For where is the continue this history to his time [F]. But he has not made this promise good. The reason which obliged him to continue it, is not for the honour of Philip de Comines (c). He had the courage to confute many traditions, which an indiscreet zeal for the

the man who would dare to touch upon the vices of his prince, or blame his actions or those of his ministers, and relate the plots, deceits, and treasons which are acted in his reign, or say, that his prince committed such an injustice, was guilty of fornication; or that a certain man ran away in a battle, and that another committed such a treason, such a one was guilty of a robbery, and another of a treachery, and a third of such another villany? There is no body bold enough to do this. And therefore they who write the history of their own times, are agitated by several passions, and are obliged, either to lie openly, if they universally and throughout praise their princes, or favour their nation, if they always blame their enemies; or to dissemble and palliate the truth, or to make a motley piece of work of it, or to gild over their writings, and the actions of their princes with fine words, or (if they resolve to speak the truth) they are forced to conceal their names, and print their works without them. They who write the history of their predecessors, may (if they will) avoid this fault, and run boldly in the field of truth, with all assurance and liberty of language (31).

(31) Du Haillan's preface to the History of France, fol. o. i, verso, edit. 1572.

Many readers will here call to mind the words of the emperor Pseccennius Niger. Praise Marius, or Hannibal, or some other great general, of former ages, said he to an orator who presented himself before him, to speak a panegyric in his praise; for it is ridiculous to praise the living, especially if they be emperors: rewards are expected from them, they are feared, they can kill and banish. Quum imperatori factio quidam panegyricum recitare vellet, dixit ei, Scribe laudes Marii vel Annibalis, vel alicujus ducis optimi vita functi, & dic quid ille fecerit ut eum nos imitemur. Nam viventes laudare irriso est, maxime imperatores, a quibus speratur, qui timentur, qui præstare publice possunt, qui possunt necare, qui proferbere: se autem vivum placere vellet, mortuum etiam laudari (32).

In what cases it is lawful to write history, &c. already handled by others.

(33) It is the second, not in his book, but in the abstract I have given above of his narrative.

Let us say, by the by, that we must not make du Haillan's second reason a general rule (33); for there are many cases, in which it is very reasonable to write the history of the same reigns which have already been written by others. As I. when a man has many new things to say, or when he can illustrate and rectify the preceding histories in many places. II. When the design is to collect into one body all the facts belonging to a history, some whereof lie in some books, and others in some others. III. When the taste of the readers requires a new language, and a new turn. At present, for instance, most people would chuse rather to be ignorant of history, than to read the authors who composed it, in the fifteenth or sixteenth century. And therefore, though an historian should have nothing to say but what was already printed, yet it would be commendable to publish an history, provided the turn and the style could allure the reader, and the public appeared altogether disgusted with the other historians. Whence it appears, that if there are so many books containing the same things, it is not always the fault of the authors, but frequently of the readers, who will not be at the pains of seeking historical facts separately, or of turning over books written in old French. It is therefore for their convenience and profit, that some authors publish histories, which teach nothing new, and only connect together in a better style, the different pieces of other authors. If you have discovered some new facts, will it be said to you, be contented to publish them, and nothing else, why do you from thence take occasion to make a large book, in which you crowd so many trite stories? This censure is just on many occasions, but not when their new discoveries may be diffused upon a very long train of events. They must then be incorporated with former narrations; the interest and convenience of the reader requires it. We shall see, by and by, that upon this principle, our du Haillan changed his resolution.

What has been said of historical books, may be applied to other works. There are but too many I own which contain nothing but what is found in an hundred others; but on the other side, it would be a thing prejudicial to the republic of letters not to dare to put in a book, what other books have already published (34). A divine of Leyden pretends, that it is of great use to publish several books upon the same subjects, when they are important; he asserts also, that it is an excellent way to lessen the multitude of books which burden and oppress so many people. The reason of this paradox is, that a considerable number of books upon certain subjects, would imploy the public, and by that means abundance of other books would be neglected, and leap at once from the Bookfeller's to the Grocer's shop. Let us see this author's words, in which we shall find an excellent thought of St Augustin. Id (scribendi cacoëthes) nunc his temporibus in immensum est auctum, ut omnem medelam superasse videatur, nec alio modo possit coerceri, quam si plures divulget libros; quam rationem agendi forte paradoxam aliquis dixerit, optimam tamen nemo jure negaverit. De multitudine librorum utilium immenso numero non est quod jure conqueramur, qui non facile nimis augentur. Quamvis enim de rebus iisdem scribant plures, modo illæ sint cognitu dignæ, nullum id nocumentum veritati videtur inferre, quæ sic ad plures sibi viam pandit, cum lectorum alii his potius, quam illis scriptoribus delectentur, quamvis de eodem argumento commentatis. Quod rectè observavit Augustinus lib. 1. de Trinitate cap. 3. Neque enim omnia, quæ ab omnibus conscribuntur, in omnium manus veniunt. Et fieri potest, ut nonnulli, qui etiam hæc nostra intelligere valent, illos planiores non inveniant libros, & in istos saltem incident. Ideoque utile est, plures à pluribus fieri diverso stylo, non diversa fide, etiam de questionibus eisdem, ut ad plurimos res ipsæ perveniant, ad alios scilicet, ad alios autem sic. Quæ ratione inutiles libri sensim eliminantur, ut alii postea non sit usus, quam ut piperi & thuri involvendo inserviant (35). — This (it is of writing) is prodigiously increased in our days, and seems to be past remedy, neither can it be checked any other way than by publishing still more books; this may appear a paradox to some, but the reason will appear evident. For no body can justly complain of the great number of useful books which can hardly be too great. For though many write on the same subjects, provided they be useful subjects, truth cannot suffer thereby; but by this means gains more votaries, since some readers are more pleased with some books than with others, tho' treating on the same subjects. This St Augustin rightly observed. All books, says he, which are written, do not come into the hands of all. And it may happen, that they who are able to understand this book of mine, may not meet with the books which are written in a more intelligible manner, and may only light on mine. Therefore it is useful that different persons should write on the same point in a different style, though not containing a different doctrine, that so the doctrine it self may arrive at a greater number of persons, to some in one dress, to others in another. By this means useless books are banished by degrees, and come to be only employed to wrap up small wares.

(35) Christophorus Wittichius in Prefat. Consensus veritatis secundæ, edit. præfixa.

[F] He promised to Henry IV to continue this history to his time. I prove it by this passage (36): 'I have also written a book concerning the monarchy of France, which will soon be presented to your majesty, with a description of all the secrets and affairs of the establishment, greatness, and power of your kingdom, and of the kings your predecessors. Their history, which I have composed and finished at the death of Charles VII, shall be quickly followed by that of the other succeeding kings, down to your majesty; then your's will appear, if you please, to have it published.' This is what du Haillan said to king Henry IV in an epistle dedicatory, dated in October, 1594. He had acquainted his readers with the change of his resolution ten years before; for dedicating to Henry III the second edition of his History of France, corrected and enlarged in 1584, he speaks to him in this manner. 'Though in my epistle dedicatory to your majesty, and in the preface of the first edition, I said, that I would proceed no further, nor write the history of Lewis XI, because it was already done by Philip de Comines, Sieur d'Argenton; yet having since changed my resolution, I have begun it with hopes of finishing it this next winter, if I find that this my labour shall be acceptable to you.' It is the glory of France had propagated, and to speak freely upon some tender points, as for example, concerning the maid of Orleans [G]. This liberty gave offence to narrow minds, and such as would have every thing sacrificed to policy. I do not know whether is not aims to see the reason of his change; for besides that, we shall thereby see his judgment concerning Philip de Comines, we shall find that he was under one of those cases in which it is permitted to write a history after other writers. 'That which has caused me, says he (37), to alter my resolution, and to treat of the said king Lewis was, that the Sieur d'Argenton began his history, called Memoirs, but from the fifth year of his reign, and that all the causes of the wars, and of the great affairs this king had, are comprised betwixt the beginning of his reign, and the time wherein Philip de Comines begins to write, and in that part of history which he has treated, he has concealed many things, which I have discovered, and extracted from many books, memoirs, and dispatches of that time, and from many secret discourses, written either in his reign, or a little after his death, free from fear, hatred, flattery, praise, or passion, into which they often fall who write the history of their own times, and by the two last of which Philip de Comines has been influenced, being moved thereto either by his great affection towards his master, or the benefactions he had received from him, or the fear of his successor. And therefore he has not said what others might say, and what other historians have said of the actions, vices, and craft (38) of that king; and praising him more than he ought, he in many places acts the part of an orator, and of a panegyrist, and not of an historian; and in his long digressions on the affairs of foreign potentates, he transgresses the bounds of history, and of an historian. For the rest, none of the promises du Haillan made, of continuing the History of France, came to any thing. Nothing of this kind was found amongst his papers after his death (39); the Bookellers, who added a continuation to his work, as far as the year 1615 (40), and afterwards as far as the year 1627, took it from Paulus Emilius, Philip de Comines, Arnoul Ferron, du Bellay, &c.

(38) He had added in the edition of 1576, and crucities.

(39) See the advertisement of the Bookellers, in the editions of his History of France after his death. I use that of Paris, 1557, in two volumes in folio.

(40) Du Chesne, Bibliothèque des Historiens de France, pag. 55, of the edition of 1618, speaks only of this edition, which is in two volumes in folio. Apply to this the criticism we have seen upon him in a like case, in the article EMILIUS, remark [G], citat. (15).

(41) Du Haillan, epistle dedicatory of his History of France, edit. 1584.

[G] He had the courage to confute many traditions . . . and speak freely . . . concerning the maid of Orleans. Let no body wonder at the length of the passage I am going to cite; it is instructive, and shews the true character of an historian, and the ridiculous offence which is taken by ill-turned heads, from his boldness in preferring truth before all things. This wrong turn of mind is of all times and places. It is worth while to observe, how celebrated authors have contemned and opposed it. Du Haillan's words are as follows (41). 'I have not acted the part of a flatterer, nor of a courtier, but that of an historian, and I have spoken the truth. I have not imitated flattering painters, who drawing a face, if it happen to have any imperfection or deformity in it, leave it out, or paint it to advantage. My resolution was to paint the ugliest as well as the finest features, and to speak boldly and freely of every thing with an unusual liberty, which will be praised and admired by all good readers; as I have formerly done in my History of the State and Success of the Affairs of France; in which I have boldly spoken many things, which, before me, no body would, nor durst, say, and possibly did not know. For both in that work, and in this I have encountered many commonly received opinions, such as the coming of Pharamond into Gaul, the institution of the Salic law, which is attributed to him, the creation of the peers of France, ascribed to Charlemagne, and other particular points, having with boldness and truth affirmed, that Pharamond never passed the Rhine to enter Gaul, and that he did not make the Salic law to exclude the daughters from the succession of our crown, because he never came into our France. Whereupon, some who pretend to speak of every thing, and know nothing, and who think by their ill-grounded opinions to overturn those which are built upon judgment and reason, have said, that I went about to destroy the principles of our history, by denying the institution of this law by Pharamond. But, Sir, this is not my design, but only to reject an ancient error, the Salic law being, in my opinion, ancient and approved enough, since it has been practised as a law, from the beginning of our first kings (as you may see more at large at the beginning of the first book of this history in the life of Pharamond) and my opinion thereupon, can give no advantage to strangers, nor scandalize our natives, except such as are scandalized with every thing but what themselves say and do. Some have found fault with my liberty of language in this particular, and in that of the peers of France, and in others, saying, that I act against the duty of an historian, by robbing France of an ancient opinion she had of the coming of Pharamond into Gaul, of the Salic law made by him, and the institution of the peers of France, and that it is a crime to abrogate things grown old in opinion, and written by ignorant people, who never read good books, and believed by others as ignorant, who have neither sense nor understanding to read, or understand, good and ancient authors, but rather amuse themselves with old trumpery, as unpollished as their own heads. Good historians (Sire) ought not in their words or writings to follow the opinions of the vulgar, but only faithful true ones, and such as are approved by authors, or by good arguments and conjectures, which when they are numerous, and well applied, serve for a true and certain testimony, when, by the injury of time, the proof of the truth by writing is wanting. I have therefore (Sire) in these things, and many others, rejected the common opinion for the true. In which I presume I have done good service to the History of France, disengaging it from many forgeries and fables, which render it disagreeable, and sometimes contradictory, delivering the readers from uncertainty in many points, concerning which they could not come at a right judgment in it. In which I am certain of pleasing men of judgment, for it is such whom I study to please, and not those who shall dislike my opinions and writings. If you would know what he says of the maid of Orleans, read this other passage (42).

'The miracle of this maid, whether it was invented and feigned, or true, raised the courage of the nobles, the people, and the king, who had lost it; such is the force of religion, and frequently of superstition. For some say, that this Joan was a whore to John, bastard of Orleans, others to the Sieur Baudricourt, others to Pothon, who being politic and prudent, and seeing the king at his wits end, and the people so discouraged by continual wars, that there was no raising their hopes and spirits, bethought themselves of employing a miracle, made up of a false religion, which of all things in the world is most apt to raise and animate the courage of men, and to make even the most simple believe what is not. And the people were very much disposed to receive such superstitions. They who believe she was a maid sent from God, are not damned; neither are those who do not believe it. Many think this last article an heresy; but I shall suspend my belief on either side. Their lords for some days together, intrusted her in all she was to answer to the questions which should be put to her by the king, and them, when she should come into his presence (for they themselves were to interrogate her) and that she might know the king, (whom she had never seen) when she should be brought near him, they made her, every day look several times on his picture. On the day appointed, in which she was to come to his chamber, which being by their appointment, they failed not to be there. And when she came in, the first who asked her what she would have, were the bastard of Orleans and Baudricourt; who asked her what she wanted, she answered she desired to speak with the king. They shewed her one of the other lords who was there, saying that he was the king, but she being before instructed in every thing that was to be said and done to her, and in what she was to say and do, said that he was not the king, and that the king was hid behind the bed, (where indeed he was) and going to him, she said to him, what has been above related. This feigned and counterfeit invention of religion, was of such advantage to the kingdom, that it raised the drooping and dispirited courage of the people from despair. At last she was taken by the English before Compeigne, (42) Idem, in the second book of the State and Success of the Affairs of France, pag. 138, 6, 17, of the Paris edition, 1610. Note, That Gabriel Naudé is of the same opinion: The English, says he, in the third chapter of his Coups d'Etat, pag. m. 323, being masters of almost all France, it was necessary under Charles VII, to have recourse to some piece of state-policy to expel them, such was that of Joan the maid, which was confessed to be such by Justus Lipsius, in his politics, and by some other foreign historians, but particularly by two of our own, to wit, du Bellai Largey, in his Military Art, and by du Haillan, in his History, not to cite many other less considerable writers.

whether he did well to publish some things, which he knew only by hear-say [H]. He was much criticised, and he showed how it vexed him, by the haughtiness where-with he answered his censurers [I]. He has not been unjustly censured in every thing piegne, and carried to Rouen, where she was tried and burnt. Some have been, and will be, displeased at my saying this, and that I deprive our country-men of an opinion, which they have so long entertained of this as a sacred and miraculous thing, and that I thus turn it at present into a fable. But I resolved to say this, because it has been discovered to be so by time, which discovers all things: besides, it is not a thing of that importance, that it ought to be believed as an article of faith.

[H] He published some things which he knew only by hear-say. It was upon such foundation that he published that Charles VIII. was supposititious. See the News from the Republic of Letters (43). Varillas confutes this story (44).

[I] He showed how much he was vexed being criticised, by the haughtiness wherewith he answered his censurers. As the works he had published before the history of France, had been criticised, he doubted not but this would have the same fate. And therefore he shewed his contempt of it before hand, and placed on the backside of the title, a sonnet, which has something of the Gascon in it. These are the six last lines,

Medifans, estourdis, vains & presumptueux,
Te voudront attaquer une indigne querelle.
Mais ne crains tout cela, ains passe hardiment,
Car leur presumption, ny leur sot jugement,
Ne pourront empêcher ta carrière immortelle.

Tho' basely attacked by thousands of ignorant, proud, envious, malicious, vain, and presumptuous, men, do not fear, but march boldly on; for neither their presumption, nor foolish censures, shall be able to stop thy immortal career.

In the very beginning of this preface, he makes this observation. 'If this history of France cannot please every body, as I well know it will not please the nice, the ignorant, and the envious (and such I will not please) who will pass their foolish, ignorant, and envious judgments on it, I am certain it will please those amongst you who are writers, who know by experience what labour is, who have a judgment free from all passion, and who generously excuse the faults and inadvertencies which may be met with in so great a work.' The last part of this passage is considerable, and most true in certain respects. No sort of readers are more prone to criticise, or more rash and unjust in their censures, than they who write nothing. An author has more reason to promise himself some support and equity amongst authors, than amongst such as know not by experience, the difficulties of writing. Provided only there be no emulation in the case, as sometimes there is not; for authors do not always take the same road: the reputation of one, is not always of the same kind with that of another. And, in this case, it is better to be judged by a laborious author, than by lazy readers. In the other case, a reader proves more equitable. But to return to du Haillan, he speaks thus towards the end of his preface:

'In the mean time, I will consider the enviers and slanderers of me and my works, who will cast the darts of their malice against both. Being able to say with truth, readers, that in my fortune, actions, and writings, I have never been envied or hated by any, but by the ignorant and the wicked, and those whose name, bodily health, and reputation, have been tainted with some vice.' The storm of criticism which he foresaw actually happened (45). Let us see what he observes in the epistle dedicatory (46) of the second edition (47). 'This work . . . was no sooner born, but it was barked at, and bit by the envy and obloquy of all sorts and ranks of people, some openly my enemies, and others my pretended friends; nay, there were some, who carrying it fair with me, as they did in all their actions, and courting your favour by indirect and oblique ways, of which they were extremely greedy, went about to purchase it by imposture and calumny, at the expense of my reputation and that of my history, censuring it in your presence, (Sire) for that for which it has since been most esteemed, and which will give it the greatest honour and favour with posterity; I mean the simple truth, and the freedom with which I have wrote.' He expresses still more repentment, and confidence, at the end of his preface. 'They, says he, according to their usual malice, were of the number of my assailants; but I have resolved to despise their ignorance, and laugh at it, covering my self with the veil of truth, and the benevolence of such of my readers, as have read and shall read my book with judgment, and have approved, and shall approve it; for it is for you that it is written, and not for the envious, ignorant, and malicious, who can see nothing that is good, and know not how to judge of, or esteem what is praise-worthy.' Amongst the things he said to his critics, I have met with one that deserves consideration. 'If sometimes I name men, whose name the too ticklish reader will say, is not an affair of state; I will answer him, that it seemed so to me, that I have a judgment as well as he, and (let him be who he will) I know better what I write, than he knows how to judge of my writings (48). This is what many other authors may and ought to represent to their critics. A man who has been employed many years upon one kind of work, knows better than another what are the properties of it. He has not, if you will, so good a taste and judgment as another, generally speaking; but since he has studied certain subjects, and applied himself to them for a long time, we ought to believe, that he judges better of their nature, and the ornaments which belong to them, than they who have not made them their particular study. And therefore we ought not to imagine, that certain authors act imprudently, when on several occasions, they prefer their own judgment, before that of their friends, or their enemies, though otherwise more knowing than themselves. A writer less intelligent, generally speaking, than his readers, will yet have more views than they upon the subjects he treats of; and whilst they know not whether he had reason to say such or such things, he will know that he was induced to it by many reasonable motives, grounded upon the character of his work. Hence arise infinite ill-grounded censures, and hence we also see how requisite it is to study well the rules, before we pronounce whether a work be good or bad. For example, to judge well of this history, with a commentary annexed, which I call an Historical and Critical Dictionary, a man must have studied the rights and privileges of an historical commentator; and hereupon I might say, with du Haillan, I know better what I write, than such a one knows how to judge of my writings. I have studied the nature and properties of compilations; if they every where pleased one kind of people, they would not be good. They who know not the character of them want to find in them only what pleases their own palate.

Here are two other passages of du Haillan, which will inform us that he was criticised and vexed at it. 'My works, Sire . . . have not been able to avoid the barkings and bitings of calumny and envy, and of railers and slanderers, with whose slings, not only my writings have been pricked, but also the course of my fortune, has been wounded, ulcerated, and splot; it seems that some rays of virtue and ability, which my enemies discovered in me, were offensive to the eyes of their ignorance and malice, and that my lustre could not be born by them. Nay, Sire, in your presence, I have been so slandered and ill used, that it is not long of my enemies, if I have not forfeited your favour and good opinion, in which alone I have ever sowed the hopes of all my happiness, and the seeds of my most humble and devoted service. But your goodness and wise judgment, Sire, has made them appear impostors, and delivered me from the fears of the mischief with which they threatened me (49). He spoke thus to Henry III, in 1580, dedicating a new edition of one of his books to him. The preface of the same book thunders against du Haillan's critics, I have taken what follows from it. 'There are some phantastical wits (the number whereof is endless) accustomed as I shall shew by a passage of Sorel [K]. His manner of speaking of himself, is a testimony that he was not disinterested enough, either as to his glory or fortune. He displays too much his labours, and the success of his books, their several editions, translations, &c. and he too palpably manifests his desires of reward [L]. I do not know accustomed to slander and abuse every thing, being stupified with ignorance and presumption, who do not relish it. Of these some are dangles about the court, others are lawyers, others collegians, others some young coxcombs, lately come from the university, with three borders of Latin upon their gowns, and a shred of purchased honour, who ferreting all sorts of books, pretend to despise and reject them, if they find a letter misplaced, or do not find what they know not how to look for. Others are professed writers, who, being swelled up, and big with books, bring forth one every week, fill the book-sellers stalls with them, talk boldly of every body, despise the works of others, and approve of none but their own. Some of these last, are meer apes, for if they see another do a work, at thirty paces distance from thence, they bring forth another in embryo to which they give the same name. All these sorts of people have attacked, pinched, and barked at me, but however they have not bitten me, nor done any injury to my present performance, or to my history of France, being only like dead coals, which blacken, without being able to burn: for in spite of their envy, cavils, pedantry, railing and presumption, my works fly through the world, have obtained a great reputation, and are translated into several languages. . . . As for the courtiers who have defamed my writings, and attempted to make them odious, they are men accustomed to rob others of their honour, when they want opportunities of pillaging any thing else (50).

(50) Idem, Preface to the same book, and the same edition.

[K] He has not been unjustly censured in every thing: as I shall shew by a passage of Sorel. It contains a just censure of some of du Haillan's faults, and also some small commendations. 'He was even desirous to imitate the elegance of the best historians, but to avoid pains, he has almost translated word for word, all Paulus Æmilius's orations, and has also copied him in his narrations: it is true, he has added a great many curious observations, which he found elsewhere. He may be charged with giving a fabulous exordium to his history, intirely of his own invention, making Pharamond, and his faithful counsellors, deliberate, whether, having the power in his hand, he ought to reduce the French to an aristocratical or monarchical government, and making each of them harrange in support of his opinion. We there find the names of Charimond and Quadrek, imaginary persons. It is a thing very surprizing: we have but little certainty that there was ever such a man as Pharamond in the world, and though we knew that there was, yet it is an egregious boldness to relate things of him, which have no foundation. Dupleix censures du Haillan for it, and reproaches him for having taken his speeches from Amadis de Gaule; but Amadis has no such political discourses. We must suppose Dupleix only meant, that du Haillan had invented this, as it were to write a kind of a romance. However, if they are not to be found in Amadis, they may be found in many other places. They are common places, which are usually met with in books, that treat of so trivial a subject, as the different forms of government. Du Haillan is accused on another hand of talking too freely of some ecclesiastics: but he has done this possibly to shew his zeal for our kings, and to maintain their authority. Notwithstanding all this his writings are more judicious and methodical than those who preceded him. His history instructs us in many particulars of the French government, which he understood well enough, as he has likewise shown in his book, of the state and success of the affairs of France. In fine, he is to be praised for having first attempted to put our history in a good and agreeable form, which he has effected according to the knowledge of the time in which he lived (51).

(53) That is, from 1571, when the king commanded him to write the History of France.

[L] He displays too much his labours, and the success of his books. . . . he too palpably manifests his desires of reward. Let us begin with these words of his epistle dedicatory to his history France (52). 'From that time (53) to the year 1576, when it was first printed, I laboured night and day upon this history, with the sweat and labour of my body, the wasting of my years, the great fatigue of my mind, and expence of my purse, in procuring of books, titles, charters, memoirs, and other materials requisite for the building so great a work; and I have neglected my affairs, and the means of improving them, at a time that every one in my sight, was making his fortune, and striving more than in any age, to get wealth, and obtain gifts and bounties from your majesty, rather than to write or read books, that I might give my self up intirely and wholly to the accomplishment of this work, which at last after four years employed in raising it, I have finished; after many days spent in study, in solitude, and in great racking of my brain; after many watchings, and after great reading, tumbling, turning over, and collating many Latin, French, and Italian books, both ancient and modern, and many monuments, papers, titles, old writings, and musty manuscripts, rummaged and turned over; I have found it a hard task, Sire, that if, when I undertook this work, I had known or imagined the pains I was to take, and which I have taken, I should have excused myself to your majesty; and no gift, or promise, or desire, or hope of honour, glory, or advantage, could have induced me to engage in it.' He afterwards shews at large, the imperfections of the historians (54) he was obliged to consult, and then he adds: 'from all these confusions, diversities, prolixities, and labyrinths, Sire, I have overcome, and have written the history of France, and of the kings your ancestors, in the best manner that I could. I have not been able to do it so well as it deserves, or to give it its just perfection; and I will not blame the dead or their works, to give the praise and advantage to my own. Only I will say, without presumption and boasting, that I have done a thing which had not been done before, or seen by any of our nation, and have given to the history France, a dress it never appeared in before. . . . Some may be able to write the history of France as well, and better than myself, and others worse; but if I obtain not the first rank amongst them, I assure myself I shall not have the last. I have found the way of drawing the quintessence out of these gross masses of ancient histories, and of reducing their luxuriance, superfluity, and prolixity, to things necessary, and not superfluous; and besides, not willing to rely upon our histories and chronicles, I have extracted from foreigners, from the registers of courts of parliament, from the chambers of accounts, and charters of churches, and from books lent me by some of my friends, the necessary materials for my subject. My sole aim was truth, which is the eye of history &c.' He repeats a great deal of this in his preface: 'I have laboured upon it, says he, for five years, I have spent many whole days, and half nights; many watchings, studies, and solitudes, have been employed in it. I have rummaged, read, and turned over and over, many books, charters, monuments, old writings, papers, and parchments; I have had many Latin, French, and Italian books, treating of the histories of France, England, Germany, Italy, Spain, Flanders, Scotland, Burgundy, Bretagne, Anjou, Berry, and Aquitaine, of the holy wars in Asia and Europe, the lives of Popes and emperors, and abundance of others, with a world of old writings and ancient monuments. From all these I have extracted the quintessence, distilling them in the alembic of my judgment and labour, and I shew you what I have extracted from them in my book.'

If you would know what he says of the success of his work, read what follows (55). 'My history, which has vanquished their envy, and that of all those who railed at it, shall live as long as the French tongue shall continue and prevail in your kingdom. Since it's first edition, it has been often printed, both in your kingdom, and out of it, in several volumes and characters, and turned into Latin by Peter Boudanger (56), who instructs youth in the college of Loudun, a man of a good life, and great learning, and who, in his Latin writings, imitates, as much as any man know whether we ought to believe that he threatened with his iron pen, those who should despise his works (d), and that he judged it as sufficient to blast them, as he pretended, that his golden pen was capable of eternizing the merit of his benefactors. He died at Paris the twenty third of November, 1610, in his seventy sixth year, and was buried at St Eustache (e). It must not be forgotten, that he had attended Francis de Noailles, bishop of Acqs, in his embassies to England and Venice (f). It is for these latter that I labour, and I am certain the pains I take to shew them the picture of the heart, according to the lineaments I find of it in books, where authors have painted themselves, will be acceptable to them. Let this be said once for all. We might make a great many reflexions upon this picture of du Haillan, and therefore I imagine, I shall not displease the reader by making some [M]. in Europe, the purity and sweetness of Cicero. But since, Sir, I have augmented and enlarged my history anew, having in some places inserted two or three leaves, in others less, he waits for this impression that he may add to his Latin version, what I have added to my French composition. So that you, Sir, as also your subjects and strangers, will quickly see this history in the Latin tongue. Add to this the beginning of his preface (57). I wished my history of France might be as much agreeable to you, as I have taken much pains and labour in the compiling of it. My desire has not been altogether vain: for it so pleased men of judgment, that since that time it has been frequently printed, and in divers volumes, both within and without the kingdom, and read over and over, by all the ingenious men of France, and many foreigners. . . . Now, reader, seeing my work has so well succeeded, and been so well received, both by foreigners and by our countrymen, and so often reprinted and desired, I have corrected and much enlarged it, and enriched it with many curious enquiries. . . .

Dedicating his book of the state and success of the affairs of France, to Henry III in 1580, he expressed himself in this manner (58). I am, Sir, the first of all the French, who have written the history of France, and in a polite language shewn the grandeur and dignity of our kings: for before there was nothing but the old rubbish of chronicles which spoke of them. My works are seen and read by all christendom, and translated into several languages, particularly my history of France, is put into Latin, by a very learned man of your kingdom, and is ready to appear and present itself to your majesty, clothed in a Latin dress. I am none of those venturous and ignorant writers, whose brains daily teem with books, who raise up whole forests of them, and who, in their obscure studies, wherein they see not the light of the affairs of the world, speak and write confidently, right or wrong, of the present state-affairs, of your most secret and important councils, judge of every thing, are partial for one, and prepossessed against another, extol those who give them money, make a meer pretender of a great general, and commander of an army, and live only by the sale of their presumptuous writings. And therefore such writers will see their works expire, before themselves, and shamefully assist at their funeral. I have learnt, Sir (59), . . . Let us see the beginning of the preface of the same book. Many of you (readers) who shall see this present work, which I have newly revised and much enlarged and enriched, have seen it before printed in several sorts of volumes, and characters, from its first edition, of the year 1570. For since that time, there has not a year passed, but it has been reprinted (60), and given satisfaction to all who have seen it, and who approve of what is good. When he dedicated the same book to Henry IV in 1594, he thus spoke of it to this prince. It has travelled, and seen the world, and has been well received within and without the kingdom, and strangers have made it speak their language.

As for his desire of rewards, it may be clearly enough seen in the passages I have already related, but it will more plainly still appear in this, that follows (61). I have composed this work in four winters, seasons proper for writing and studying, and have spent but few summers days, in it, which seem not so fit for such a fatigue, as the short and cold days are which I have employed in it. So that I am apprehensive of being benumbed, unless the sun of your majesty, by the rays of your liberalities and bounties, afford some warmth. There is not a man of letters in your kingdom, who excels in any science, or has composed any elegant performance, whom you have not rewarded for it, and all your ancient servants, are raised to honours and preferments, and are full and rich with your gifts and benefactions. I am the first who have written the history of the kings your ancestors, and possibly the only person who hath done it in a good method, and fine language, and I am one of the first and eldest of your servants, and yet I am the only one, and the last, to be provided for, but not the last in merit, I have laboured, and labour ordinarily for the public, more than for myself; nor have I only been engaged in writing books, but also sometimes employed in travels to foreign countries; and by the observation of affairs for these twenty nine years past (62), in which I have been a courtier, I have learnt how histories ought to be written, and how to speak of kings, and treat and write of affairs of state. Here you see the style of a discontented author, complaining that he is not enriched, nor advanced to honours, by the productions of his pen, and asking that this so much desired, so well deserved, recompence of his labours may come at last. We find the same complaint, at the end of a preface he published in 1580. I have taken this pains, says he.

(63) to serve the public, which I think I do service, and have done service, by my labours: this gives me a singular satisfaction; for I have laboured with that design. And is likewise almost all the recompence I have had: and I shall be very well satisfied with this last labour, when I find it has been acceptable to you. You may believe what you please of what I am going to recite, I will quote my author (64). Henry the great . . . made one day a repartee to the Sieur du Haillan . . . for as du Haillan, a man . . . vain . . . and given to his belly . . . spake one day to the late king too freely, complaining of the small salary which he received from his liberality, and had the boldness to say to him, Sir, you know that I have two pens as a public historian, a title with which it has pleased your majesty to honour me, one is of gold, and the other of iron: with my golden pen, I render those immortal who honour me and do me good, and with my iron one I tarnish the reputation of those who do not take notice of the merits of my works. The king knowing by this harangue, the character of the man, who was more valiant at a meal, than he was in the field, said to him, with a wonderful and royal quickness, Mr du Haillan, I do not believe that you have a golden pen; for if had you one, you would have swallowed it long ago.

[M] We might make so many reflexions on this picture of du Haillan, that I imagine I shall not displease the reader by making some. It is not easy to let this pass without some reflexion. One who should ask whether those in public posts are as mercenary, as the servants of a private man, would seem at first fight to make an absurd question; but upon examination, we should find in it a just subject of a problem, and should even declare for the affirmative. Consider a little the printed or not printed relations of newswriters, and the conversations of those who have for a long time been in high life. Consult the historians who enter most into particulars; especially, read the authors of memoirs; do this attentively, and I doubt not but you will own, that a poor foot-boy is in proportion, less mercenary, and more disinterested, than most of those who possess great employments, either in princes households, or in the government. These are persons who are hardly ever contented, always ready to beg new honours, and greater pensions, and to complain of the smallness of their recompences, to magnify their services, to murmur if they are forgotten, whilst others are thought on, to threaten to retire, and to manifest their discontent, by rude and audacious proceedings, &c. These gentlemen imagine they have the greater right to demand magnificent rewards, because they persuade themselves, that their master, a king, or a sovereign, in a word, the public, will never come to want, though they have famished leeches upon them continually sucking (65). Tell me not of such, or such an one, who are ruined in their prince's service, and of such a great lord, whose lands, and even house, are under an execution. These are not examples of their disinterestedness. It is not zeal for their country, but a mercenary temper, or their luxury and debauchery, which are the causes of their poverty. They imagined, that by appearing at court, or in the army with great equipages, tho' really useless to the public good, they should the easier come to preferments: and at last, if they are ruined, it is not for the advantage of the state, but to gratify their pomp and pride, and other particular passions. The Aristides and Fabricii, who after having enjoyed the greatest posts, and spent all their life in a wonderful frugality, had hardly any thing to leave their children, are good examples of an unmercenary spirit; but where are such to be found?

But what is more vexatious, is to see that the men of learning cannot cure themselves of this common distemper. The court and the army being the schools of ambition and luxury, and consequently of hunger and thirst after riches, it is no wonder they teach men to do nothing gratis, but to desire large recompences for their services. And as this passion is not easy to be satisfied, without boasting of what they have done, and complaining of the want of a just reward, there is no occasion to take so much exception at this conduct. But there will still be sufficient ground to lament, that study and the profession of letters, should not have taught du Haillan the prudence to avoid so much ostentation of his labours, and to forbear complaints of the meanness of his fortune. If he were the only author guilty this way, it would not be necessary to take notice of it: but the mischief of it is, that in this he copied a great number of writers, and that an hundred others have copied, and still copy him. This is a great injury to the muses, and deprives them of the glory they should enjoy, of inspiring their votaries with a true generosity, and a noble contempt of riches and public rewards. They are like other men, you will say, and no less subject to ambition and avarice, the two epidemical diseases of the soul of man. It is certain, that the desire of living at ease, by means of a good revenue, is not the only reason of the boastings and complaints of du Haillan, and those who are like him; pride has a great share in it. They fancy, that the public will have a great esteem, both for their persons and their works, if it is known that they have had large pensions (66), but in this they are much mistaken: some few, I confess, may be imposed on by this outward appearance, and argue fallaciously thus: such an author has got noble employ, and rides in his coach, therefore he has a great deal of merit and his works are good. But the public is seldom caught thus; and however, it is a charm but of short continuance. Posterity judges of books by the books themselves: if they are good, it doth not despise them, tho' it should be said at the beginning of the preface that the author died with hunger: if they are bad, they are despised, tho' should appear in the first page, that the author was an earl, or a marquis, and left a million. What is it you fear? why do you torment your self? might one have asked du Haillan: you are allowed to say that you have not spared your pains or care to render your work perfect: your duty obliged you to great fatigues, and it is a civility to the public, to declare in a preface, that you have done all you could to merit their approbation. You ought to have stopped there, and not to have urged the greatness and value of your labours, as a just cause of demanding greater recompences, and complaining that you had not been sufficiently paid. Are you afraid that future ages should know that your studies and researches have put the history of France in a very fine light, but have not enriched you? what injury can that do your memory? if it be said that you was not industrious to heap up riches, they will suppose you wanted a quality which is none of the best; your glory will not by suffer it: sleep at rest, if it be said that this industry was not above your capacity, but that you did not care to employ it, being content with your books and your studies, and to consecrate your time to the instruction of the public: would not this be an excellent elogy? would it not be a prejudice in favour of your works? if the contempt of riches, and your continual application to writing good books, expose you to the danger of dying poor, you ought to wish that this may be put in your epitaph (67). This would be equivalent to a title of honour or nobility digna sepulchris in the republic of learning; this would be a glorious way to immortality (68). Never fear the judgment of posterity upon it. If they who were careless of re-atta compensing your labours, are censured for their ingratitude and injustice, what is that to you? it is a censure which doth not fall upon you.

It must be here said to the glory of Mr Des Cartes, that he preserved himself pure and untainted from this shameful disease, though one of his friends had taken the most dangerous ways to infect him with it. Observe in what manner this zealous friend excited him to boast, and make loud demands of recompence (69). Know, that to obtain any thing of the public, it is not enough to mention a word or two concerning it, by the by, in the preface of a book, without saying expressly that you desire and expect it, and explaining the reasons, to prove not only that you deserve it, but also that it is much their interest to give it you, and that they ought to expect great advantage from it. It is so usual to see those who imagine they have merit, make such a noise about it, and so importunately assert their pretensions, and promise so much above what they can do, that when any one speaks modestly of himself, and desires nothing of any body, nor makes any confident promises, whatever proofs he otherwise gives of his ability, that will not be considered, they will never think of him. You will say perhaps that you are not of a temper, either to ask any thing, or speak to your own advantage; because the one seems to be a sign of meanness, and the other of pride. But I maintain that this humour ought to be corrected, and that it proceeds from error and infirmity rather than from an honest bashfulness and modesty. You may say likewise that your works speak sufficiently, and that you have no need to add promises and boastings, which being the custom of cheating quacks, seem not becoming a man of honour who only seeks the truth. But what makes these pretenders blame-worthy, is not their boasting great and good things of themselves, but only false ones, and such as cannot be proved: whereas those things I would have you say of yourself, are so true, and so evidently proved by your writings, that by all the laws of decency you may affirm them, and those of charity oblige you to it, because it concerns others to know them. For though your writings speak sufficiently to such as carefully peruse them, and are able to understand them; yet this is not enough for the design I would put you upon, because every one cannot read them, and the managers of public affairs have hardly leisure. It is probable that some who have read them, may speak to them about it: but whatever they may say, the little noise you are known to make, and the great modesty you always have observed in speaking of your self hinders them from attending much to it. Nay, because they are accustomed to hear indifferent people set off to them in the most advantageous terms imaginable, they have no reason to take the most extraordinary praises that should be given you by those who know you, for exact truth. Whereas when a man speaks of himself and says extraordinary things, he is heard with greater attention, especially when he is well born, and is known not to be of a temper or condition to play the mountebank. And because he would make himself ridiculous by using hyperboles on this occasion, his words are taken literally; and such as will not believe them, are at least excited by their curiosity, or their jealousy, to examine into the truth of them. This being most certain, and since it can most easily be proved by the writings you have already printed, you ought to speak it aloud, to publish it so assiduously, and to put it so expressly in all the titles

(69) Letter I, written to Mr Des Cartes. It is before his treatise of the Passions.

(70) See before the said Treatise of Passions, Mr Des Cartes's answer to his friend's letters.

'titles of your books, that no body for the future may be ignorant of it.' Could Mr Des Cartes's modestly be attacked by more specious and stronger arguments than these? Here is nothing omitted, all excuses foretold, and yet it was all to no purpose (70). Note, that the gentleman had good reason to tell him, that the public is used to be dunned with great importunity and boasting: because the petitioners know they shall otherwise obtain nothing. Woe to them who are disheartened by the first refusal, and cannot speak out in their petitions. Du Haillan knew his cue, when he acted in the manner we have seen above. A man must complain, and petition often, to be once heard in a court: if cardinal Richelieu was such an one as he is represented in the History of the French Academy (71), he was a phoenix.

(71) Cardinal Richelieu never did any good to Mainard, partly because he did not love that any thing should be asked of him, and that he might have the glory of giving of his own accord. Pelliss. Hist. of the Academy, pag. m. 278.

H A L I - B E I G H, first dragoman at the Grand Seignior's court, in the XVIIth century, was born a Christian in Poland; but being taken very young by the Tartars, he was sold to the Turks, who educated him in their religion in the Seraglio. His Polish name was Albert Bobowski [A]. He acquired the knowledge of a great number of languages [B], and became so learned as to be able to write books [C]. He had a great correspondence with some Englishmen, who engaged him to translate some books into the Turkish language (a). He was desirous to return to the profession of Christianity; but he died before he executed that noble design (b). See the Supplement to Moreri.

(a) See the remark [C].

(b) Leipfic Journal, 1691, pag. 226.

[A] His name was Albert Bobowski. This name has been latinized Bobovius; but most authors have been mistaken in it. Sir Paul Ricaut calls this Poland Albert Bobonius (1). Bepier, his translator, corrects him, and puts Bohonius (2), because Thomas Smith writ it so, pag. 39, of his epistle de Morib. Turc. 'Tis true, that in this passage it is Bozonius, but the errand, shew, that it should be read Bohonius. Sir Paul Ricaut's first translator (3) has put Robovius.

(3) His name is Brior.

(4) Pag. 81, of the Dutch edition.

[B] He acquired the knowledge of a great number of languages. Give me leave to cite here, somewhat at large, the author of the old and new Lacedemon: 'Observe, says he (4), Fornetti, Panagiotti, la Fontaine, and all the other dragomen of the Porte; how circumpect they are when they treat with the ministers of Christian princes, or with those of their retinue. Halybey, the famous Polish renegade, who, bating his apostacy, and morally speaking, is one of the honestest men in the world, does not better explain himself with the Franks, though he be their great friend; who yet could do it very well, as speaking eighteen different languages.'

[C] He became so learned as to be able to write books. At Dr Thomas Smith's request, he wrote a treatise de Turcarum liturgia, peregrinatione Meccana, circumfione, agrotorum visitatione, &c. Concerning the liturgy of the Turks, their pilgrimage to Mecca, their circumcision, and visiting of the sick, &c. which was published by Dr Hyde, to whom Dr Smith gave it (5). Hali-Beigh translated into Turkish, the Catechism of the Church of England, about the year 1653, at Mr Bafire's request. He translated all the Bible into the same tongue, at the instance of Levinus Warnerus, who sent this translation to Leyden, that it might be printed there. This is not as yet done, but the manuscript is kept in the library of Leyden. I do not mention a Turkish grammar and dictionary, written by the same dragoman. Sir Paul Ricaut confesses, he had many things from him, which he has related in his book concerning the Present State of the Ottoman Empire. If he had consulted him upon all that he has said, he would not have advanced that the Mahometan women had no hopes of entering into paradise. Hali-Beigh maintains the contrary, in the work which Dr Hyde has published. Rycautum refellit, docuitque mulieres Turcicas omnino sperare se aliquando æque ac viros in Paradisum receptum iri, quod ipse pag. 271 negaverat (6). Sir Paul Ricaut, amongst other things, says (7), that he learnt from this dragoman, that there are some Turks who believe, that the souls of dead men enter into the bodies of beasts, whose constitution comes nearest to that of the bodies they have left. A Druggist one day told Hali-Beigh, that he prayed to God, with those of the same profession (8), that their souls might have the honour, after their death, to enter the bodies of camels, because they are sober, laborious, patient, and gentle creatures, and bring their drugs from the remotest countries of the east. That he doubted not, but after the revolution of 3365 years, during which his soul would travel all the world over, and pass successively from camel to camel, it would return once more into an human body, much purer and more perfect than it had at the beginning. This was the Druggist's creed. It is said, that most of the Chinese are much addicted to this opinion. We have in Dr Barrow's Posthumous Works, an English relation of a conspiracy that was formed in the Seraglio, against Kiofen, grandmother to Mahomet IV. Albert Bobovius, Musician of the Seraglio, and e-witness of this event, has written that relation (9).

H A L I C A R N A S S U S, the capital city of the kingdom of Caria, was a colony of the Argians (a) [A]. It became famous under the two Artemisia's, and Mausolus the husband of the later. This prince's tomb was a very great ornament to it, being reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world. The fountain Salmacis was another curiosity of Halicarnassus. There were few towns on that coast, which made so stout a resistance against Alexander as this did (b); because care had been taken to fortify it well. Vitruvius (c) tells us some particulars about it's construction, and especially concerning it's ports. Meursius, as learned as he was, applied to the two ports of Rhodes (d), what Vitruvius has only said concerning those of Halicarnassus. Alexander was obliged to burn the town, whilst the garrison still vigorously defended itself in the fortresses, Herodotus and Dionysius Halicarnassus were born in this city.

[A] It was a colony of Argians. The conductor of this colony was called Anthes, who departed from the town of Trezen (1). Pausanias (2) calls him Anthes, and makes him the son of Neptune. He does not make him the leader of this colony, but attributes it to his descendants. However, the Halicarnassians were surnamed Arthesidæ (3).

fembly [A]. He published many books, several of which have been translated from English into French by Theodore Jaquemot. They are filled with fine thoughts, excellent morality, and even a great deal of piety. He died in the year 1656, aged eighty two years (b). He was so great a lover of study, that he earnestly wished that his health would have allowed him to do it, even to excess [B]. His writings, when an occasion offers, show that he was very zealous against Popery [C]. Neither was he more favourable to those who separated from the stock without an extreme necessity. What he said of Arminius is a proof of this [D]. He lamented the divisions of Protestants,

[A] He was obliged, by sickness, to retire from the synod of Dort. A priest, who wrote against him, did not fail to insult him upon this deputation; but Joseph Hall answers him as follows (1): 'Let himself, or any of his eaves-dropping companions . . . (to whom that place stood open) say, wherein I shamed those that sent me. It was my just grief, that the necessity of my health, yea of my life, called me off immaturely; but since either death or departure must be yielded to, others shall judge whether I went away more laden with infirmity, than (however unworthy) with approbation.'

(1) Joseph Hall, in his Apology for the Honour of the married Clergy, pag. 646, Edit. 1621.

[B] He was so great a lover of study, that he earnestly wished . . . that his health would have allowed him to do it even to excess. This circumstance of his life is to be found in one of his letters. 'Fear not my immoderate study, says he, writing to a friend (2), I have a body that controuls me enough in these courses, my friends need not. There is nothing whereof I could sooner surfeit, if I durst neglect my body to satisfy my mind: but while I affect knowledge, my weakness checks me, and says: Better a little learning, than no health. I yield, and patiently abide my self, debarred of my chosen felicity.' How happy are they who with souls so fond of study, have bodies able to support themselves under this earnest and continual application of mind! Joseph Hall, not being of this happy number, acted as wise men ought on such an occasion: he curbed his inclination, whenever his body warned him, that his health required that he should do so. They who would force nature, and continue poring on their books, even after they find that study too much heats their blood, or exhausts their spirits, depart too far from the maxim, that life doth not consist in living, but in enjoying health.

(3) Martial, Epigr. lxx, lib. vi.

From our account of life if we cut off
What pain, diseases, and the spleen have marr'd, We'll find we were only infants, tho' old men we seem:
Priam's and Nestor's years will seem but few,
For only then we live when we are happy.

And if zeal for the service of the public encourage them to neglect their health, it must be a mistaken zeal: for they might be more useful to the Republic of Letters, by sparing than by overtraining themselves. A man makes greater progress by doing a little every day, than by applying so close for some weeks in an oblique manner, so as to occasion infirmities of a long continuance. Happy, I say once more, is he who has strength to study fourteen or fifteen hours a day, without being ever sick. An infinite number of men of letters are deprived of this happiness; some few, pauci quos æquus amavit Jupiter, are blest with it:

I shall only transcribe one passage out of them; and it shall be such that it will show he bore a great hatred to the Jesuits; and observe, that I take it from a letter which contains Joseph Hall's observations in his journey through the Spanish Netherlands in 1610. The relations of travellers ordinarily show us what is their prevailing taste, whether they are antiquaries, physicians, geographers, engineers, religious, or bigots, &c. this of Joseph Hall breathes nothing but controversy. And accordingly he owns that his design was only to relate what he had observed as a divine (6): but to return to our purpose, let us quote what we have promised. 'Along our way, how many churches saw we demolished, nothing left but rude heaps to tell the passenger, there hath been both devotion and hostility. Oh the miserable footsteps of war, besides bloodshed, ruin, and desolation! Fury hath done that there, which covetousness and ambition with us would do, but shall not: the truth within shall save the walls without. And, to speak truly (whatever the vulgar exclaim) idolatry pulled down those walls (7), not rage. If there had been no Hollander, to raze them, they should have fallen alone, rather than hide so much impiety under their guilty roof. These are spectacles, not so much of cruelty as justice; cruelty of man, justice of God. But (which I wondered at) churches fall, and Jesuits colleges rise every where. There is no city where these are not rearing or built. Whence cometh this? Is it for that devotion, is not so necessary as policy? Those men (as we say of the fox) fare best when they are most cursed. None so much spited of their own; none so hated of all; none so opposed of by ours: and yet these ill weeds grow. Whosoever lives long, will see them feared of their own, which now hate them, shall see these seven lean kine devour all the fat beasts that feed on the meadows of Tyber. I prophesy as Pharaoh dreamed. The event shall justify my confidence (8). This prophecy has not as yet had its accomplishment: the power of the Jesuits is much increased since that time, in spite of all the efforts of their adversaries; but these last are still very formidable, and give them a great deal to do. They who read the treatise of Joseph Hall, intitled, No Peace with Rome, will be convinced of his zeal against Popery. Jaquemot's French version of it, was printed at Geneva, in 1629, in 12mo. See likewise his Serious Dissuasive from Popery, to W. D. revolted, &c (9).

[D] . . . neither was he more favourable to those, who separated from the stock. . . . What he said of Arminius is a proof of this. The first epistle of the third Decade was written to Mr Smith and Mr Rob. Heads of the late separation at Amsterdam. He represents to them in very strong terms (10), that they could not do a greater injury to their mother, the church of England, than to fly from her, that say she were corrupted yet she was still their mother, which ought to be cause enough for them to lament her, to pray for her, to labour for her redress, and not to avoid her. This unnaturalness is shameful. They alledged the command, go out of Babylon (11); but he answered them that the church from which they had separated, was gone out of it. 'Babylon, continues he (12), feels it herself, and sees that she is abandoned, and complains to all the world, that we have not only forsaken, but spoiled her; . . . and except you will be willingly blind, you may see the heaps of her altars, the ashes of her idols, the ruins of her monuments, the condemnation of her errors, and the revenge of her abominations. . . . Where are the main buildings of that accursed city? . . . Where are those rotten heaps (rotten, not through age, but by corruption) of transubstantiating of bread, adoring of images, multitude of sacraments, power of indulgences, necessity of confessions, profit of pilgrimages, constrained and approved ignorance, unknown devotions; where are those deep vaults (if not mines) of penances, and purgatories, of ceremonies the church of England, tarried still in the suburbs of Babylon (14). He answers, amongst other things, that by this manner of arguing, they would find Babylon every where. Would you run from Geneva, asks he (15), because of her wafers (16)? . . .

* Compare the place you have left, with that you have * chosen, let not fear of seeming to repent over-foon, * make you partial. Lo there a common harbour of all
* opinions, of all heresies; if not a mixture. Here you * drew in the clear and free air of the Gospel, without * that odious composition of Judaisme, Arrianisme, Ana-
* baptisme: there you live in the flesh of these and * more. You are unworthy of pity, if you will approve * your misery. Say, if you can, that the church of * England (if she were not your's) is not an heaven, * to Amsterdam (17). . . . Who gains by this * sequestration, but Rome and Hell? How do they in-
* fult in this advantage, that our mothers own chil* dren condemn her for unclean, that we are daily
* weakened by our divisions, that the rude multitude * hath so palpable a motive to distrust us? . . . The * God of heaven open your eyes, that you may see
* the injustice of that zeal, which hath transported
* you, . . . otherwise your souls shall find too late,
* that it had been a thousand times better to swallow
* a ceremony, than to rend a church: yea, that even
* whoredoms and murders shall abide an easier answer * than separation (18).

To all this we may add the reasons which he gives in the fifth letter of the VI Decade (19), and the praises he bestows on the memory of Junius, in an other letter (20). It is in a letter wherein he deprecates the divisions among the Leyden divines, and wherein he pathetically describes the miseries which the church suffers by these kind of civil wars. Here follows the exhortation which he addresseth to the professor who gave occasion to these divisions. * If I might chal* lenge ought in that your acute and learned Armi-
* nius; I would thus sollicit and conjure him; alas, * that so wise a man should not know the worth of * peace; that so noble a son of the church should not * be brought to light, without ripping the womb of * his mother! What mean these subtle novelties? If
* they make thee famous, and the church miserable,
* who shall gain by them? Is singularity so precious,
* that it should cost no less, than the safety and quiet
* of our common mother? If it be truth thou affectest;
* what alone? Could never any eyes (till thine) be * blessed with this object? Where hath that sacred
* verity hid herself thus long from all her careful in-
* quisitors, that she now first shows her head to thee, * unsought? Hath the Gospel shone thus long, and
* bright, and left some corners unseen? Away with
* all new truths; fair and plausible they may be,
* sound they cannot: some may admire thee for them;
* none shall bless thee. But grant that some of these * are no less true than nice points; what do these un* reasonable crotchets, and quavers trouble the harmo* nious plain songs of our peace? Some quiet error
* may be better than some unruly truth. Who binds us * to speak all we think? So the church may be still, * would God thou wert wise alone. Did not our
* adversaries quarrel enough before at our quarrels?
* Were they not rich enough with our spoils? By the
* dear name of our common parents, what meanest
* thou Arminius? Whether tend these new raised dis-* sentions? Who shall thrive by them, but they which * insult upon us, and rise by the fall of truth? Who * shall be undone, but thy bretheren? By that most * precious and bloody ransom of our Saviour, and by
* that awful appearance we shall once make before * the glorious tribunal of the Son of God, remem* ber thy self, and the poor distracted limbs of the * church, let not those excellent parts wherewith God
* has furnished thee, lie in the narrow way, and cause
* any weak one either to fall, or stumble or err.
* For God's sake, either say nothing or the same.

* How many great wits have sought no by-paths,
* and now are happy with their fellows! Let it be * no disparagement to go with many to heaven. What * could he reply to so plain a charge (21). We (21) Ibid. pag. must not forget that he insinuates that the adversaries of Arminius belittled themselves too much. Neither Gomar, adds he (22), nor your other grave fraternity of reverend divines, have been silent in so main a cause. I fear rather too much noise in any of these tumults: there may too many contend, not intreat, multitude of suiters is commonly powerful; how much more in just motions? . . . Wisdom and charity could teach us to avoid the prejudice of differences. If we bad but these two virtues, quarrels should not hurt us, nor the church by us: but (alas!) self-love is too strong for both these: this alone opens the flood-gates of dissension, and drowns the sweet, but low, valley of the church. Men esteem of opinions, because their own; and will have truth serve, not govern. What they have undertaken, must be true: victory is sought for, not satisfaction; victory of the author, not of the cause.
He is a rare man that knows to yield as well as to argue (23). These are excellent thoughts, and make (23) Ibid.

a fine supplement to my articles of Arminius and Gomarus (24). Observe that the sermon, which Joseph Hall preached before the synod of Dort, turned chiefly on this maxim, that we ought not to affect subtilties in matters of religion. He maintained that the Remonstrants by their too great desire of subtilizing, had been the cause of the disorders which at that time embroiled the church (25).

The letter which he wrote to a man very unsettled in religion, will convince us of his earnest defire of seeing perfect concord reign in the church.
You are, says he to him (26), to day in the tents of the Romanists, to morrow in ours, the next day between both, against both. Our adversaries think you curs, we theirs. . . . What binds you? is it our divisions? I see you shake your head at this, and by your silent gesture betrays this the cause of your dislike: would GOD I could either deny this with truth, or amend it with tears: but I grant it with no less sorrow, than you with offence. This earth hath nothing more lamentable, than the civil jars of one faith (27). He goes on to answer the pretext, which some take from these divisions to join with no party; and maintains that not only no communities, is exempt from divisions, but likewise that every particular person is exposed to them. Show me that church which hath not complained of distraction; yea that family, yea that fraternity, yea that man, that always agrees with himself: See if the spouse of CHRIST in that heavenly marriage-song, do not call him a young Hart in the mountains of division. Tell me then whither will you go for truth? if you will own no truth but where there is no division? To Rome perhaps famous for unity, famous for peace. See now how happily you have chosen, how well you have sped. Lo then, cardinal Bellarmine himself, a witness above exception, under his own hand acknowledgeth to the world, and reckons up 237 con-trarieties of doctrine among the Romish divines (28)
* If our church displease you for differences, con* tinues he (29), theirs much more, unless you will * be either wilfully incredulous, or wilfully partial:
* unless you dislike a mischief the less for the secrecy
* (30). What will you do then? Will you be a church * alone? Alas, how full of contradictions are you to your * self! how full of contrary purposes! how often do you
* chide with yourself! how often do you fight with * yourself?

Let us observe, by the by, that what he here says of Bellarmine, was disputed: an English priest pretended that it was a shameless assertion (31). Joseph Hall among other things answered (32), that he had reckoned the 237 contrarieties, according to Pappus's enumeration, and that his Peace of Rome, makes up 103. This Peace of Rome is a book of Joseph Hall.
One might have put this question to him: If you had found the enumeration of Pappus just, why do you in this book content your self with objecting 103 contrarieties? and if you found it not just, why do you in your letter object 237 disputes?

ficator Dury.] He, in the year 1634, published the troverlies, he wrote concerning the vow of celibacy [F]; and when he was informed that Marcus Antonius de Dominis designed to return from England into Italy; he wrote a letter to him representing the necessity of remaining separate from the communion of the church of Rome. This letter has been inserted at large in the answer of Marcus Antonius de Dominis (c). His Miscellaneous Epistles are very good: they are without date; but being dedicated to prince Henry (d), eldest son to king James I, we may conclude that they were wrote before the year 1613. He observes, in his epistle dedicatory, that it was not as yet usual in England, to publish discourses in form of letters, advices of some French divines, and of three English bishops, concerning the way to reconcile Protestants. Our Joseph Hall was one of these three bishops. Davenant and Morton were the other two. The Iranicorum Tractatum Prodromus, published by Dury, in 1662, contains two pieces of Joseph Hall. The one is intitled, Columba Noë olivam adferens iustitissimæ Christi Arce, præsertim adversus machinationes Pontificiorum. It is a sermon which he preached before a synod at London. The other is intitled Pax terris, continens varia ad concordiam inter Christianos hoc tempore suadendam Consilia & Argumenta.

[F] Among other controversies he wrote concerning the vow of celibacy. The third letter of the second decad, is intitled an Apologetical Discourse of the Marriage of Ecclesiastical Persons. It cost the author only three hours, and three leaves of paper (33). It consists of twenty three pages in 12mo, in the French translation of Jaquemot. Twelve years after, an English priest answered it, in a piece of 380 pages (34). Joseph Hall very quickly replied in a book which he intitled, the Honour of the married Clergy, maintained against the malicious challenges of C.E. Masi-priest. He published it in English in 1620. The French version by Jaquemot, was printed at Geneva in 1665, and contains 362 pages in 12mo. The author was glad to show his diligence, that his self-conceited adversary and his seduced abettors, might see how little a well ordered marriage is guilty of deadening our spirits, or slackening our hands (35). Notwithstanding he was married he began this reply, and wrote it twice over with his own hand, in a very short time; tho' he made it only the recreation of the weightier business of his calling, which then more than ordinarily urged him. (36). This gives us ground to conjecture, that the English priest, had made use of the common argument, that marriage diverts too much from study (37). Some expressions had escaped bishop Hall, which seemed to import, that continence was a thing impossible; he was a little embarrassed with the consequences which his adversary drew from that assertion. Here follows one of the objections of the English priest (38). Mr Hall was absent in France; flesh is frail, temptations frequent, yet both then and before his marriage, he would take it in great scorn, to be suspected for dishonest. If Mr Hall could for so long time together, live a chaste life, why no more? he answered that this conclusion was not good, and compares it to these following. A good swimmer may hold his breath under the water for some minutes, why not for an hour? why not for more? a devout Papist may fast after his breakfast, till his dinner in the afternoon, therefore why not a week? why not a month, why not as long as Eve the maid of Meurs (39)? after this, he, amongst other things, answers that St Paul* having allowed the married to separate with consent for a time, that they might give themselves to fasting and prayer, commands them to come together again, that satan tempt them not for their incontinency. Which supposeth, that tho' a person may contain for some days, it doth not hence follow, that he can do so for his whole life. Where there is an impossibility, objected they to Hall, (40) or a necessity, there is no sin, no counsel, as no man sins in not making new stars, in not doing miracles. He answered (41) that this is a stale shift, that oft founded in the ears of Austin and Prosper from their Pelagians. It is objected likewise to him (42) that the father cannot blame his child for incontinence to contain, implies impossibility: to provide an husband or a wife (43) is not a work of an hour's warning; in the mean time what shall they do? Certainly, answers he (44) the man thinks of those hot regions of his religion, where they are so sharp set, that they must have videtur agere de equis admissariis ruentibus in venenem, & de bippemane, non de hominibus ratione præditis. He speaks as if he had to do with stallions, not with men, not with Christians, amongst whom is to be supposed a decent order, and due regard of seasonableness, and expediency. Lastly, they object the case of divorce to him: the husband and wife are separated upon discord, or disease: what shall they do? to live continent with this man is impossible, I answer; if only their will sunders them, that must yield to necessity. Dissention may not abridge them of the necessary remedy of sin: if necessity, that finds relief in their prayers; if they call on him who calls them to continency by this hand of his, he will bear them, and enable them to persist, and why not then in the necessity of our vows? this is a necessity of our own making; and that of his; he hath bound himself, to keep his own promises, not ours (45).

Whoever will impartially examine these answers of Mr Hall, will find them but weak. He fails in the same manner as a general, who having engaged himself too far in the enemy's country, cannot make a retreat without the loss of his rear. A clergyman, who will own that continence is beyond the power of man, and who shall give this as the reason why he married, will give great reason to suspect his conduct in the time that preceded his marriage, a time when he was still younger than when he took a wife. For if to justify himself as to that time, he shall say, that he was not then in love; but that at last, a certain woman having touched him by certain sympathies, which are to be found in nature, and by certain machinal proportions betwixt the objects and the faculties (46); he found himself deprived of the power of containing himself, which he before enjoyed; if I say he should make use of such an apology, he would expose himself to very ticklish and embarrassing questions. How have you behaved, might one ask him, since that fatal occasion, in which you fell in love? you have been employed five or six months, perhaps a year, in courting the beloved object, and in settling the marriage articles with her parents, your love deprived you of continence, you must needs then have fallen into irregularities. But what would you have done, if a married woman had struck you by these sympathies, or proportions, of which you talk? would you have been able to contain? if so, then love and continence are not incompatible, and so you fall into a contradiction. If you should not have been able to contain, you must have fallen either into real or mental adultery. Suppose after your marriage, your maid, who possibly may be younger and handomer than your spouse, shall be placed with regard to you in these machinal proportions, you presently fall in love with her, and consequently you are not able to contain. The same thing will happen, if a married woman find herself in these proportions; and so one cannot depend upon your virtue: one must be daily afraid that your conduct will give scandal, or at least consider you as a person, whose virtue rests on a weak foundation. It is certain, that a man, whose profession obliges him not only to a good life, but to pass for chaste, cannot handomely own that he married because he found it impossible for him to contain. He ought to say, that he could have contained, and that he married only that he might have children, domestic society, a faithful friend, &c. Let us therefore conclude, that the controversy concerning celibacy, cannot be well handled, if we do not take care not to expose ourselves too much to the cannon of the enemy. Mr Hall is much more successful when he comes to prove the bad effects of monastic vows: he doth not want a abundance of citations. Here follows one (47). Do not our histories tell us, that in the reign of Henry III, Robert Grosthead, the famous bishop of Lincoln,

In the catalogue of the Bodleian library: there is a book ascribed to him, intituled Mundus alter & idem [G], five Terra australis antebac semper incognita, longis itineribus peregrini Academici nuperrimè lustrata, Autore MERCURIO BRITANNICO. For the rest, it is not only among Protestants that continence has been thought impossible: some Roman Catholics have been of the same opinion; for they laughed at the Ecclesiastics who abstained from adultery and fornication, and reckoned them either eunuchs or Sodomites, and there have been parishes which obliged their priests to keep a concubine: without that precaution, they did not think the honour of their wives secure, and that even that did not free them altogether from danger. Nicholas de Clemangis tells us these things. Taceo de fornicationibus & adulteriis (Clericorum) a quibus qui alieni sunt, probo ceteris ac ludibrio esse solent, spadonesque aut Sodomites appellantur, denique Laici usque adeo perjurum habent nullo Caelibis esse ut in plerisque parochiis non aliter velint Præbiterum tolerare, nisi Concubinam habeat, quo vel sic suis sit consulum uxoris, quæ nec sic quidem usque quaque sunt extra periculum (48).

* The World differed yet the same.

[G] There is a book intituled Mundus alter & idem * ascribed to him. It is a learned and ingenious fiction, wherein he describes the vicious manners of several nations, the drunkenness of one, the lewdness of others &c; and the court of Rome is not spared here. The author composed this book while he studied human learning; and afterwards having applied himself to divinity, he neglected it as a trifle. But his friend William Knight, did not consider it as such, he thought it so deserving of seeing the light, that he published it, tho' by so doing he was afraid that he should incur the displeasure of the author, who had entrusted him with the manuscript. This he tells us at large in the preface. I do not know in what year he published it. I have only the Utrecht edition of 1643 in 12mo, to which is joined, because of the conformity of the matter, Campanella's city of the Sun, and the new Atlantis of chancellor Bacon. This work of Joseph Hall is divided into four books, and adorned ed with maps, it contains 213 pages in this Utrecht edition. The reader probably will be glad to see the opinion of Mr Naudé concerning it. After having mentioned More's Utopia, and the City of the Sun. He speaks of it as follows. 'Ultimum verò Angli, nescio ejus, Mundus Alter & Idem, non ita dudum prodit: aut verius Satyra adversus depravatos præfentis seculi mores; in quo dum singulas nationes singulis vitiis assignat, gentesque illas incolentes ac loca ipsa, contorticolatis ingeniose, fideisque ex cuiusque rei natura vocibus appellat, non ineptè meo iudicio Poneropolim instituit, quæ ad hilaritatem non minus homines excitare, quam ad virtutem inflammare possit (49). — And last of all, the Mundus Alter & Idem, of a certain Englishman, was not long since published; or rather, a satire against the corrupt manners of the present age; in which, table he assigns separate stations to the several vices, and distinguishes the nations inhabiting them, and the places themselves by names ingeniously compounded and feigned, suitably to the nature of every thing, be, in my opinion, founds a Poneropolis †, which will no less divert the readers, than inflame their minds with the love of virtue.

[H] He did not approve of English gentlemen travelling in foreign countries, and composed a book on that subject, which he dedicated to the nobility. This book is intituled Quod vadis? or a Just Censure of Travel, as it is commonly undertaken by the gentlemen of our nation. It is dedicated to Edward lord Denny, baron of Waltham, father to the lord Hay, who had been ambassador in France, and who, amongst other attendants there, had our Joseph Hall. Much may be said on both sides on this subject. Our author is not the only person who has complained of the bad effects of travelling. Thomas Lanfius (50) has sometimes declaimed on this subject. Justus Lipsius on the contrary approves of travelling (51); and has given very good instructions concerning it. See the XXII letter of the first century.

HALL (RICHARD), an English divine of the Romish communion, was, if I am not mistaken, one of those who left England on account of the penal laws enacted there against the Papists by queen Elizabeth. He retired to the Spanish Netherlands, and was professor of divinity at Douay, and canon of St Omer. He published, amongst other things [A], a discourse concerning the origin of the troubles of that country. He was not qualified to handle this subject; for on the one hand his gratitude to the king of Spain, under whose protection he lived, and on the other, his resentment on the account of his exile which soured him against all Protestants, hindered him from judging equitably of the conduct of the provinces which revolted from Philip II. Accordingly, it is certain that he discovered a great deal of passion in this book [B]. He died in the year 1604 (a).

(a) Witte, in Dias. Biograph.

[A] He published several books. Here follows a catalogue of all his writings which have come to my knowledge, the preface to a book of Joannes Joannus de Schismate seu Ecclesiasticæ Unionis divisione, printed at Louvain, in 1573, in 8vo: De tribus primariis causis Tumultuum Belgicorum, & contra coalitionem multarum Religionum, quam liberam Religionem vocant, at Douay, in 1581, in 8vo. Pro Defensione Regiæ & Episcopalis auctoritates contra rebelles, ibid. in 1584, in 8vo. De quinque partita conscientia libri tres, ibid. 1598, in 8vo. De Proprietate & Vestitio Monachorum, aliisque ad hoc vitium extirpandum necessariis, ibid. 1585, in 8vo.

[B] He discovered a great deal of passion in that work. Especially against the prince of Orange; for he employs whole chapters to prove that he is a tyrant; that he, like Abolom, aspired to the kingdom by tyrannical means; that he had all the ten qualities which, according to Bartolus, form the character of a tyrant, &c. He compares him to Julian the apostate, and omitted no sort of invectives against this prince and his adherents (1), and to animate the Catholics against granting a liberty of conscience, which the Protestants sought for (2). A man who had so many personal reasons to be partial to the king of Spain, and soured against Holland, ought not to pretend to write concerning the causes of this civil war. An historian ought to be perfectly disinterested; and whenever a man conceives a resentment against a nation, he ought to abstain from writing its history, especially when, by indulging his partiality, he will give great satisfaction to another nation, for which he ought to have complaisance and gratitude. Such a man, I say, ought to exclude himself, as judges, who are men of honour, do when they are interested in any cause (3). (3) See what I History ought not to be handled but by clean hands, have said, we should leave the writing it to those who have not embroiled their hands in the combat, neither in the figurative nor proper sense; at least they ought to stay till time has cleansed their spots and healed their wounds. It ought to be revered like the Penates of MÆVUS the ancients.

HALLÉ (PETER), professor of canon-law in the university of Paris, was born at Bayeux in Normandy, the eighth of September, 1611. He studied philosophy, law, and divinity, in the university of Caen for five years. We must add, that he there also very studiously cultivated poetry, in which Antony Hallé his relation, and one of the great poets of his age, gave him good instructions. He had insinuated himself into his favour, by publishing some poems; and he made so good use of this illustrious kinsman's lessons, that he carried the prize at Caen and Rouen, in the poetical contests which are celebrated there every year (a). He got such a reputation by it, that though he was very young, he had the rhetoric class given him in the university of Caen. Some time after, being rector of the university, he harangued Mr Seguier, chancellor of France [A], at the head of the four faculties. His speech was highly approved, and procured him the esteem and protection of that chancellor, so far as to receive from his hand the degree of doctor of the civil-law, in presence of the great council, the eighteenth of March 1640, have first defended some theses in that illustrious assembly (b). He followed Mr Seguier to Paris, and made himself so advantageously known by some pieces, which he published, that he was offered the place of teacher in five several colleges, and was extraordinarily admitted into the body of the university (c), the fourteenth of August 1651. He chose rather to teach in the college of Harcourt than in any other; where he had a great croud of auditors. He published from time to time some Latin poems which increased his reputation, and gave occasion to his patron to procure him the place of poet to his majesty, and reader in Latin and Greek in the royal college the eighteenth of December 1646. His too violent application to study having ruined his health, he was forced to rest two years to re-establish it; when he was recovered he resolved to restore the Faculty of Law to some credit, which was fallen to a very low ebb, having but one professor remaining in it [B]. He was made Regius professor of the canon-law in 1655, and he used all his endeavours to raise and encourage the study of this science, the rights whereof he strenuously supported [C], notwithstanding the oppositions he met with. It is to him, especially, we ought to ascribe the advantage the professors of Paris have enjoyed since the year 1679 [D]. He composed some very good books [E], and had the satisfaction to have the most famous learned men

Thus speaks Mr Pinsson-des-Riolles in an inscription which he published in honour of our Hallé.

[C] He strenuously supported the rights of this Faculty.] Mr Pinsson immediately adds: Quam quidem posse restitui, exornari, ac amplificari magis ac magis . . . procuravit. The author of the elogy descends to particulars, and says that Hallé obtained, by his solicitations, that Pompon de Believre first president in the parliament of Paris, should restore to the students of the canon-law, the privilege of pleading (2). Hence arose many suits. Hinc obortæ lites: vicina Juris

Collegia in eos acriter insurrexerunt, & eos tum ad Senatum, tum ad Regis consistorium traduxerunt. Ut tot malis succurreret Hallæus, viginti quatuor viros pietate & doctrinâ commendatissimos, tanquam adjuutores, in facultatem, re cum suis Collegis prius communicata, adscivit: facultate vix ab externo hoste quietâ, nonnulli ex Doctoribus honorariis, Collegarum discordias in suum commodum alentes, plurimam Antecessorum Jura sibi arrogare tentabant. In hac temporum difficultate quâ facultas in partes scindi videbatur animum tantisper sustinuit, donec illâ invidiæ tempestate feliciter pacatâ, & concordia facultati restituta, animum à negotio omni alieno revocans, sedulo summaque diligentia ad restauranda Juris studia totus incubuit (3). Hence arose some disputes. The neighbouring colleges of the law vigorously opposed them, and summoned them, both before the parliament and the king's council. Mr Hallé, to prevent so many disputes with which they were threatened, with the consent of his colleagues, admitted twenty four men of eminent learning and piety into the Faculty, as coadjutors: the Faculty were scarce at rest from these attacks from abroad, when some of the honorary doctors, cherishing the discord of their colleagues for their own private ends, arrogated several of the privileges of the teaching professors to themselves. In these troublesome times, when the Faculty seemed to be quite divided, he was for some time at a stand, but these storms being blown over, and peace restored to the society, he laid aside all avocations, and applied himself with the utmost diligence to the restoring of the study of the law.

[D] The advantages which the Paris professors have enjoyed since the year 1679, are owing to him.] Before that they did not teach the civil-law. Ab eo præcipue docendi rectam rationem inchoatam à Rege probatam & confirmatam fuisse affirmaverim. Scdus enim latius efflorescentibus ab invidiosissimo Rege Ludovico Magno, promovente illustrissimo viro Michæle le Tellier Franciæ Cancellario, publica civilis Jurisprudentiæ professio Parisiensi scholæ, quâ superioris sæculi male exciderat, restituta est, & asserta Antecessoribus Juris Civilis interpretandi autoritas mense Aprilis 1679 (4). — I may with justice affirm, that the right method of teaching was introduced by him, and approved of and confirmed by his majesty. For good letters spreading more and more, the king, by the advice of Michael le Tellier, chancellor of France, restored the profession of the law in the schools of Paris, which had unluckily dropt in the preceding age, and confirmed the power of interpreting the civil-law to the doctors, in April 1679.

Coæval oaks uplift their airy head;
And, when they yield to death's all-powerful sway,
The sympathetic branches feel decay,
And nymphs and trees together die away.

Statius makes mention of a wood that had out-lived the Nymphs and Fauni: but this does not contradict the tradition concerning the Hamadryades. Besides, who knows not that this poet's fables had no respect for any thing; therefore there is no reason to attend to them, as to things which can be opposed to the general opinion. You will see his words in the remark [D]. Ausonius, more remote than he from the fountain-head, has notwithstanding conformed more to the old tradition. Non sine Hamadryadis fato, says he (7), cadit arborea trabis.

Note, that Pausanias expresses himself in a manner that seems to prove that the Hamadryades were younger than their trees. Speaking of a town called Tithorea, he says (8), Τιθορέαν δὲ, οἱ ἐπιχώριοι κληθῆναι φασὶν ἀπὸ Τιθορέας νύμφης, οἱ αὖ τῷ ἀρχαίῳ λόγῳ τῶν ποιντῶν ἐφύοντο ἀπὸ τε ἀλλων δένδρων, καὶ μάλιστα ἀπὸ τῶν δρυῶν. Tithoream incolæ vocatam esse dicunt à Tithorea Nympha, de iis una quas prisci poetarum sermones, quum ex cæteris arboribus, tum verò de quercubus maxime genitas prodiderunt. — The inhabitants say, that it was called Tithorea, from a nymph of that name, and of that kind which the poets say proceed from trees, and especially from oaks. This is making the trees the mothers of the Hamadryades: and therefore it is not true that they were born at the same time. But I do not think Pausanias's expressions are to be much insisted on: it was not his business precisely to describe the nature of these old fables. Let us stick therefore to what the poets affirm, that these nymphs and trees were born at the same time. Observe that Pausanias takes notice that they were especially born of the oak. I do not see that this can be impugned by Phereclus's authority; for what he says does not seem to concern the Hamadryades, properly so called. He says (9) that the fig-tree was called συκή, from a daughter of Oxyllus; and that this Oxyllus having lain with Hamadryade, his sister, begot eight daughters, which were all called nymphs Hamadryades; but they had each a particular name, which was afterwards given to trees. She that was called συκή, Syce, and gave origin to the name of the fig-tree: It seems to me that Hamadryade, Oxyllus's sister, was not of the same kind with the nymphs spoken of in this article. Let this be said without offending a famous author (10).

[B] It is said they were sometimes extremely grateful to those who preserved them from death. One Rhæcus perceiving that an oak was ready to fall, commanded his children to prevent it, either by strengthening it at the root with earth, or underpropping it. The nymph who must have perished if the oak had fallen, appeared to Rhæcus, and thanked him for saving her life, offering him any recompence he desired; he answered he desired to enjoy her. The nymph promised to grant his request, and commanded him to abstain from all other women; she added that a bee should be the messenger betwixt them: but the bee happening to come whilst Rhæcus was playing, he said some rude things, which provoked the Hamadryade so much, that he was maimed for it (11). This is the account of Charon of Lampfacus, if we believe the scholiast of Apollonius. He told another story with a more happy conclusion: which is this, as I find it in Natalis Comes, who does not cite the author he had it from. Arcas, the son of Jupiter and Callisto, hunting in a wood, met with an Hamadryade in great danger of perishing; for the tree with which she was born, had been very much damaged in its roots by the stream of a river: she prayed Arcas to save her life; he granted her request, by turning the course of the river, and putting new earth about the tree. The nymph was not ungrateful, she granted him what we call the last favour and had two children by him; her name was Prospelea (12). We only find in Pausanias that Arcas was married to a Dryade nymph, called Erato, by whom he had three boys (13). We might conclude from this, that tho' the Hamadryades could not survive their oak, or their fir, &c. they might sometimes leave them, and if this of Lampacus consequence was doubtful, it might be confirmed by a passage of Homer, where we find that the same nymphs which had their birth and death with lost, Natalis trees, tasted the pleasures of love in caves with the Sileni.

Silenus' followers to the grotto resort,
Where Hamadryads keep their Sylvan court;
And spend, with Maia's son, the day in wanton sport.

[C] They who had no regard . . . to their intreaties . . . were punished for it. Apollonius relates that Peribœa's father drew an heavy curse on himself and his children, because he had cut down a tree which a nymph had intreated him to spare. She had lived many ages in it, we have seen above her supplication; here follows the sequel.

Αὐτὰρ ὁ τὴν γῆ
Ἀρεσδῶς ἐτμήξεν, ἀγνωρίᾳ νεότητος.
τῷ δ' ἄρα νεκρῇ νύμφῃ πόρον οἶτον ὀπίσσω

Quamobrem inuile deinde manupretium nympha Et ipsi perfolvit & generi (15).

The thoughtless youth, by cutting down the tree,
Entail'd a curse on his posterity.

[D] There was nothing that lived so long as this kind of nymphs. Ausonius tells us this in the following verses, which are a version from Hesiod's Greek.

Ter binos deciesque novem super exit in annos,
Iusta senecentum quos implet vita virorum.
Hos novies superat vivendo garrula cornix:
Et quater egreditur cornicis secula cervus.
Alipedem cervum ter vincit corvus: & illum
Multiplicat novies Phoenix, reparabilis ales.
Quam vos perpetuo decies prævertitis ævo

Tempora (16).

The life of man, compleat and full of day,
To ninety six it's lengthen'd years extends:
Nine times this term the ravenous crow exceeds:
The flag compleats four ages of the crow:
The raven thrice outlives the winged flag:
Whose life the phoenix nine times multiplies.
And you, ye long-liv'd Hamadryad nymphs,
Ten periods of the live-long phoenix see.
These bounds of life to animals are giv'n:
All farther terms the gods alone can tell.

Hesiod's poem which contained this doctrine is lost; but we may see a fragment of it, in five verses, in a tract of Plutarch. I will cite a passage out of that tract.

We shall learn from it, that some Heathens maintained the mortality of the deities of the second rank. • Hesiod is the first who clearly distinguished four kinds of reasonable natures; the gods, the dæmons, which are many in number, and good beings, the demy-gods, and men: He thinks that the dæmons themselves, after some revolutions of time, come to die; for speaking in the person of a naïd, he denotes the period of their duration.

Neuf hommes vit la corneille crierde;
Le cerf autant quatre fois vis se garde,
Le corbeau noir si longuement vieillit,
Que de trois cerfs les vies il emplit,
Et le Phenix de neuf corbeaux égale
Les jours, mais vous, progénie Royale
De Jupiter, Nymphes aux chefs plaisans, De dix Phenix vous fournissez les ans.

Nine times the croaking crow outlives a man:
Four times this space the stag continues life:
The raven black so lengthens out old age,
That of three stags he measures out the lives.
The phoenix' life that of nine ravens equals.
But you, ye royal progeny of Jove,
Ye Hamadryad nymphs, that haunt the woods,
Ten ages of the long liv'd phoenix know.

Now they that mistake the poet's meaning in the word Grecian, that is, the age of man, make this calculation of time to amount to a vast number of years; for it only signifies one year, so that the sum total amounts but to nine thousand seven hundred and twenty years, which is the age of dæmons. And there are many mathematicians, who make it shorter. Even Pindar has not made it greater, when he says, the life of nymphs is appointed equal to that of trees, and therefore they are called Hamadryades, because they are born and die with oaks (17). Plutarch deserves some censure, for not citing the verse in which Hesiod determined the duration of human life: for it was the basis of all the following calculations. I may suppose that Hesiod determined this duration, since his translator begins with laying, the age of man contained ninety six years. This period being granted, it is easy to compute the age of stags, ravens, &c. and we find that the crow lived 864 years, the stag 3456, the raven 10368, the phoenix 93312, and the Hamadryad 933120. All this is ridiculous, and Pliny has reason to reject it as fabulous. • De spatio atque longinquitate vitæ hominum, non locorum modo situs, verum exempla, ac sua cuique fors nascendi incertum fecerunt. Hesiodus, qui primus aliqua de hoc prodidit, fabulosè (ut reor) multa de hominum ævo referens, cornici novem nostras attribuit ætates, quadruplum ejus cervis, id triplicatum corvis. Et reliqua fabulosius in phoenixe, ac Nymphis (18). — Not only the situation of countries, but many examples, and every man's particular fate, make the duration and length of human life very uncertain. Hesiod, who first wrote on this subject, among other (in my opinion) fabulous relations concerning the age of man, attributes to the crow nine times the age of man, to the hart four times the age of the crow, to the raven three times the age of the hart; and adds some things still more fabulous concerning the phoenix and the nymphs.

Upon the least computation, which is making the age of man to be only one year (19), the assertion of Hesiod concerning the Hamadryades would be false: they could not live longer than trees, but there is no tree that can last 9720 years. What Pliny says of the long life of some trees (20), and others of the oak of Mamre (21), and an hundred stories of this nature, they tho' were as true as they are doubtful, make nothing against my assertion.

Note, that the poet Statius supposes, that the mortal demi-gods live not so long as trees. He mentions a wood, that had seen the re-production of it's Dryads and Fauni, which might be compared to those old castles, that have served for habitations to fathers, sons, and grandsons, &c.

He speaks somewhat differently in another place; for he supposes the tree would die, upon the decease of the Hamadryad.

Quid te, quæ mediis servata penatibus, arbor,
Tecta per & postes liquidas emergis in auras?
Quo non sub domino sacras passura bipennes?
Et nunc ignaro forsan vel lubrica Nais,
Vel non abruptos tibi demet Hamadryas annos (23).

Dost thou on the ground, by axes fell'd, to lye,
Or, sudden, with some Hamadryad, die.

For the rest, it was not hard for the Gentiles to imagine such a kind of nymphs; for they had a religious veneration for trees which they believed to be very ancient, and whose extraordinary bigness demonstrated their long life (24). It was an easy transition from hence to believe, they were the abode of some deity. They made a natural idol of them, I mean, they fancied, that without the help of consecration, which brought down the god into the statues dedicated to him, a nymph or deity dwelt in the center of these trees: the oak that Eryfichthon felled, was revered for it's bulk and great age, it was adorned as a consecrated place, it was hung with the tokens of the success of their devotions, and with the monuments of answered vows.

Is it any wonder that it was taken for the seat of an Hamadryad?

[E] The poets have sometimes taken the Hamadryades for the Naiades. This Propertius does, speaking of the nymphs who stole away Hercules's minion (26): he sometimes calls them Hamadryades, sometimes Dryades; yet they were fountain nymphs. Ovid, on the contrary, calls the nymphs whose fate depended on a tree, Naiades.

(27) Ovidius,

I shall occasionally observe, that it was still more common to confound the Hamadryades, and the Dryades reciprocally. There is in Hercules Oëteus, a scene describing the effects of Orpheus's singing. Amongst other things, it is said, that the Dryades leaving their trees ran after him.

Et quercum fugiens suam
Ad vatem properat Dryas (28).

(28) Seneca, in Herc. Oëteu, ver.
1051, pag. m.
312.

The Dryad quits her oak, and hastens to his song.

There is some probability, that the same nymphs are here meant, who were born and died with a tree, and who, properly speaking, were called Hamadryades, and not Dryades. It was not a constant tradition, that these nymphs could not depart from their trees: not confine themselves so exactly to the definitions of each species, but that they confounded them when they thought fit.

for a few moments. And therefore Seneca might suppose they left them to hear Orpheus sing. Note, that Servius was mistaken in thinking Statius spoke of the Hamadryades, in these verses of the sixth book of the Thebais.

Linquunt flentes dilecta locorum
Otia, cana Pales, Silvanusque arboris umbræ, Semideumque pecus, migrantibus adgemit illis
Silva, nec amplexæ dimittunt robora Nymphæ (29).

Pan and Sylvanus quit their lov'd retreat . . .
The feeling wood, at their departure, groans;
The nymphs embrace their oaks, and pour forth piteous moans.

It is certain, that the nymphs he speaks of, were those that were properly called Dryades, and therefore Servius is to blame, to apply the nec amplexæ dimittunt robora Nymphæ to the Hamadryades, whose character he had been giving in these words. Hamadryades cum arboribus & nascuntur & pereunt, unde plerumque, cæsa arbore, sanguis emanat (30). Barthius did not perceive this grammarian's error, though he produces a passage, that was very proper to make him sensible of it. Pulchra notatio in Commentario Antiquo, says he (31). Dimittunt. Non cum effectu intellige, dimittunt enim omnino, quamvis sero dimittant. Sed diuturnitatem manifestat amoris, non abieciisse Nymphas, nisi penitus prostratis arboribus. Sic solemus dicere: Ille modum non facit plorandi, non facit alius finem ridendi, cum diutius rideat aut fleat. Do not these words plainly shew, that Statius does not speak of the same kind of nymphs defined by Servius, and who necessarily died when their trees were cut down?

HANNO, a Carthaginian general, was employed to sail round Africa (a). He entered the ocean by the straits, which we now call the straits of Gibraltar, and discovered many countries (b). He would have continued his navigation, if provisions had not failed him. Some authors assure us that he accomplished it [A], I mean that he failed him. Some authors assure us that he accomplished it [A], I mean that he failed to the extremity of Arabia. He wrote a relation of his voyage, which was often quoted; but little credit was given to it [B]. There is some part of it still extant [C]. It is not agreed at what time he lived [D], and there is no proof that the Carthaginians

[A] He would have continued his navigation, if provisions had not failed him. Some say he accomplished it. Two passages, one of Pomponius Mela, the other of Pliny, shall be our commentary here. 'Hanno Carthaginensis exploratum missus à suis, cum per Oceanum exisset, magnam partem ejus circumvectus, non se mare sed comitatum defecisse memoratu tulerat' (1). — 'Hanno, the Carthaginian, being sent out to make discoveries, when he had taken his course by the straits into the ocean, sailed round a great part of it, and related that nothing hindered his further navigation, but want of provisions.' Let us see Pliny's words (2): 'Et Hanno, Carthaginis potentia florente, circumvectus à Gadibus ad finem Arabiæ, navigationem eam prodidit scripto. — And Hanno, when Carthage flourished, sailed round from Cadiz to the remotest parts of Arabia, and left an account of his voyage in writing.' Salmastius supposes Pliny mistaken, and that Hanno did not continue his discoveries to the Red Sea, but only to the islands called Gorgades (3). Isaac Vossius doth not much differ from him, he thinks, that the island, called at present St Anne, was the boundary of this general's navigation (4).

[B] He wrote a relation of his voyage. . . . Pliny, in other respects indulgent enough, as every body knows, could not forbear saying, that this author has vented a great many fables. 'Fuere, says he (5), & Hannonis Carthaginensis ducis commentarii, Punicis rebus florentissimis explorare ambitum Africæ jussi: quem secuti plerique à Græcis nostrisque, & alia quædam fabulosa, & urbes multas ab eo conditas ibi prodere, quarum nec memoria ulla nec vestigium extat. — There were extant likewise, the memoirs of Hanno the Carthaginian general, who when the glory of their state was at it's height, was ordered to discover the bounds of Africa: most of the Grecian and our writers, have followed him in their accounts, and besides many other fabulous stories tell us of many cities, built by him there, of which there is not the least remembrance or marks remaining.' See also Athenæus (6).

[C] There is some part of it still extant. Sigismund Gelenius had it printed in Greek, at Basil, by Frobenius, in 1533. There came out a second edition of it in the same place, in 1559, with the Latin version and some notes of Conrad Gesner: and yet Salmastius says, that this work seems to have been unknown to the Greeks. 'Scriptum illud non videtur innotuisse. Etenim si venisset in notitiam ac manus Græcorum, totam eam meridiani Oceani oram minime reliquissent intactam (7). — This piece seems to have been unknown. For if it had been known and read by the Greeks, they would never have left the whole coast of the Southern ocean unexplored.' He knew not therefore of the words of Pliny, cited in the foregoing remark, and of the passage of the book περί Σπουδαίων ἀναμνηστικόν, de auditionibus admirandis, in which Hanno is quoted. Mention is also made of it in Artemidorus the Ephesian's Epitomy. Here are instances that shew, that men of the greatest reading, and vastest memory, are sometimes ignorant of things very easy to be known. Isaac Vossius has not forgiven Salmastius this mistake (8). Nor has Father Harduin omitted it (9). Note, that they published at Leyden, in 1674, what had been published at Basil in 1559. I mean Hanno's Periplus, with Gesner's Latin version and notes, and with John Leo's Africa. But Berkellius added some remarks to it, taken from the second part of Mr Bochart's Geographia sacra. The same little piece (10) of Hanno has been published at Oxford, in 1698, by Dr Hudson, with several other writings of the same nature, in the first tome of Geographiæ veteris Scriptores Græci Minores. Mr Dodwell's dissertations prefixed to this volume, which treat amply of those ancient Greek authors, are full of learning. That concerning Hanno is not the least important. Mr Dodwell does not believe, that this Carthaginian commander wrote the Periplus that went under his name. He ascribes it to some Grecian of Sicily, a great admirer of the glory of Carthage. He believes also, that the Periplus which goes at present under Hanno's name, is very different from that which the ancients had. See the margin (11).

[D] It is not agreed at what time he lived. Pliny says, it was when the Carthaginian affairs were the most flourishing. This is indefinite: nevertheless Vossius (12) finds there a just reason to conclude, that our Hanno was neither he that Justin speaks of in the twentieth book, nor he that Pliny mentions in the sixteenth chapter of the eighth book, nor he that was the leader of a faction in Carthage, in the second Punic war (13), but he that was sent against Agathocles, as Justin informs us in the twenty second book. Hanno in the twentieth book of Justin was sent against the tyrant Dionysius: the Gauls had then taken the city of Rome (14), which they did in the 366th year from it's foundation. The same Hanno was killed some time after, with all his family, for endeavouring to make himself master of Carthage (15). I do not know but this city was in as flourishing a condition at that time, as when another Hanno was sent against Agathocles (16). He lost his life in a battle in the 443d year of Rome. I therefore see no certainty in Vossius's thought. Note, that the passage of Pliny, alledged by him, is to be understood of a Hanno, who was condemned for having had the art of taming a lion; for they were persuaded, that the liberty of their country could not be safe, in the hands of a general, who could master the cruelty of wild wild beasts. * Primus hominum leonem manu tractare ausus, & offendere manifestum, Hanno è clarissimis Penorum traditur: damnatusque illo argumento, quoniam nihil non persuasurus vir tam artificis ingenii videbatur: & male credi libertas ei, cui in tantum cessisset etiam feritas (17). — Hanno, a noble Carthaginian, is reported to have been the first, who ever had the courage to handle a lion, and show him tame. He was condemned on that account, because they believed that nothing would be too hard for a man of so much address; and that the public liberty was not safe in the hands of a man to whom the most savage natures had yielded. Vossius observes, that Plutarch has spoken of the same HANNO. Indeed, he says, that the Carthaginians banished him, because seeing him make a lion carry his baggage, they suspected he aspired to the sovereignty (18). Neither Pliny nor Plutarch say anything to denote the time this was done, and it is difficult to conceive, what reason Vossius had to imagine they speak of a Hanno different from ours. Father Hardouin is of another opinion, for he thinks that the traveller was the same that was condemned for taming a lion. He cannot offer any proof of it; and we may even conjecture that he is mistaken; for it is somewhat probable, that if this Hanno, who sailed round Afric, was the same, who tamed the lion, Pliny would have touched upon this circumstance. The surest way is to take neither side, neither denying what Vossius denied, nor affirming what Father Hardouin affirms. Note, that he supposes Pliny to affirm that Hanno was put to death (19), but it is better to give a more indefinite explication to the word damnatus, since Plutarch specifies the punishment of banishment. The following objection may be made to Vossius. Aristotle has cited Hanno in his book de admirandis auditionibus. Wherefore this Carthaginian general must have lived before Agathocles. But Vossius answers (20), that Aristotle was not the author of this book. Solinus stands us in no stead, when he says, that Xenophon of Lampfacus has cited Hanno; for besides that, it is not known at what time this Xenophon lived, we have reason to believe that Solinus deceives us. These are his words (21). * Has (Gorgades insulas) incoluerunt Gorgones monstra, & sanè usque adhuc monstrifera gens habitat. Distant à continetie bidui navigatione. Prodidit denique Xenophon Lampfacenus Hannonem Penorum regem in eas permeavisse, repertaque ibi feminas alii pernicitate, atque ex omnibus quæ apparuerant, duas captas tam hirtio atque alpero corpore, ut ad argumentum spectandæ rei duarum cutes miraculi gratia inter donaria Junonis suspenderit: quæ duravere usque in tempora excidii Carthaginensis. — These (to wit the islands called Gorgades) were inhabited by the monsters called Gorgons, and are even to this day inhabited by a monstrous people. They are distant from the continent, two days sailing. Xenophon Lampfacenus relates, that Hanno, the king of Carthage, sailed to them, and found women there as swift as birds, and that of the many which they saw, caught two which had bodies so rough and hairy, that, in memory of that expedition, he presented their skins to be hung up in the temple of Juno, which remained there till the destruction of Carthage. It is plain, that this passage is a transcript of this following. * Contra hoc quoque promontorium Gorgades insulæ narrantur Gorgonum quondam domus bidui navigatione distantes à continetie, ut tradit Xenophon Lampfacenus. Penetravit in eas Hanno Penorum imperator, prodiditque hirta feminarum corpora, viros pernicitate evasisse: duarum que Gorgonum cutes, argumenti & miraculi gratia in Junonis templo posuit, spectatas usque ad Carthaginem captam (22). — Over against this promontory, the islands of Gorgades are placed, which were formerly inhabited by the Gorgons, and are two days sailing from the continent, as Xenophon Lampfacenus relates. Hanno, the Carthaginian general, went in to them, and reported that the women there with their bodies covered hair, out-ran his men. He placed two of the Gorgons skins in the temple of Juno, as a proof of this, which were seen till the taking of Carthage. The copy differs from the original, since Pliny does not, make Xenophon say, as Solinus does, that Hanno penetrated into the Gorgades &c. Salmastius supposes, that Solinus has perplexed this to prove, that Xenophon of Lampfacus lived after Hanno. Hoc obtinere vult Solinus ut finis illi respondeat principii, & toto in cursu sibi constet. Hanno velut Xenophonte Lampfaceno. Quomodo igitur hic de illo prodere potuit (23)? I confess, this is an inexplicable riddle to me, for I cannot conceive that Solinus had any interest to shew, that Hanno preceded this Xenophon. And I can still less comprehend why, if Xenophon lived after this Carthaginian, it should be impossible for him to cite him, as Salmastius's interrogation supposes. I think it probable enough, that Solinus has reduced Pliny's two citations into one, by a spirit of confusion peculiar to him; but I would not venture to affirm, that Xenophon of Lampfacus has not said all that he ascribes to him. You will say, that if this were so, Pliny would not have cited two writers, but would have been content with Xenophon's testimony. I answer, the consequence is not just: order requires, that for those things which Hanno is known to have said himself, he should be quoted preferably to those who affirm that he has related them. Isaac Vossius is very far from his father's opinion; for instead of saying, that our Hanno lived in the time of Agathocles (24), he makes him elder than Homer and Hesiod. He was not content to make him the leader of the expedition made by the Phenicians a little after the ruin of Troy (25), he found afterwards that this would not give him antiquity enough: he therefore supposed in another work (26), that Hanno and Perseus lived in the same time. Mr Dodwell has learnedly and solidly confuted this pretension, and all the proofs brought to support it. He makes a good use of the passage of Pliny's second book, wherein it is remarked, that Himilco and Hanno undertook long voyages. Et Hanno, Carthaginis potentia florente, circumvexus à Gadibus ad finem Arabiæ, navigationem eam prodidit scripto: sicut ad externa Europæ noscenda missus eodem tempore Himilco (27). — Hanno, while Carthage flourished, sailed round from Cadiz to the remotest parts of Arabia, and left an account of that voyage in writing: at the same time, Himilco was sent to make discoveries of the remote parts of Europe. We find, that in the Carthaginian war with Agathocles, they had two generals, one called Hanno, and the other Himilco (28). We may moreover very probably suppose, that this flourishing state of the Carthaginians, mentioned by Pliny, preceded their first war with the Romans; for during this war, it is not likely they thought of discovering new countries, and it is well known they concluded this war with great loss. Wherefore these two great chronological characters of Pliny lead us to suppose, that he speaks of a Hanno that flourished in the time of Agathocles. You will find in Mr Dodwell (29) a fine collection of observations, that may convince us, that Hanno is to be placed betwixt the XCIII^d and CXXIXth Olympiad.

HARCHIUS (JODOCUS) (a) born at Mons in Hainault, lived in the XVIth century. He practised physic in the place of his birth, and published some pieces suitable to his profession (b) [A]. Afterwards he went out of his sphere, and meddled

[A] He published some pieces suitable to his profession. He printed at Liege in 1563, a book de causis contemptæ Medicinæ, concerning the causes of the contempt of physic in 8vo. His Enchiridion Pharmacorum Simplicium quæ in usu sunt, or, Manual of Simple Medicines, which are in use, is in verse, and was printed at Basil in 1573 in 8vo (1). He might therefore have been placed in the list of physicians, who wrote in verse, published by Bartholinus. He is not the only one who is wanting there.

meddled with divinity, but with very indifferent success. He wanted to find a middle way in the doctrine of the Eucharist betwixt the Roman Catholics and the Protestants, to compose their differences, but he was laughed at by both. The book which he published on this subject was answered by Theodore Beza, who affirms that it is a piece so confused, so obscure, and so destitute of method, that it is a hard matter to guess at its author's meaning [B]. We shall give a general idea of his opinion [C].

[B] Beza . . . affirms that . . . Harchius's book is so confused . . . that it is a hard matter to guess at his meaning.] The book which he composed against this author is intitled De Cæna Domini adversus Jodoci Harchii Montensis (2) dogmata, and is to be found in the third tome of his Traitéations Theologicas, from page 148, to page 186 of the Geneva edition 1582 in folio. Hospinian (3) says, that this work of Beza was printed in the year 1580, and that Jodocus Harchius's book had been printed at Basil in 1573, with this title: de Eucharistia mysterio ad sedandas Controversias in Cæna Domini Libri tres. A Treatise concerning the Mystery of the Eucharist, to compose the Differences concerning the Lord's Supper, in three books. Beza assures us, that this piece of Harchius had been printed at Worms, seven years before he read it. He adds, that he doth not know whether the place of the impression be truly marked, but that he was of opinion, that it would not be necessary to answer it, because no body could approve of such odd opinions; but that notwithstanding, having seen the contrary of what he expected, he had submitted to the opinion of his friends, who desired that he should write against this author. Licet urgentibus nonnullis ut falsissimo fane ipsius dogmati utpote quo novæ potiùs controverfiæ excitarentur, quam veteres tollerentur, refutationem opponerem, silentio potiùs ejusmodi scripta esse obruenda respondit. Nullum enim fore arbitrabar, qui tam absurdis sententiis assentiret; quæ spes cum me fefellerit, cogor amicorum precibus, quam hæc vana sint demonstrare, id est pene cum ratione, insanire. Adscribam autem primo loco ipsius Jodoci verba ex variis ejus libri paginis optima fide descripta, ut quæ sparsim, & proflus perturbate scripsit, adeo denique ἀνεξήκως & obscure, ut de industria texisse potiùs quam aperte suum dogma spectandum proposuisse videatur, melius appareant: & ne quam etiam, homini præsertim, ut audio, jam mortuo, injuriam in ipsius erratis annotandis, & refutandis, fecisse me quisquam suspicetur (4).

— Being pressed by some people to write an answer to his erroneous doctrine, by which new controversies are raised, rather than old ones composed, I answered, that such books were best neglected. For I did not imagine, that so absurd a doctrine, would find any proselytes: but having found that I was mistaken in this, I am under a necessity, in compliance with the desire of my friends, to show how ill founded it is. I shall in the first place, set down Jodocus's own words, faithfully extracted from the different parts of his book, that what he has wrote in a scattered, confused, immethodical and obscure manner, and so as one would think, be rather designed on purpose to conceal his doctrine, than to lay it down clearly, may be the better understood: and that no body may suspect that I do the gentleman, who I hear is now dead, the least injury either in quoting or confuting his errors. Observe, by the by, that Harchius was dead at the time when Beza answered him. The extracts which they give of his book, make it more intelligible than the reading of the book itself. After giving the extracts, Beza observes as follows: 'Et hæc quidem Harchius non minus obscure quam perturbatè, ut qui ab una quæstione ad alteram defiliat, & plurimis ambiguis vocibus ac formulis utatur, adeo ut mihi sæpius hæc omnia relegenda, considerata, percuratanda fuerint priusquam quid homo iste sibi vellet, intelligere & in suos locos distinctè singula referre potuerim (5).

— Thus far Harchius, but with as much obscurity as confusion, for he starts from one question to another, and makes use of so many ambiguous words and phrases, that I was frequently obliged to read him over and over, to consider and search before I could gather his meaning, and put every thing in its proper place. The Epitome of Gellner's Bibliotheca (6), mentions two other books of Harchius on theological subjects, de Causis Hæresis, proque ejus exilio & concordia Controversiarum in Religione, Hæreticorum, Pontificiorum, & pænitentium, Oratio ad Deum Patrem, at Basil 1573 in 4to. Orthodoxorum Patrum Irenæi, Cyrilli, Hilarii, Augustini, & reliquorum, de Eucharistia & Sacrificio universalis Ecclesiæ Fides, in 8vo. This last book was printed in the year 1577, as Hospinian says (7).

[C] We shall give a general idea of his opinion.] I take it from a letter of Andrew Rivetus to Milletiere July twenty nine 1641. 'Your distinctions of matter and mystery of ἀσθεντον and πεντον, sensible and intelligible, ruin all that you intend to establish, without showing how we can with the mouth of the body, eat a mystery in which there is no matter; or how after the matter of a body is gone, the substance remains; this I do not find explained in your treasure of rich conceptions. Above thirty years ago, I read something like this, in a book of a certain physician of the country of Juliers named Tarchius (8), with whose heifer it should seem you have plowed. He maintained that the body, which the church gives in the bread, is the body of the Eternal Word, which coming into the bread in a wonderful manner, changed it into the substance of that flesh, which he carried up into heaven; that it was a flesh of the same kind, with that with which the substance of our flesh is nourished. He called it, as you do, a spiritual and intelligible flesh. He said that the flesh, which is daily created in the bread and wine, and taken at the altar by the faithful, was like, as to its nature, to the flesh which CHRIST has in heaven, quickening because of the divinity, which mixeth itself with the bread in an inexpressible manner. He would have the Calvinists to acknowledge, on St Augustin's authority, that the sacraments have really in them the true flesh of CHRIST, although spiritual, which, in a particular manner, is eat by the mouth with the bread, and is in some manner, digested in the heart. That it is called the flesh of CHRIST in a mystery, tho' it be neither nervous, muscular nor animated. Upon the same foundations he wanted likewise, with you, to establish a real and propitiatory sacrifice of the body and blood of CHRIST, and the adoration of the sacrament. And tho' he pretended by this means, to be able to reconcile all the contending parties; he was neither regarded by the Papists, by the Lutherans, nor by us; no body would acknowledge his chimæras for solid truths, and his speculations vanished as your's will (9). La Milletiere having answered, that he was not acquainted with this author. Rivetus replied as follows. 'This Harchius, whom I mentioned to him, and in whose book I found whims like to his own, ought no more to be unknown to him, than the Diallaction (10), recommended by Grotius, and coupled with Milletiere's books. These are two pieces, printed together in 1576, without the name of the place, or of the Printer, tho' the first edition of Harchius's book, bears the name of the city of Worms (11). (8) This is an error of the press for Harchius. Besides, I do not know why he is here said to be of the country of Juliers, for he was of Mons in Flanders. Possibly he might have professed Physics in the country of Juliers; or it may be that Rivetus fancied that Montensis signified the duchy of Berg, which he confounded with that of Juliers, because of their neighbourhood, and their common lord.

HARDENBERG (ALBERT), a Protestant divine, minister at Bremen, in XVth century, followed the confession of Augsborg eighteen years, and afterwards declared for Calvinism with so much success, that he introduced it into that city, notwithstanding the opposition of his colleagues, and of the magistrats. He had insinuated himself himself so far into the favour of the people [A], that he made them declare for him against Lutheranism; so that the magistrates who refused to reject the confession of Augsburg, were degraded and banished. They all died in exile (a). The author who informs me of these particulars, refers his readers to a book which Dithmar Kenchellius, burgomaster of Bremen, composed during his banishment, intitled, Brevis, dilucida, ac vera Narratio, de initiis & progressu Controversiæ, Bremæ à Doctore Alberto Hardenbergio motæ, opposita recenti Scripto ejusdem Hardenbergii de Ubiquitate & Cæna Domini. Or, A short, plain, and true Account of the Rise and Progress of the Controversy set on foot at Bremen, by Doctor Albert Hardenberg, in answer to a late book of the said Hardenberg, concerning the Ubiquity and Supper of our Lord. Hardenberg did not long enjoy his triumph: he was expelled from Bremen, as a seditious Sacramentarian, by the Lutheran party, which regained the ascendant (b). He wrote the Life of Wesselus, which has been printed.

[A] He had so far insinuated himself into the favour of the people. This is the true method of bringing about a change: a preacher, supported by the people, is able to introduce all sorts of revolutions. It is said that he had rendered himself so popular, that he had not even omitted, to procure the affection of the valets and servant maids, after which he made no scruple of censuring the Burgo masters and senators, by name, in his sermons, and to lessen their authority with the people. Calvini hæresim, senatu & reliquis suis Lutherani collegis invitit, Bremam

Quod ut commodius faceret, (ut scribit Dithmarus Kenchellius, ejusdem Civitatis Consul libello contra Hardenbergium edito) in intimam populi, bospitum, plebeiorum, muliercularum, puellarum, famulorum, denique & ancillarum familiaritatem se insinuans, auram popularem captavit, adeoque ut ex publico suggestionem non modò Prædicantes Collegas joculariter irridere, sed ipsos etiam Senatores, & Consules nominatim taxare, eorumque auctoritatem apud plebem imminuere non vereretur (1).

HARPALYCE, the most beautiful young woman of Argos. Clymenus her father grew so much in love with her, that having found that all endeavours to conquer his passion, only served to increase it, he resolved on the means to satisfy it. He therefore corrupted his daughter's nurse, and, by her means, enjoyed secretly the beloved object. Some time after came the son-in-law, to whom he had promised his daughter. Immediately all things were sumptuously prepared for the wedding: the marriage was consummated: the husband departed with his bride to return home. Then Clymenus repented he had given consent to the match. His love distracted him to such a degree, that before they came to the end of their journey, he made away with his son-in-law, and brought back his daughter to Argos, where he behaved himself publicly as her husband. She at last reflected on the indignities she had suffered from her father; and to revenge herself, she killed her young brother [A], and gave him to her father to eat; after which, begging of the gods to be taken out of the world, she was changed into a bird [B]. Clymenus was so overwhelmed with these accidents, that he killed himself (a). We shall see other Harpalices in the article HARPALICUS.

(1) Hygin. cap. 206.

[A] She killed her young brother. Hyginus (1) says she killed her own son which she had by Clymenus, and he adds that she made her father eat him, who, when he knew it, killed her. In the 206th chapter of this author the word filius ought to be corrected filiam, agreeably to what he says in the 238th, and 239, and 246th chapters. Besides this difference, I find another betwixt him and Parthenius. The latter says that Harpalice's father was the son of Teleus, and that he lived at Argos: the former makes him son of Schæneus, and king of Arcadia (2). But as in the 238th chapter he makes him the son of Oeneus, we may be certain that instead of Schæneus, it ought every where to read Oeneus; for we learn from Apollodorus (3), and Antoninus Liberalis (4), that Oeneus had a son named Clymenus.

[B] She was changed into a bird. There are two great defects in the fabulous inventions of the ancient Greeks; one is, that they have not sufficiently diversified the capital incidents; the other is, that they have not been able to observe any kind of uniformity in the circumstances. You will scarce find two authors who, in treating of the same fact, agree about the qualities and names of persons, and about the times and places. If they meant by that means to display the fertility of their genius, they were mistaken; the barrenness of the principal is difficultly repaired by diversified accessories. Parthenius's Euphorion seems at first sight to give us something new: but observe it well, it is only Tereus removed to another scene with some changes of the actors.

HARPALICUS, king of the Amymnians (a) in Thrace, had a daughter named Harpalice, who was brought up with cows and mares milk [A], and whom he had accustomed betimes to handle arms. By this means he made her a good warrior, and found his account in it; for had not his daughter come to his rescue when he was assaulted and wounded by Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles [B], he had unavoidably voidably lost his life; but Harpalice charged the enemy so seasonably, that she put him to flight. Her father, whom she had so happily delivered from that foreign war (b), lost his life some time after in a civil one: His subjects deposed him, and at last killed him (c). Harpalice retired into the woods, and fell to robbing. She flew like lightning; so that when she was pursued by horsemen to recover from her the cattle she had carried off, they could not overtake her. They did not seize her but by laying nets as they do for stags. They killed her, but it cost them dear who did it: for there immediately arose a dispute in the neighbourhood, concerning the property of the cattle she had stolen. They came to blows, and left many on both sides dead upon the place. Since that time a custom was established of assembling at the tomb of the damsel, and of expiating her death with tournaments. There was an HARPALICE who was desperately in love with Iphiclus (d), and who died of grief on finding herself slighted by him. From her it was that a certain song was called Harpalice.

'Quidam hujus patrem à Getis, ut alii volunt à Mirmidonibus captum, collecta multitudine asserunt liberasse celerius, quam de fœminis credi potest (3). — Some relate that her father being taken captive by the Getæ, others say by the Mirmidons, she gathered a body of men, together and rescued him, so quickly, as is hardly credible of a woman.' I know not where Charles Stephens, followed by Lloyd and Hofman, had read that the father of our Harpalice was called Lycurgus, and that he was old when he became prisoner of the Getæ.

HARPALUS, a Grecian astronomer, corrected the cycle of Cleostratus by another cycle, which had need to be corrected [A]. It was Meton who corrected the new cycle of Harpalus, in the fourth year of the LXXXVth Olympiad (a). Cleostratus discovered the signs of the Zodiac, after Anaximander had found out, in the LVIIIth Olympiad, the obliquity of that circle (b). Judge by this of the age in which Harpalus lived. What Moreri says is not true, that Diodorus Siculus makes mention of Harpalus. There is a great confusion in Vossius upon all this [B].

[A] He corrected the cycle of Cleostratus by another cycle which had need to be corrected. Cleostratus's cycle was called Oliasteris; it contained eight years, at the end whereof he pretended the sun and moon returned to the same point. Harpalus finding that to be a mistake invented a cycle of nine years.

Ut lunæ spatium redeat, vetus Harpalus, ipsam Ociis in sedem momentaque præfixa reducit.
Illius ad numeros proluxa decennia rursus Adjecisse Meton Cecropia dicitur arte.
Infectique animis: tenuit rem Græci solers Protinus, & longos inventum mist in annos (1).*

(1) Festus Avenius in Arateia Prognosticis, pag. m. 65.

Meton finding that the cycle of nine years had succeeded no better than the rest, invented the cycle of nineteen years. This cycle was followed, as Festus Avenius observes in the verses above mentioned: It is still in vogue and called the Golden Number.

(a) De Scient. Mathemat. pag. 150, 151.

[B] There is a great confusion in Vossius upon all this. I. After he had said (2) in his thesis, that Meton published the Enneadecateris in the first year of LXXXVth olympiad, or in the year before, he says, in his commentary upon his thesis, that Diodorus Siculus speaks of this under the third year of the LXXXVth olympiad. Is not this to produce a famous evidence: against his own calculation? Is this very prudently done? This is the part of an honest man, you will say. I will own it is, provided Diodorus made use of that chronology: but it is certain that he places the cycle of nineteen years in the last year of the LXXXVth olympiad. II. He quotes Pliny, book 2. Chap 12. concerning Cleostratus, whereas he should have quoted the eighth chapter. III. He says that the Oliasteris of Cleostratus comprehended 2090, years and 22. It is plain that the Printer has confounded the numbers; but the word annorum is doubtless a mistake of the author: change then these words, introducitur oliasteris quæ erat annorum cix cix xc xxii, into these, introducitur oliasteris quæ erat dierum cix cix cxxxii: for this cycle contained 2922 Days. IV. He quotes the twelfth book of Diodorus Siculus concerning the Oliasteris. I have not found that word in it. V. This phrase, in hac oliasteride deprebensum est vitium ab Harpalo commissum, is ill expressed, as signifying quite contrary to what it ought to do. There is no reader but would believe Harpalus was deceived in making that cycle: and yet the meaning of Vossius is to let us know that Harpalus discovered the fault which the author of the cycle had committed. VI. He should not have said, that instead of the Oliasteris of Cleostratus, the Oliasteris of Harpalus was made use of: For Avenius's verses, which Vossius immediately quotes, shew plainly that the invention of Harpalus was a cycle of nine years.

HARPALUS, a Macedonian lord, and one of Alexander's captains, ruined himself by his prodigious expences (a). He took the part of Alexander, during the differences that arose betwixt that prince and his father Philip, and was disgraced on that account (b): But as soon as Philip died, Alexander recalled Harpalus, and shewed an extraordinary friendship to him; I believe that he gave him the government of Cilicia [A]. As for that of Babylon, it is most certain that he gave it him, together with the office of high-treasurer (c). Harpalus, imagining the king his master would never

[A] I believe that Alexander gave him the government of Cilicia. I ground my conjecture upon what Athenæus says (1), that Harpalus having lost his mistress, sent for another from Athens, and lodged her in the royal palace of Tarsus. There she was adored by every body, and was called queen. And all those who crowned Harpalus had orders to crown her also? This supposes that Harpalus lived at Tarsus with all sort of authority. Now Tarsus was the chief city in Cilicia (2). I do not regard the passage of Athenæus (3), where it is said that Harpalus erected a brazen statue to his mistress Glycera in Tarsus a town of Syria [ἐν Ταρσῷ] τῆς Συρίας. I doubt not but this passage is corrupted: for besides that there was not in Syria any royal or considerable town that was named Tarsus, we find in the 586th page of Athenæus, that the statue of Glycera was erected in Rossus, ἐν Ρωσσῷ. We see in the Margin of the 595th page opposite to the place of the text, where it is printed [ἐν Ταρσῷ] that other manuscripts have it ἐν Ρωσσῷ. Athenæus quotes the same author, viz. Theopompus in both these passages; which shews that the transcribers have confounded the name of the town where that statue was.

never return from his expedition to the Indies, committed infinite extortions, in order to support the excessive expences of his bed and table. He plunged himself into all sorts of pleasures, and denied nothing to his mistresses [B]. Many other governors fancying as he did, that Alexander would never be in a capacity of calling them to an account for their extortions, had been guilty of innumerable acts of injustice. The first thing Alexander did, upon his return from the Indies, was to punish very severely some of these governors. This gave grounds to Harpalus to apprehend the same treatment; so that to prevent it he fled into Greece with immense sums, which he took from the royal treasure with which he was entrusted. He levied also six thousand men, which he landed at Tænarum in the Lacedæmonian territories; from whence he went to Athens, to try to engage them in a war against Alexander (d). He gained some orators by his money (e); knowing that there is not a more powerful instrument than the tongue of this sort of men to disturb the public tranquillity, and to excite the populace to take up arms. But as he knew on the one hand what power they have over the people, he was not ignorant on the other, how great a power a good sum of money had over them. Wherefore finding himself well provided with gold and silver, he hoped to bring over the city of Athens to his interest. But he was deceived; Phocion was not to be corrupted [C]; besides, the letters of Antipater, governor of Macedonia, and those of Olympias, the mother of Alexander, kept the Athenians in respect

[B] He denied nothing to his mistresses. If any thing could ruin the conjecture I have advanced in the preceding remark, it would be the description that Diodorus Siculus has left us, of the luxury Harpalus wallowed in during Alexander's abode in the Indies. It appears from thence, that Harpalus gave himself up to the pleasures of women, and even to impurities of a more odious nature; that he ordered great quantities of fish to be brought from the Red Sea; that his ordinary expences were excessive, and besides that he sent for a famous courtesan from Athens named Pythonice; that he made her presents of an immense value; that when she died he built her a noble sepulchre; and sent for another celebrated courtesan named Glycera, from the same country, with whom he lived in so prodigal a voluptuousness as cannot be described. All this happened, according to Diodorus Siculus, whilst Harpalus was governor of Babylon; and high-treasurer, and whilst Alexander was employed in his Indian expedition. You will say I was then in the wrong to mention his government of Cilicia. It would be a strong objection, if there was not room to believe that Diodorus Siculus, after the manner of those who compose a general history, has too much huddled together particular events, and too much neglected the distinction of times. The authors, whom Athenæus quotes, are more credible than Diodorus; for they have treated particularly of the debaucheries of Harpalus. It is presumed therefore they have better described the circumstances of them than Diodorus could do, who has only spoken of Harpalus in general, and who passed over the particular incidents with the greatest haste imaginable. That is the method of a general history. But what say Athenæus's authors? Why, that after the death of Pythonice, whom Harpalus passionately loved, he sent for Glycera, and brought her to the royal palace at Tarsus, causing the people to adore her, and call her queen. Ἦν καὶ ἐλθούσα οἰκεῖν ἐν τοῖς βασιλείοις τοῖς ἐν Τάρσῳ καὶ προσκυνεῖσθαι ὑπὸ τῷ πλῆθει βασιλισσάν προσαγορευομένην. Ἀπὸ τοῦ προσηλίου ἐν ἡμέρᾳ τῇ αὐτῇ καὶ τῷ βασιλεὶ συνεβόησαν, ὥστε τὴν βασιλίσσαν ἀποκαλεῖσθαι βασίλισσαν, καὶ τὴν βασιλίσσαν ἀποκαλεῖσθαι βασίλισσαν, καὶ τὴν βασιλίσσαν ἀποκαλεῖσθαι βασίλισσαν. (4). If he had been governor of Babylon when he sent for Glycera, he had conducted her to the palace of Babylon, and it must have been at Babylon that he had ordered the honours of adoration to be paid, and the title of queen to be given to her. He did this at Tarsus, therefore he was governor of Cilicia, when Pythonice died, and when Glycera supplied her place: Therefore Diodorus is mistaken in the circumstances of time, since he supposes that Harpalus's amours with Pythonice, and afterwards with Glycera, were posterior in time to Harpalus's being made governor of Babylon, and Alexander's expedition to the Indies. Let not the sepulchre which Harpalus ordered to be built for Pythonice in Babylon (5) be objected to me; for that does not prove she died after his being preferred to the government of Babylon. I know not whether we ought to reckon amongst the instances of this governor's luxury, the care he took to have all sorts of plants brought from Greece for the ornament of the gardens, and walks of Babylon (6), for if we may believe Theophrastus (7), he did this by Alexander's order. If Scaliger had concluded from thence that Harpalus was supervisor of the royal gardens and orchards at Babylon, he could be blamed but for one thing; but he says that Plutarch ascribes that employment to Harpalus (8), he has therefore made two slips. I. He did not remember that Harpalus was governor of the province of Babylon, and that therefore the supervising of the gardens was not his principal office, but a small dependance upon his great employ. II. It is false that Plutarch says what he imputes to him.

[C] Phocion was not to be corrupted. He it was whom Harpalus aimed principally to gain. He gave to the other orators, whom he saw come over to him, but very moderate gratuities; but he offered Phocion 700 talents, and would have made him the absolute manager of his affairs. Τὸν εὐχόμενον ἀπὸ τῶ βήματος χρηματίζεσθαι δέχμενος ἦν καὶ ἀμύλλᾳ φειρομένην πρὸς αὐτὸν, τῷ τοῖς μὲν ἀπὸ πολλῶν μικρὰ δέχμενον, προσηκόντα καὶ διέδοξεν, τῷ δὲ Φωκίῳ προσέφερε δίδωμι ἐπὶ ταχέως τελευτᾶ. Concionum birudinum fuit certatim concursatio operas suas ei venditantium: modicam bis ille ex multis obtulit & objecti lesam, Phocioni vero per internuncios septingenta talenta obtulit (9). Phocion repulsed him, and let him know that he would make him repent of his intriguing, if he went on to corrupt the inhabitants. Hereupon Harpalus acted with more reserve. He found that all those mercenary tongues he had gained, opposed him openly, in order to remove all suspicions, and that Phocion who had received nothing of him, was the least his adversary. This put him upon making new attempts to gain him; but he found him impenetrable on every side. Charicles, Phocion's son-in-law, did not imitate his integrity, but rendered himself so suspected that his father-in-law refused to assist him when he saw him under prosecution for corresponding with Harpalus (10). As for Demosthenes, he used Harpalus in a most disingenuous manner; for when he had taken large sums to speak for him, and came to the bar, he appeared in the assembly with his throat muffled up, and complained he had a sore throat which deprived him of the use of speech (11). Which occasioned the jest upon him, wherein they alluded to the quincy. Οἱ δὲ εὐφυνεῖς χλευάζοντες ὅτι ὑπὸ συνάρχου ἑρπάζον ἀλλ' αὖτ' ἀργύρας ἐλάμβαναι νύκτωρ τὸν δημαγωγόν. Ibi homines faceti cavellantes non angina dixerant, sed argentum oratorem nocte correptum (12). But he did not come off only with being rallied; for his engagements with Harpalus were the cause of his banishment (13). Note that Pausanias believes him innocent (14). Harpalus, and his concubine Glycera, ordered great quantities of corn to be distributed in Athens. Which was one of the things for which he was ridiculed in a comedy that was acted on the banks of Hydaspes, which some will have Alexander himself to be the author of (15). It is observable, that after the death of Harpalus, a daughter he had by Pythonice was taken home by Phocion, and educated with all possible care both by himself and his son-in-law Charicles (16).

respect (f). This obliged Harpalus to seek another refuge [D]. He returned to Tænarum, where he had left his troops, and passed over from thence to Crete. But he was not there long before one of his friends treacherously killed him (g) [E]. The Supplement to Moreri is faulty in this particular, as I shall make appear (h). Alexander was so firmly persuaded that Harpalus was an honest man, that he caused those who brought the first news of his flight, to be put in chains as false accusers (i). The news he received, that this perfidious man was expelled from Athens and killed, made him lay aside his thoughts of returning into Europe to humble the Athenians [F]. He had employed Harpalus to send him books [G], when he saw there were none to be met with in the provinces that were remote from the country of the Greeks. The Sepulchre that Harpalus erected to one of his mistresses, was very sumptuous [H]. I do

He received orders to depart from Athens, as we learn from Plutarch (17) and Quintus Curtius (18). I believe the cause was pleaded with great solemnity: For Pollux quotes an oration of Hyperides ὑπὲρ Ἀρπάλῃ I will not take notice of Dinarchus's oration, intitled ὑπὲρ τῆ μὴ ἐκδύνασθαι Ἀρπαλον Ἀλεξάνδρῳ; because it is thought supposititious. It is however certain that that orator actually pleaded in that cause: there were five of his orations περὶ Ἀρπαλείων (19). That trial had great consequences; for after it was resolved upon in Athens, that Harpalus should depart, they informed against those who had suffered themselves to be bribed by him. If he had not found such as would be corrupted by his presents he had been delivered up to Alexander (20). One of that prince's friends (21) earnestly solicited the Athenians, that Harpalus might be given up to him, and not having obtained it, he shewed them some time after to whom it was Harpalus had given money and how much. He found that in the papers of Harpalus's steward (22).

Let us here make some critical observations upon the article of Philoxenus in Moreri's dictionary. The author of that article (23) assures us, that Philoxenus, a Macedonian captain, took Harpalus in Candia, who had robbed Alexander's exchequer, that he discovered all those to whom Harpalus had intrusted his treasure in Athens: that he sent a list of them to the magistrates, to recover the money out of their hands, and to cause them to be punished; but that he would not name Demosthenes, though he had some difference with that famous orator, preferring, on that occasion, the esteem he had for his eloquence to his own resentment. Pausanias is quoted for this. I find five faults in it. I. It is false that Philoxenus took Harpalus either in Crete or in any other place. He only took his steward who had escaped to the isle of Rhodes (24). The author I criticise, does not mention it. Let that omission be his second fault. III. Harpalus did not trust his treasure in Athens, he only distributed certain sums to gain some people to his interest. IV. The list which Philoxenus sent to the magistrates did not contain the names of the pretended trustees of this treasure, but the names of those whom Harpalus had bribed. V. Pausanias (25) does not say that Philoxenus had a desire to recover that money. VI. And so far is he from saying that this Macedonian suppressed his resentment in respect to Demosthenes's eloquence, that he manifestly supposes that orator would have appeared in Philoxenus's catalogue, if his name had been found in the papers of Harpalus's steward. Pausanias argues thus: if Demosthenes had received any bribe from Harpalus, this had been discovered, by the papers of his steward: and if it had been discovered, Philoxenus would have named him in the catalogue he sent to the Athenians: for he had particular quarrels with Demosthenes, and he knew that Alexander was to the last degree enraged against that famous orator. But he makes no mention of Demosthenes in imparting to the Athenians the names of those whom Harpalus had corrupted, and the particular sums they had received. We must therefore conclude that Demosthenes was guiltless. Who will trust after this to such dictionary-makers? Who wont rather deplore the fate of innumerable readers, who have honestly believed that Pausanias gives us here an example of a very signal generosity, a man so full of admiration for Demosthenes, his enemy, that he stifles his resentment in his behalf, when he has the most favourable opportunity of revenge. So great is the force of eloquence! Will the young declaimers cry out, who shall seek their materials in this new Polyanthea (26).

[E] One of his friends treacherously killed him.] He was called Thimbron, as Diodorus Siculus says, and he was of Lacedæmon, as Arrian inform us. He seized upon all the effects of Harpalus. Others say it was a traveller that committed this murder (27); others attribute it to Harpalus's domestic (28), others to a Macedonian, named Pausanias (29). These disagreements put one out of patience, and disgrace the historians.

[F] The news which he received that he was expelled from Athens, made Alexander lay aside his design of returning . . . to chastise the Athenians.] This we are taught by Quintus Curtius. 'His cognitis, says he, Rex Harpalo Atheniensibusque juxta infestus, classem parari jubet; Athenas protinus petiturus. Quod consilium dum agitat, clam literæ ei redduntur, Harpalum intrasse quidem Athenas, pecunia conciliasse sibi principum animos, mox consilio plebis habito, jussu urbe excedere, ad Græcos milites pervenisse, à quibus interceptum & trucidatum à quodam viatore per insidias. His Lætus in Europam trajiciendi consilium omisit (30). — Upon bearing these things, the king being equally enraged against Harpalus and the Athenians, commanded that a fleet should be made ready; intending to go to Athens without delay. While this was in agitation he received secret advice that Harpalus had indeed entered Athens, and had by presents drawn over the principal inhabitants to his party, but that an assembly of the people being held, he was ordered to leave the city, that he had gone to the Grecian soldiers, by whom he was stopped, and that he was at last slain by a certain traveller who had lain in wait for him. Being overjoyed at this, he laid aside his design of passing over into Europe.' A man must be stupid, not to perceive that there is a pretty large gap betwixt the first and second chapters of the tenth book of Quintus Curtius. For is there any historian so void of common sense, as to speak of Harpalus in the manner Quintus Curtius does in the foregoing passage, unless he had before explained, who this person was, and what enterprize he had formed? There is no need of saying more upon this. If any one is not sensible of it, he is not capable of comprehending the reasons I should alledge to prove it.

[G] Alexander employed Harpalus to send him books.] Plutarch acquaints us with this fact. Read what follows, and you will find they did not think they should displease that prince by sending him poetry. Τῶν δὲ ἄλλων βιβλίων ἐκ εὐπορῶν ἐν τοῖς ἀνατόποις, Ἀρπαλον ἐκίλευσε πικρῶς καὶ κακῶς ἐπεμψέν αὐτῷ τὰς τε φιλικὰς βίβλους, καὶ τῶν Εὐεπίδου καὶ Σοφοκλέους καὶ Αἰσχύλου τραγῳδιῶν συγχράς, καὶ Τελείου καὶ Φιλοξένου διθύραμβους. Alorum librorum quum in superioribus provinciis non esset ei facultas, mandavit Harpalo ut mitteret. Ille misit ei Philisti libros, Euripidisque & Sophoclis, & Aeschyli tragediarum magnam vim, Telestis quoque Philoxenique dithyrambos (31). — Alexander not finding any other books in the upper provinces, sent orders to Harpalus to send him some. Accordingly he sent him Philistus's writings, and a great many of the tragedies of Euripides, Sophocles, and Aeschylus, together with the dithyrambs of Telestes and Philoxenus.

[H] The sepulchre which Harpalus erected to one of his mistresses was very sumptuous.] He had been at incredible expences for Pythionice, whilst she lived, and he was not at less to bury her. The funeral was solemnized with the most magnificent symphony in the world. Whatever was fine in music, either vocal or instrumental, was brought together (32). He erected to her memory two stately monuments, one at Babylon, the other near Athens. The expence was above 200 talents. He consecrated a temple and a grove to her, do not think that a certain complaint against providence, which Cicero has preserved to us, relates to our Harpalus [I]. If I am in the right, the moral reflexions of Father Lescapier are but ill applied. There is a fault in Eusebius, which I shall take notice of [K].

her, under the name of Venus Pythonice. Ταύτης ἐτόλμουν ὁ φίλος εἶναι ὃν ἑσέων ἱερὸν καὶ τῆμεν ἰδρύσασθαι, καὶ περὶ αὐτοῦ τὸν ναὸν καὶ τὸν βωμὸν Πυθιονικῆς Ἀφροδίτης. Aulus hic est qui de amicitia tua gloriaretur, illi et lucum et templum consecrare, adaeque illam et aram Pythonicæ Veneris nuncupare (33). The tomb that he caused to be built in Attica, in the way to Eleusis, exceeded all that were near it. One would have taken it for that of one of the greatest men that Athens had produced. What surprize then must it be to strangers to understand, it was erected to a strumpet? What judgment would they pass upon the Athenians? This is Dicaearchus's reflexion (34). An author, who was well versed in these matters, assures us, that Pythonice's tomb, in the way to Eleusis, was the finest of all the ancient monuments that were to be seen in Greece. Ὅς καὶ μνημεῖον ἀποθανόντος ποιεῖται πάντων ὁπότε ἑλλήσιν εἶναι ἀρχαία, θείας μάστιγος ἀξίον. Ut mortui monumentum posuerit omnium quæ in Græcia veterum operum quod spectetur dignissimum (35). It is even true, that Harpalus's intentions were not faithfully executed. The whole sum that he appointed for it, was not laid out upon that monument. Charicles, Phocion's son-in-law, undertook the direction of that work, at the request of Harpalus, and did not lay out upon it the thirty talents deposited in his hand. He disgraced himself two ways: I. in taking upon him the direction of a monument designed for a whore; II. in appropriating to himself part of the money deposited with him. Μνημεῖον ἀπὸ χρημάτων πολλῶν ἐπιτελεῖται θελήσας περὶ ταῦτα τῷ Χαικίλῳ τὴν ἐπιμέλειαν. Ἐσάν δὲ τὴν ὑπερλίαν ταύτην, ἀγεννῆ περὶ καταρτήσιν οὐκ ἔχοντες οὐκ ἐπὶ τῷ διαμένει γὰρ ἐν τῷ ἐν Ἑρμείῳ, ἢ βαδίζοντες ἐξ ἑσέως εἰς Ἑλευσίνα, μὴδὲν ἔχον τῶν τριδκοντα ταλάντων ἀξίον, ὅσα τῷ Ἀρπάλῳ λογισθῆναι θαρσύνει εἰς τὸ ἔργον ὑπὸ τῷ Χαικίλῳ. Quum Harpalus monumentum sumptuosum locare vellet faciendum, ejus rei demandavit Chariclei curam. Hoc ministerium per se turpe sedavit insuper sepulcrum absolutum. Exstat enim et hac ætate in Hermio, qua Athenis Eleusina itur, neque in eo triginta talenta, quantum summam expensam tulisse in id opus Harpalus autumant Chariclem, comparent (36). Pausanias confessed, that he knows nothing, either of the country or family of Pythonice, but only that she exercised the trade of a courtesan at Athens and Corinth. Athenæus knew a little more of her. He says, she had been a servant of Bacchis the famous artist on the flute, and that afterwards she lifted her self under a bawd of Thrace, who lived at Ægina, and that she followed her to Athens, whither she removed her brothel house, so that Pythonice was a triple slave, and a triple prostitute; ὥς γίνεσθαι καὶ μὴ μόνον τριδκοντα, ἀλλὰ καὶ τριπλοῦρον αὐτὴν. Ut non solum ter mancipium, sed etiam ter scortum fuerit (37). [I] I do not believe that a certain complaint against providence relates to our Harpalus. The words of Cicero are these (38): 'Diogenes quidem Cynicus dicere solebat, Harpalum, qui temporibus illis prædo felix habebatur contra Deos testimonium dicere, quod in illa fortuna tam diu viveret. — Diogenes the Cynic, used to say, that Harpalus, a famous pirate in those days, did bear witness against the gods, because he lived so long blest with so much good fortune.' I am of Menage's opinion. The Harpalus of Cicero, the Scirpalus of Diogenes Laërtius (39), and the Scirtalus of Suidas (40), seem to me to be one and the same man. But the Scirpalus of Diogenes Laërtius, and the Scirtalus of Suidas, was a famous pirate, who took Diogenes the Cynic, and sold him. I therefore believe that the Harpalus of Cicero was a pirate, and not a captain of Alexander the Great. The character Cicero has given of Harpalus, by no means agrees with Alexander's captain. The Harpalus of Cicero was a famous pirate, as well known for the good luck that accompanied his piracies, as for his piracies themselves: his long prosperity was well known, as appears from the consequence Diogenes drew from it; since a man would render himself ridiculous that should argue in that manner, in a town where the successes of a pirate had not been taken notice of above four or five years. Add to this, that there is nothing tempts a man more to make murmuring reflexions upon providence, for the prosperity of the wicked, than the seeing ones self miserable by reason of their prosperity (41). If therefore there was any robber that could draw from Diogenes's mouth the complaint which Cicero mentions, it was doubtless he that made Diogenes his slave. But since he became a slave to a pirate, and not to the governor of Babylon, we must conclude, that the witness who he thought might be produced against the existence of the gods, was the pirate who had taken him captive.

It is to little purpose therefore, that Father Lescapier (42) represents to his readers, that Harpalus, the governor of Babylon, continued not long unpunished, after he had carried off the treasures of the king his master. It is in vain he shews, that this robber fell from one misfortune into another, and that he was miserably killed about a year after. He does but reason against himself. The farther he advances towards his design, the farther he deviates from his subject. The question is concerning a robber, who had been a long time fortunate; this is the objection; and here you alledge to us a robber that was punished almost upon the spot. This is not to answer; it is rather to labour unwarily to make of an inconsiderable difficulty, a stumbling block for the simple, who will be scandalized to see a libertine answered by overturning the whole state of the question. And now is not this conclusion of this Jesuit very edifying? 'Omitte Harpalum, fume Diogenem: ne querere quod regie pecunie prædo unum annum vivat in sua fortuna: quere quod prædo divinæ providentiæ in sua impietate longam vitam vivat: sed neque id certe conquerendum est, nam longa vita miserissimi canis omnibus feli, omnibus exosi, longum supplicium fuit, longior tamen supplicii breve præludium' (43). — Instead of Harpalus choose Diogenes for an example: do not complain, that a person who robbed a royal treasury is allowed to enjoy it one year: complain rather that one who robs GOD of his providence is suffered to live for a great number of years in his impiety: but neither is this any ground of complaint, for the long life of this miserable dog who bated all men, and was bated by all, was a long punishment, though indeed only the short prelude, to a much longer punishment.

[K] There is a fault in Eusebius, which I will take notice of. He says under the third year of the CXIIth Olympiad, that Harpalus fled into Asia. Harpalus fugit in Asiam. Scaliger approves of that chronology. But he corrects Asiam, by Atticam, and it is certain, that if Eusebius did not say Atticam, he ought to have done it. Bongarsius (44) had corrected it, fugit ex Asia.

HARRAVAD (ISAAC BEN) a noted Rabbi, toward the end of the XIIIth Century. He has written something, but we know not truly what it is. There are two wonderful qualities ascribed to him: one is, that he could discover by peoples faces, whether their soul was transmigrated from another body, or began to exist at the moment of it's union with their own; the other, that though he was blind, he distinguished certainly by the smell, whether a man were alive or not (a). The criticism of Father Bartolucci is somewhat dull on this occasion [A].

[A] The criticism of Father Bartolucci is somewhat dull on this occasion. Having quoted these words of Rabbi Rekanati, ' & licet fuisset cæcus, sensibiliter percipiebat ex aëre an ille fuisset vivus an vero mortuus. — And though he was blind, he could sensibly distinguish by the air, whether a man was dead or alive.'

'alive,' he adds (1), 'cognoscere cadaver ex olfactu mira res apud Judæos: quia cum Judæi male olentes inter se continuo versentur, illorum olfaciendi sensus videtur depravatus, ut inter cadaveris & latinarum malum odorem distinguere nesciant, nisi prodigium fiat. — To know a carcase by the smell, is a wonderful thing among the Jews: because it would seem that the sinking Jews, by constantly herding among one another, deprave their sense of smelling to such a degree, that they cannot, without a miracle, distinguish betwixt the stink of a carcase, and of a jakes.' This is a silly piece of rallery; and if one would lay aside the spirit of cavillings, he might see that the smell of that Rabbi had something very particular in it, provided he had that nicety of sense that is pretended. For it must not be supposed, the meaning of it is, that he could discern that a man who had been dead some days, was not alive. All blind men can easily do this. But the meaning is, that the change he perceived in the air as soon as a man expired, gave him certainly to understand that the man was dead. Will it not be acknowledged, that this change is imperceptible? Father Bartolocci has censured another thing. He asks how that blind Rabbi could know the age of the soul, by looking on the face? This reflexion cannot be solid, unless the same authors, who have mentioned that faculty of our Rabbi, have expressly declared, that he was then blind, and that he made use of the inspection of the face. Now there is no appearance of any such declaration in them. 'Pius ista Ben Haravad cognoscebat ex vultu, utrum anima creata in ipso actu infusionis informaretur homo, an vero aliunde ex transmigratione animam haberet adventiciam (2). — The pious Ben Haravad knew by the face, whether the soul of a man was created in the very act of infusion; or if it was given by way of transmigration.' These words of Rabbi Rekanati (3), shew indeed, that the other Rabbi knew by the face, whether peoples souls were new, or not; but they do not determine whether he knew this, by looking on the face, or touching it. Now either of these ways is equally wonderful, and the latter even seems to be more difficult than the former. It will be objected to me in favour of Bartolocci, that Rekanati, making mention of the other faculty, observes, that Rabbi Haravad was blind; but I shall still ask, whether he says, that this marvellous physiognomist was blind at that time, when he could discern whether souls were in the place of their nativity? for if he only meant, that Haravad had that faculty before he grew blind, what will become of the ralleries, exclamations, and invectives of Bartolocci? He had reason enough to laugh at those tales, but it ought to have been upon other motives. Exactness is necessary, who ever it be, that is to be confuted.

HARTUNGUS (JOHN) born a Miltemberg (a), in the year 1505, studied first in his own country, and afterwards in the university of Heidelberg. He afterwards took arms, which he bore in Hungary against the Turks; but some time after he returned again to the gentle service of the Muses, and became professor of the Greek tongue in the university of Heidelberg. He acquitted himself gloriously of that profession fifteen years together; nor would he have resigned it, had not the Protestant religion been established in the Palatinate, in the year 1546. That change obliged him to seek another employment; and he found one at Friburg in Brisgaw, with which he was so well contented, that he kept it as long as he lived. He held an honourable rank amongst the professors at Friburg, and had many scholars. He read lectures upon Homer, and some other poets; and he composed some pretty good books [A]. He died in the same town, the 16th of June, 1579, after having taught the Belles Lettres there thirty three years. The epitaph he made for himself, testifies, that in the instruction of youth, he both suffered and learned a great deal (b) [B].

(b) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Philol. German. pag. 300, 301.

[A] He composed some pretty good books.] Some Prolegomena, and notes upon the three first books of the Odyſſey. Cbiliades locorum Homericorum: Decuriae locorum quorundam memorabilium (1). He translated Apollonius's poem upon the Argonaut, into Latin. That version is not in esteem. This is the judgment of a good critic upon it (2). 'Miratus sum hominem & eruditum, & in Græca præsertim lingua cum laude versatum ita transulisse [Apollonium] ut non paulò facilius sit Apollonium sua, hoc est Græca, lingua assequi, quam ea qua cum Hartungus loquentem fecit, latina. — I have wondered that a man so learned, and especially so versed in the Greek language, should have translated Apollonius in such a manner, that it is much easier to understand Apollonius's Greek, than Hartungus's Latin.' He afterwards shews some errors of this version, and lets us know, that he could point out abundance more (3).

[B] The epitaph he made upon himself, declares, that . . . he had suffered . . . and learned much.] It deserves to be set down here,

Πολλὰ παθὼν, καὶ πολλὰ μαθὼν ἐν παιδείᾳ διδάσκειν

Ἐνθα δὲ νῦν κῆμαι σὺν Θεῷ ἡσύχῃ.

In teaching youth I learn'd and suffer'd much,
And now, in dust, I quietly rest with GOD.

The Latin version of it, which is found in Melchior Adam (4), is very bad: it no way answers the author's intention, which was to shew, that his professorship had been a heavy burden. I will not insert here the other epitaph which Hartungus made upon himself in Greek; it may be seen in Melchior Adam. I am sure that Lorenzo Crafso would have placed him in his list of Greek poets, if he had known as much as has been here said of him. The forgetfulness of that Italian puts me in mind, that Mr Baillet has not given Hartungus a place among the critics.

HEBEDJESU, Patriarch of the Nestorians re-united to the Church of Rome, under Pius IV in 1562. I have already spoken of him under another name (a), which has been given him by divers authors; but what I have farther to say concerning him, I thought worthy to be told in this place. Since the printing of the Article ABDISSI, I have observed in a very curious work (b), that after the death of Simon Julacha [A], a Monk of the order of St Pachomus, who had been created Patriarch vant, publiée par le Sr de Mont, à Francfort chez Frederic Arnoud (or rather at Rotterdam, by Remer Leers), 1684. It is believed that Father Simon is the author of this History.

(1) Simon Julacha.] It should be written Sulacha, as Aubertus Miræus writes it (1). We need not wonder that the critics can collect out of manuscripts an infinity of varie Lectiones, when printed books are not exempt from them. The Sieur de Moni gives the name Caremit, to a town of Mesopotamia, which Aubertus Miræus calls Charemet. The latter calls him Denba Simon, whom the other names Denba Simon. The one uses the word Zeinalbach, the other chooseth rather to say, Zeinalbech. They have both drawn from the same fountain, viz. from Peter Strozza's book de Chaldeorum Dogmatibus; why therefore do not they agree? Is it easier to write Sulacha, than Julacha, Denba, than Denba? Mr Arnoud, from the same original, says (2), that Simon Sulacha established his see at Caramit. Mr Claude (3) makes use of the word Sulak. Father Paul, at the beginning of his fifth book (4), says, one Simon Sultakam. Mr Amelot makes triarch of the Nestorians, by Julius III, "Abdjefu, or, according to the Chaldaic pronunciation, Hebedjesu was made Patriarch in his room. Abraham Ecchellenfis, who has printed a little Syriac treatise of Abdjesu [B], gives him the title of Metropolitan of Soba, in the preface he prefixed to that work. He observes, that this Hebedjesu had composed several books in defence of the religion of the Nestorians; but that coming to Rome in Julius the third's pontificate, he abjured Nestorianism. It is he that is spoken of in the life of Pius IV, in whose time he made a second voyage to Rome [C], to obtain the confirmation of his Patriarchate; and he assisted at the Council of Trent [D]. As he was a man of parts, he had the dexterity to bring over a great number of Nestorians to the church of Rome. But his successors could not retain them in it, having neither his capacity, nor his address. Athathalla, who was also a Monk of St Pachomus, succeeded Hebedjesu, and living but a little while, had Denha Simon for his successor, who was before archbishop of Gelu. But he was obliged to leave Caremit [E], and to retire into the province of Zeinalbech, in the extremity of Persia, having been forced to submit to the power of the Patriarch of Babylon. His successor, whose name also was Simon, resided at the same place, which much diminished the authority of this second Patriarch". This is what I have found in this book (c). I was of opinion, when I drew up the article of ABDISSI, that we might rely on the narrative of Father Paul. But I ought not to pass over in silence, what I have since observed in Father Pallavicini, viz. that it is not true, that this Patriarch wrote letters to the Council. The following notes will give an account of what has been criticised in Father Paul's Narrative [F].

makes no correction here. These are trifles I confess: but from such trifles as these, do often arise very considerable and important disputes. Hæ nugæ seria ducunt in mala. It would go better with the Republic of Letters, if every one would think himself obliged to avoid even the least faults.

[B] Abraham Ecchellenfis printed a little Syriac treatise of Abdjesu. I believe it is the same treatise Mr Arnaud speaks of, when he cites (5) the notes of Abraham Ecchellenfis, a Maronite, upon a catalogue of Chaldean books, made by Abdjesu, or Hebedjesu, a Nestorian bishop, who came over to the church of Rome. Some pages after (6) he touches upon some circumstances, which deserve a place here, as giving us a more particular account what sort of man our Hebedjesu was. He had formerly been one of the most violent Nestorians, says Mr Arnaud, and written several books whilst he himself was in that error, which he reckons up at the end of the catalogue of the Chaldean books which he wrote, and which has been translated by Ecchellenfis. It appears by that catalogue, that the book intitled Margaritarum, was composed by him whilst he was yet a Nestorian. The Supplement to Moretti's Dictionary observes (7), that the catalogue of the Syrian writers (it is doubtless that whereof Hebedjesu is the author) was published at Rome, in Syriac in the year 1653, with a Latin version and notes, by Abraham Ecchellenfis. That this catalogue makes mention of several works composed in Syriac by Hebedjesu; that there are two poems composed in Syriac, and written with his own hand, preserved in the Vatican, where he gives the reasons of his re-union, &c. Aubertus Miræus relates (8) that the picture of that Patriarch was placed in the palace of the Vatican, amongst the cardinals and prelates, that accompanied Alexander III, when he received the submissions of the emperor Frederic at Venice.

[C] He made a second voyage to Rome. I am surprised, that neither Father Paul, nor his censor, cardinal Pallavicini, or any one of the many authors I have consulted concerning Hebedjesu, have mentioned a voyage which he made to Rome in Julius the third's time. It had not been a superfluous, nor an useless, circumstance; and I am persuaded, they would not have omitted it, had they known it.

elsewhere refuted this falshood. It suffices to add here, that there is no writer, though never so inconsiderable, who sometimes does not cause the greatest authors to stumble. Peter Strozza, secretary to Paul V, was very likely misled by some wretched chronicler; and it is no doubt upon the credit of that secretary, that the Sieur de Moni, and before him Mr Arnaud (9), have published, that Hebedjesu assisted at that council.

[E] Denha Simon was obliged . . . to leave Caremit. This happened at the time that Leonard Abel, bishop of Sidon, went to the Levant with the character of Apostolic Nuncio (10). He was a native of Malta, and understood perfectly the Arabian tongue, which is as it were natural in that island. He died at Rome, in the year 1605, or 1606. He composed a book concerning the state of the Oriental Christians, whence Aubertus Miræus, from whom I copy this whole remark, confesses he has taken many things, in his Notitia Episcopatum. He adds, that this work of Leonard Abel, is in manuscript in the library of the deceased cardinal Alcanio Colonna, protector of the churches of the east, and that this library was wonderfully increased, by the addition of the books of cardinal William Sirlet.

[F] The following notes will give an account of what has been criticised in Father Paul's Narrative. That author relates, that the letters of cardinal Amulius were read, who, in quality of protector of the Oriental Christians, sent the news to the council of the arrival of Abdissi . . . He related, that the people under this prelate's jurisdiction, had been instructed in the faith by St Thomas and St Thaddæus, &c. (11). The historian adds, that afterwards the Patriarch's confession of faith was read, and lastly, the letters he addressed to the council, to excuse himself for not being able to come there, &c. (12). Cardinal Pallavicino (13) tells the story more at large, and with greater exactness, not confounding what Amulius said by the Pope's order, with the consequences which he drew himself from the narratives of the Nestorian prelate. It does not appear, that Father Paul has made that distinction, but his principal fault lies in affirming, that a letter wrote by Abdissi to the council was read. Pallavicino maintains, that that letter never had a being but in the imagination of Father Paul (14).

HEGESILOCHUS was one of those who committed infinite violences in the isle of Rhodes, when it's Democratical government was chang'd into an Aristocratical, by the authority of Mausolus, King of Caria (a). Athenæus has preserved us a specimen of the lewdness of these new masters (b). They debauched the wives of the most eminent citizens, and abused many boys. In short, they carried their licentiousness so far, as to stake the honour of women at the game of hazard [A]. They made it a rule, that the loser should be obliged to bring the lady that was played for, to him that had won her, and should use all sorts of methods to convey her into his arms. No trick or evasion was allowed; persuasions and violences were to succeed one another, to proceed or to follow, according to the exigence of the case, till the wager that was played for was actually paid. He who most frequently, and most impudently, put in practice this new game at hazard, was Hegesilochus (c). His drunkenness and other debaucheries rendered him so incapable of business, that he lost his dignity, and was look'd upon, even by his friends, as an infamous wretch. This Hegesilochus ought not to be confounded with one of that name, who came ambassador from the Rhodians to Rome [B], after he had exercised the principal dignity of their state [C]. This man lived in the time of Perseus king of Macedonia, the other in the time of Philip, Father of Alexander the Great.

on his Hoggidiani; for I do not believe, that our age has seen in any country of Europe, disorders equal to those of these Rhodians. I have heard indeed, that the footmen of a great minister of state, who has not been many years dead, used to play at cards or dice for captains commissions; but besides that this is very uncertain, it may be reduced to a small matter, viz. that each of these footmen obtained for his new-year's gift the promise that such a number of companies should be given at his recommendation: after which they played this fund among themselves, and when any one lost a company, it was no longer in his power, but the winner's, to recommend any body. In all this disorder it was still easy to hinder the commissions from being given to people unfit for service. So that this is nothing comparable to the debauchery of these petty tyrants at Rhodes, who staked down at play, maiden-heads and cuckoldoms, and gave no respite to the loser, till he had delivered them their prey. They were not content to venture the honour of the finest women, which is inseparable, as the world will have it, from that of their husbands: they also ventured their own: for the loser was under a necessity of turning procurer. Here was reason, with a witness, to cry out, O tempora? O mores?

[B] Another Hegesilochus was ambassador at Rome from Rhodes. This we learn from Polybius (1). Hegesilochus was the word in the manuscripts; but Fulvius Ursinus (2) having observed in Livy (3) that this Rhodian was called Hegesilus, corrected these two authors by one another, and restored Hegesilochus to both.

[C] He had exercised the chief dignity of their state. It was called πρυτανεία (4), and the exercising of it was expressed by the verb πρυτανεύειν. The Latins called those who exercised that dignity, Prytanes. 'Quadräginta navibus autore Hegesilochi comparatis,' says Livy (5), qui cum in summo magistratu esset (Prytania ipsi vocant). — Having got together forty ships, by the advice of Hegesilochus, who being chief magistrate (or Prytani) as they call him.

HEIDANUS (ABRAHAM) divinity professor at Leyden, was born at Frankendal, in the Palatinate, the 10th of August, 1597. He began his studies at Amsterdam, whither Gaspar Heidanus, his father, was called to the office of the ministry in the year 1608. An Englishman, called Matthew Slade, who was then rector of the college of Amsterdam, took particular care of Abraham Heidanus, whom he saw to be a youth of promising parts. Daniel Colonius applied himself with no less zeal to further the progress of this his disciple, when he was committed to his instruction at Leyden, in the Walloon college. Colonius not being one of those fiery spirits who were for carrying all things to the last extremities, when the Arminian disputes began to rise, made himself to be suspected, as inclining that way [A]; so that there were many persons who expressed their dislike at Gaspar Heidanus's suffering his son to study under such a tutor. But the rashness of this sort of detraction produced a contrary effect to what these zealots aimed at: the minister of Amsterdam continued his son with Colonius, his old friend, whose orthodoxy he was assured of: he continued him with him, I say, that he might give his friend an authentic proof of their agreement in opinion. This scholar made good progress under Colonius, not doing as the generality did, who only stuffed their heads with the dispute about the five articles of the Remonstrants

dentia, qua locus dabatur suspicionibus quibus alii alios tanquam bonæ causæ minus addictos differabant. Qui enim ferventioris erant ingenii, & omnia summa tentanda in initiis putabant, ut in herba opprimeretur malum, quoscunque videbant moderatius & lentius agere, ac de reconciliatione animorum potius laborare si vulnus forte posset consolidari, ac schisma, quod ad opera carnis pertinet, evitari, eos tanquam prævaricatores bonæ causæ apud plebem criminabantur (1). — The different opinions about predestination, at that time, produced not only great contentions, among men from one another, which totally alienated the minds of those who thought differently on that subject, but even produced amongst those who agreed in opinion concerning that controversy, a sort of dissidence which made way for suspicions, every one accusing another of want of zeal, in the good cause. For they who were of warmer tempers, and thought that the utmost severities ought to be used to check the evil in the bud, accused those to the people, as prevaricators in the cause of GOD, whom they observed to be of more moderate sentiments, and who laboured to heal the wounds and prevent schism, which is one of the works of the flesh. This seems to be a true picture. These disputes cause a violent war without, and sow the wicked seeds of suspicious within, which

Remonstrants (4). He learned that and the rest. He was made proponent at the synod of the Walloon churches, in the year 1618, and he preached in several French churches, with the applause of his auditors. He preached also in some Dutch churches with the like success. He travelled two years, and saw part of Germany, Swisserland, France, and England. A little after his return he was promoted to the ministry, and he exercised his function at Naerden, to the year 1627, when he accepted of a call from the consistory of Leyden. He was contracted to a daughter of one of the principal merchants in Amsterdam, when he took possession of his new church, and a little after he celebrated his marriage. He was a good preacher, which, together with other good qualities, both of temper and parts, procured him a fair reputation. He was fifty years old, when the province of Guelderland, having resolved to establish an university at Harderwic, offered him the divinity professorship, upon very advantageous conditions. The church of Leyden, to keep him with them, allowed him either the same advantages, or, in general, what should make him ample amends for his refusal. The curators of the university found a still better expedient to prevent his going to Guelderland; they gave him the professorship of divinity, which became vacant by the death of Constantine l'Empereur. He was so well satisfied with Leyden, that he would not hearken to the offers which the Elector Palatin made him, in the most pressing manner. And yet that refusal did not hinder that prince from giving him many honourable marks of his esteem [B] when he pass'd through Heidelberg, in the year 1656, in the journey he made to Strasburg with his family. The professor Smidius, who invited him to a publick disputation, and desired him to impugn, did not come off honourably from the dispute [C]. But Heidanus's victory on that occasion, was not so plain as that in the Jesuits college at Cologne [D]. This learned man died at Leyden very piously, the 15th of October 1678, having exceeded his eighty first year, which of all the climacteric years is look'd upon as the most dangerous, and with good reason. He left four children, two sons and two daughters, thirteen grand-children, and three great grand-children. He had a great share in Mr Des Cartes's friendship, and by that means he finished the work he had begun, under Jachæus, philosophy professor at Leyden, one of the most subtle peripatetics then living. This Jachæus brought the question which are wonderfully fruitful. They produce, amongst other things, as I said just now, a great change in those whom reason inspires with a spirit of moderation. They are derided as secret traitors (2), and there are some among them, who will not continue reasonable at that rate, and who believe their honesty would cost them too dear, if they must lose their reputation for it; and therefore they turn persecutors, to refute the calumny:

[B] The elector Palatine gave him many honourable marks of esteem. They who shall think it strange that I give the particulars, will censure Mr Wittichius, rather than me. For there must be a greater allowance to mention these things in a dictionary of two volumes in Folio, when one meets with them in a funeral oration, than to display them in a funeral oration, when they are only taken from a memoir in manuscript. Let it be how it will, Mr Wittichius says, that Abraham Heidanus was invited to dinner every day by a new messenger, and he does not forget the presents he received. 'Dum Heidelbergam appulit, nihil omisit Serenissimus Elector quod non serventissimum erga ipsum spiraret affectum. Ad mensam quotidie, novis semper missis nunciis, invitabat in colloquiis benevole complectebatur, donabat medio cervo & aliquot leporibus, nuntiatio hanc omnem esse prædam quam illo die cepisset; quæcumque in diversorio cum familia consumperat liberalissimè solvit, & cum Bacheracum rediisset, ad suos Leidenses reversurus, magno dolio optimi & generosissimi vini Bacheracensis voluit donatum. — When he arrived at Heidelberg; the elector omitted nothing that could express his great affection towards him. He invited him daily to his table, and always by a new messenger; and conversed with him in the most affable manner. He presented him with a side of venison, and some hares, telling him, that this was all the game he had killed that day. He defrayed all his and his families expences, while there, in the most liberal manner; and when he returned to Bacherac in his way to Leyden, he was pleased to make him a present of a hog'shead of excellent Bacherac wine'.

VOL. III.

[C] The professor Smidius who invited him to dispute . . . did not come off honourably. After Heidanus had excused himself several times from entering the lists, he at last gave way to his repeated civilities, and attacked him upon the point of universal grace, which the Lutherans teach: great was the attention of the auditors, and the success very glorious to the opponent. Smidius ipsum palam non semel, sed quia declinabat noster, iteratis vicibus ad opponendum invitavit, quod, cum non videretur sibi salvo honore suo posse detestare, ea soliditate, ea efficacia Gratiam quam Lutherani urgent, Universalem ita oppugnavit, ut omnium oculos in se converterit, & apud omnes præsentis magnam admirationem suæ consummate eruditionis excitaverit, disputationis vero præter multorum judicio parum honorificè ex illa disputatione discessit (4).

[D] Heidanus's victory . . . was not so plain as that in the Jesuits college at Cologne. If this last victory was easier to be observed than the foregoing, it was in other respects not so honourable; for it consisted in a jest, to which the Jesuit, who had shewn him whatever was to be seen in the college of Cologne, and perhaps was a lay-brother, could not answer a word. Heidanus asked the Jesuit, whether JESUS CHRIST had done and suffered all that was necessary for our Salvation? Yes, said the Jesuit: Then replied he, you are not his companions (5a). The Jesuit, confounded with shame and astonishment, had nothing to say for himself. Malincrot, dean of Munster, who heard this conversation, and had got acquainted with Heidanus (5), congratulated him upon that victory, obtained, said he, over my enemies. Wittichius, who also heard this discourse, relates it in this manner: Accidit ut postquam Collegium lustraveramus Jesuitarum, & jam in arca eramus constituti ut patri-bus valere diceremus, conversus Heidanus ad Jesuitam qui nos ducebat, ex ipso rogaverit annon Jesus omnia illa quæ ad salutem essent necessaria egisset & posset? At Jesuita nihil sinistri metuens, respondit, Omnino: Heidanus rigescit: Ergo eos non essis Socii Jesu; atque sic illo in ruborem dato & minis Pontificie attonito ut ne verbum quidem respondere posset, discessit noster & nos cum ipso, atque patribus valere dixit. Quod Malincrotium tanto affectu gaudio, ut hoc nomine gratias solennes illi egerit, quod sic suos hostes Heidanus de re (ita vocabat Jesuita) ad incitas ex improviso redigisset. I must confess, that hitherto I have sought in vain wherein the jest lies. I cannot guess to what he alluded, question concerning substantial forms into great repute in the university [E]. The young Heidanus, excited by the noise it made, examined the objections to the bottom, and compared them with the answers of Jachæus. He found, that philosophizing upon these principles, was but losing time, and he was in hopes, that some time or other a more certain road would appear (b). He thought he had found it in the conversation and writings of Descartes. But if this was more proper to lead him to the truth, it was not so commodious with respect to his fortune. For it exposed him to a thousand crosses and persecutions [F], over which his panegyrist Wittichius, who supplies me with this article, thought it fit to draw a curtain. Heidanus was of a good family [G].

cluded, or what rules of logic he made use of on this occasion.

[§ 2] Strictly speaking, to call ones self companion to a person, signifies, that we pretend to be so in all respects. Now the Jesuit confessed, that they of his society were not companions of JESUS in the work of redemption. Therefore the Jesuits, without reason, stile themselves companions of JESUS. This was Heidanus's argument, to which the Jesuit having made no reply, Malincrotius considered it as a victory for his friend Heidanus. REM. CRIT.]

[E] Jachæus brought the question concerning substantial forms into great repute.] There is no question in Physics, that is a clearer proof of the power of prejudices than this. They must needs darken the mind with respect to the most evident notions, since there are so many people, who cannot see the impossibility of extracting a substance from the bosom of matter, unless it was there before, or unless it be produced by a true creation. The peripatetics tell you very coldly, or rather they passionately maintain, that forms do not exist in their subject, and that nevertheless they are drawn out of it by an action which must not be called creation but education (6). This opinion would be the most monstrous thing in the world, if it were not a more amazing prodigy to see such a number of learned and ingenious men, espouse still at this day, the doctrine of substantial forms. Wittichius could not better prepare his auditors to observe in Heidanus a disciple of Descartes, than by telling them what Heidanus, as yet but a scholar, judged of the principles of the school, from the inexplicable confusion in which Jachæus involved himself. 'Fervebat in Academia quæstio de formis substantialibus, earumque ex potentia materie productione, quæ mirifice non tantum Auditoribus, sed & ipsum defensorem eorum acerrimum Jachæum vexabat & torquebat. Quam cum universa distinctionum suarum paenolâ expedire non posset, & ad liquidum ostendere quænam illæ formæ substantiales essent, à materia realiter distinctæ & tamen materiales, quænam illa potentia materie, an pars ejus quædam conversa in formam, an vero ejus cum producitur tantum sustentaculum, an autem ut ex asserere figura scamni educitur, ita eodem modo præxisteret in materia forma; cumque aliæ plurimæ superessent difficultates, nec ulum suppedietaretur solum ex hoc labyrintho emergendi, factum est ut auditores & peripateticiores discipuli, inter quos Heidanus primas obtinebat de tota hac philosophandi ratione quam intelligendo assequi se non posse videbant, plane desperarent (7). — The question concerning substantial forms, and their production out of the power of matter, was then much debated in that university, and wonderfully perplexed the scholars, and even Jachæus himself, a warm defender of them. And he not being able to extricate himself with all his distinctions, nor clearly show what these substantial forms are, which are really distinct from matter, and yet are material, nor what this power of matter is, whether a part of it converted into form, or only a prop to it when it is produced, or whether as the figure of a bench is taken out of a plank, so form, in the same manner, pre-exists in matter. There being likewise many other difficulties, and no thread left to get out of this labyrinth, many of his most sagacious bearers, and scholars, among the chief of which was Heidanus, gave over all hopes of this whole system of philosophy, which they found so unintelligible.

(6) A Jesuit named John Guillemain, doctor of divinity in the university of Pont à Mousson, printed, at Paris in the year 1679, two dissertations de principis intrinsecis rerum corporearum, in which he racks his brains a thousand times to prove against Father Marignau, that the production of forms is not a proper creation. All in vain.

[F] Des Cartes's method exposed him to a thousand crosses and persecutions.] I do not know the particulars: but I remember a passage of his Considerations, where he relates that he had made himself many enemies, and had been exposed to horrible slanders, for having always been averse to too rigid maxims.

He had not declared war against Protestant canons: he had not thundered in the pulpit against periwigs: he was not of opinion, that the Remonstrants ought to be rigorously examined, who returned to the bosom of their ancient mother. Hereupon they represented him as an enemy to the new model of reformation, that was to be introduced; all his other opinions were scanned and sifted; he was accused of being addicted to Des Cartes's opinions, and of contemning the Lord's day. But it is better to hear Heidanus himself. Etatem illam meam ancipitem duxi, modo tempestates, hinc expertus balconia, intra & extra nos passus adversarios, hinc hostes, inde fratres, nec nunquam mordacis linguæ exceptus flogellis. Fuit, cum scissam in partes charissimam hanc nostram Ecclesiam metu prævidimus: tum nobis sed eam sapientiam simul largitus est Deus, ut quidvis pati possumus, quam idipsum permittere, maluerimus: Hinc jam Moderatores, per contemptum (ac si probrosum hoc nomen foret) audivimus; jam ut Cartesii plus satis additi Philosophiæ; hinc Sabbatibi contemptores; inde novæ quam urgebant quidam Reformationis hostes traducti sumus: quod fœneratoribus trapeziticis plusculum illis concedere visum, nec Canonici bellum indicere, neque de suggestis in comas detonare, neque Ecclesiæ disciplinam striccius exercere, nec Remonstrantes ad nos transeuntes rigidius examinare, & quæ sunt id genus alia (8). Matters were carried so high, that he was deposed from his place of professor of divinity, upon the following account. The curators of the university of Leyden published a decree the sixteenth of January, 1676, forbidding the professors to treat in any wise of certain propositions (9), which had for some time been a subject of dispute, and of Des Cartes's metaphysics. Heidanus acted against that decree, almost in the same manner as the Janseists did against the mandate of the archbishop of Paris, who forbade the reading of the New Testament of Mons. He animadverted upon it; and pretended to find nullities or irregularities in it: he maintained, that the twenty propositions which had been condemned, had not been discussed in the university of Leyden, as the curators affirmed. He complained, that these gentlemen had suffered themselves to be imposed on by unfaithful extracts, and he made odious comparisons betwixt the Jesuits, and those who had furnished these extracts, the Jesuits, I say, who had caused to be condemned at Rome for Janseius's propositions, what was not to be found in his writings. He made another comparison: for he alleged Giles Hunnius, a Lutheran, who, from artificial extracts out of the works of John Calvin, pretended to convict him of Judaism. Lastly, he illustrated the condemned propositions, and tried to shew, that in the sense of the authors they were taken from, they were orthodox. That work of Heidanus was printed in Dutch and afterwards in Latin (10). This offended the curators to that degree, that they degraded him. Heidanus's friends pretend, that nothing could have happened to him more seasonably, since his great age would not suffer him to acquire a new reputation by his lectures, nor even to support that which he had already gained; and besides that, his degradation rendered him more dear and venerable to his own party (11), and might cast an odium on the adverse side.

[G] Heidanus was of a good family.] His great grand-father, Gerhard vander Heyden, was of Mechelen (12): so was his grand-father, Gaspar vander Heyden, who was expelled his father's house on the account of his having embraced the reformed religion. He was minister at Antwerp, from whence he retired to Franckfort by reason of the persecution. Here he found many refugees, whom the rigid Lutherans would not tolerate; which obliged them to petition Frederic II Elector Palatine, for a place of retreat. Peter Dathenus was at the head of them. The elector granted granted them the monastery of Frankendal, the monks being ordered to depart: these refugees performed their religious exercises in Flemish, and by degrees enlarged that monastery into a town. Dathenus being called to Heidelberg, our Gaspar vander Heyden succeeded him as pastor of that church. He was desired to be present at the national synod of Embden, in the year 1571, and was even chosen president of that assembly. There the canons of discipline were made. A little after, returning to the Palatinate, the elector appointed him to attend his son, whom he sent with some troops to the assistance of the Protestants, in the Low-Countries. These troops were beaten. Vander Heyden retired into Holland, and presided in the national synod assembled at Dort, 1574. He served for some time the church of Middleburg; afterwards thinking himself safe by virtue of the pacification of Ghent, he returned to take the charge of his first flock at Antwerp. When that town was taken by the Spaniards, he returned to the Palatinate, and was made superintendent of the churches about Bacharach. He was disposed to quit that employ, in compliance with the desires of the church of Frankendal, who desired him for their minister again; when he died, leaving an only son of the same name, Gaspar, who was born in the year 1566. The latter was first minister at Wolmersheim, afterwards at Frankendal, and then at Amsterdam, where he died in the year 1626. He married Clara Vanden Borne, a daughter of the bailiff of Frankendal, by whom he had six sons, and eight daughters. Our Abraham Heidanus was one of his sons (13).

[H] I shall speak of his writings below.] He published some orations on divers subjects; the examination of the Remonstrants Catechism; a book in 4to de Origine Erroris; and a Dutch book, where he maintains the cause of God, against the Pelagians, and Semi-Pelagians, with such force, that no body has been able to answer it. Evolue solidissimum & nunquam satis laudandum Commentarium de Causa Dei Belgice ante plures annos conscriptum (qui dignissimus videtur ut in Latinam linguam transferatur, ut ab exteris legi possit) in quo adeo nervose, adeo eloquenter partes Dei defendit contra hominem, ut Pelagiani nihil in hunc usque diem potuerint reperire quo vires suas plane attritas & fractas quant restaurare (14). As to his Corpus Theologiæ Christianæ in quinddecim locos digestum, it was published after his death, in two volumes in quarto, by the care of Mr Crucius, his grandson, in the year 1686. HELEN, daughter of Tyndarus, king of Lacedemon, was the finest woman of her age [A]; but otherwise, without honour and virtue, and of a life full of unhappy adventures. There are some authors, who have been so particular in describing the perfections of her body [B], that they can by no means be excused, though they should say, in express terms, they only did it by way of amusement. She was fought in marriage by a great number of princes, and as her father did not know what course to take

(1) Dares Phrygius, Cedrenus.

[A] She was the finest woman of her age.] There are some authors (1) who have described the particulars of Helen's beauty. He who has done it most at large, is Constantine Manasse: he has included in eleven Greek verses, a good number of epithets, representing the corporeal perfections of this woman. He does not forget to tell us, that her beauty owed nothing to art, and that her complexion, without the help of washes, had a noble liltre (2). They have ascribed to her, legs finely made, a little mouth (3), a long, and very white neck (4), large eyes, and fine breasts (5). Brantome furnishes me with a passage upon this last part. Helen, says he (6), desiring once to present to the temple of Diana a handsome cup, by reason of a vow, employed a goldsmith to make it for her, causing him to take the pattern from one of her handsome breasts, and to make it of white gold. In which it was hard to tell which was most to be admired, the cup, or the resemblance of the breast, which appeared so pretty, and so like, that the artificial one could not but create a desire for the natural. Pliny says this with great admiration, and is very particular, where he says that there is white gold, which is very strange, and that this cup was made of it. . . . He that would make golden cups by the great dugs of some women, had need furnish the goldsmith with a great deal of gold, and would not escape afterwards the laughter of the world, when it should be said, behold these cups are modelled after the breasts of such and such ladies. These, instead of being like cups, would resemble your round wooden pails the boys are served with, and the nipple would resemble a rotten cherry. Brantome is mistaken in two things; for Helen did not consecrate that cup to the temple of Diana; nor is it true that Pliny says, it was made of white gold. Minervæ templum habet Lindos insulæ Rhodiorum in quo Helena sacravit calicem ex electro. Adhuc historia mammæ suæ mensurâ. These are Pliny's words in the fourth chapter of the thirty third book.

But to return to Helen, I say that the descriptions which have been made of her beauty, do not give an idea of it comparable to what we form in reading some lines of the Iliad, which have nothing of a description in them. Homer contents himself with making the counsellors of Priamus say, upon seeing Helen coming whilst they were deliberating about state-affairs with their prince, that neither the Grecians nor the Trojans could be blamed, for enduring such pains for the sake of so divine a beauty.

POPE.

[B] There are some authors who have been very particular in describing the charms of her body.] A Spanish fryar observes, that the beauty of this woman was a miracle of nature; and that for a multitude of ages, it has been a common proverb, when any one intends to praise a beauty in the highest manner, to say, she is an Helen. He adds, that John Nevizan said, that of the thirty accomplishments which must be united to the making a woman perfectly handsome (8), not one was wanting in her. *Natio est tan aventajada, y enriquecida de hermosura, que fue un portento, un prodigio, y milagro de naturaleza. quedando desde aquel tiempo a este, y aun para muchos siglos, en proverbio, su belleza, y gallardía: de tal suerte, que quando havian de ser ponderados, y encarecer la hermosura de una muger, dezimos que es una Helena: y en tal lugar la pone, el Nivernienſe (8), Natal Comites, Bartolomeo Castañeda, Juan Nemizano (9); el qual pone las treynta cosas, que se requieren para que una muger sea perfecta en su hermosura: y dize que las tenia todas la Centilidá, he never saw the work of John Nevizan, and he speaks of it only upon the credit of Castañeda, who not pag. 181. Tyndarus thereupon disposed of her to Menelaus [C]. She had already been stole away by Theseus; but they were so good-natured as to believe, upon her word, that she disengaged her self from that affair without the loss of her virginity [D]. I suppose the rest of that small Latin poem (12) though Chassanæus, who was the first president in in the parliament of Aix, has not scrupled to insert it intire in his book. To which he adds, 'Non 'alter hic infisto circa talia, cum satis, & ultra
'quam decens sit, ponatur in dicta sylvia nuptiali.
'I shall not insist further on these things,
'enough, and more than is decent, being to be found 'in the said Sylvia Nuptialis.' I can assert with reason, that they who thus cite John Nevizan, are not exact, since he himself is but the copier of some other writers, whom he names. The fountain from which he traces it, is a French writer, whose book has this title, De la Louange & Beauté des Dames.
The eighteen verses he gives us, and which Chassanæus gives us after him, were a translation out of French made by Francis Corniger. He says it was not yet printed, but that there was an Italian version of it in a work of Vincent Calmeta, which is published.
'Et triginta requisita, says he (13), enumerantur per

— And the thirty requisites are named by a French author, in a book De la louange & beauté des Dames near the end of these were translated into Latin by Francis Corniger, which I now quote because it is not printed. Vincentius Calmeta has given us the same in an Italian poem, which begins Dolce Flaminia, and in the eclogue which follows it, which begins per dare Risposta, Corniger's verses are as follows:

Triginta hæc habeat &c.

If you consult a book intitled, Les neuf Mari-nées du Seigneur de Cholieres, you will find (14) a sonnet beginning thus:

Celle qui veut paroir des belles la plus belle,
Ces dix fois trois beautez, trois longs, trois courts,
trois blancs,
Trois rouges, & trois noirs, trois petis & trois grands,
Trois estroits & trois gros, trois menus soient en elle.

That is,

She, who would excel other fair ones, must have these thirty beauties: viz. three long, three short, three white, three red, three black, three small, three large, three strait, three big, three slender.

And which ends with seves, doigts & cheveaux menus
tel fut Helene. The conclusion is no less impertinent than all the preceding verses. For to know that Helen was thus formed, it had not been enough to have seen her performing her exercises at Lacedæmon (15), it must have been either Paris, or Me-nelaus, or some of her former husbands or gallants.

[C] Tyndarus . . . disposed of her to Menelaus.
Some say (16) that Tyndarus did not choose his son-in-law himself, but left it to Helen to make choice of an husband out of all her lovers, and that she preferred Menelaus before the rest. Apollodorus (17) pretends, that Tyndarus resigned his kingdom to his son-in-law; but others say (18), he only named him for his successor. What a fortune then was Helen, who, with so incomparable a beauty, brought also a crown to her husband!

[D] Theseus had stole her . . . they believed that she disengaged herself from that affair without the loss of her virginity.] Plutarch says she was not yet marriageable when Theseus stole her from the temple of Diana, where she was dancing (19). He committed her to his mother's care (20), and put them both under the tuition of one of his good friends in Aphid-na: and so went in pursuit of another rape (21), with his friend Pirithous. Castor and Pollux, Helen's brothers, lost no time, but entered Attica with sword in hand, to demand their sister. The Athenians protested to them, they knew not where she was. That answer did not satisfy them, and they were ready to commit hostilities, when one Academicus acquainting them, that she was at Aphidna (22), they assaulted that town, and took it by storm. The gates of Athens were opened to them: they entered the town without committing any disorders; only desiring to be initiated into their mysteries. They carried Helen back to Lacedæmon; it is said also, that they brought Theseus's mother along with her, and that that good woman accompanied Helen (23) even to Troy (24).

Hellanicus makes Theseus to be 50 (25) and Helen seven years of (26) age, at the time of her being stolen, and yet does not scruple to say that he defloured her. Duris, the Samian (27), affirms that Helen was with child of Iphigenia, when she was recovered from the hands of the ravisher. Pausanias says the same thing, and adds that she lay-in at Argos, at her sister Clytemnestra's, wife to Agamemnon, and that she committed her daughter's education to her (28). He says that Euphorion, Alexander Pleu-ronius, and Stesichorus, had wrote in their poems, that Iphigenia was the daughter of Theseus and Helen. The Argians were so far of this opinion, as to believe that Helen caused the temple of Lucina, which is in their city, to be built after her lying-in (29). A great many were imposed upon on that occasion. Agamemnon thought Iphigenia was his daughter,

Οἰσῖος καὶ Ἑλένης τῆς Διδὸς ἐγένετο θυγάτηρ Ἰφιγένεια, καὶ αὐτὴν ἐξέτρεφεν ἡ τῆς Ἑλένης ἀδελφὴ Κλυταιμνήστρα, πρὸς δὲ τὸν Ἀγαμέμνονα εἶπεν αὐτὴ τέκνῃν. Ἑλένη γὰρ συνδανήμην τὸν ἀδελφὸν, ἐπὶ κόβῃ παρὰ Θουκυδῆος ἀπελθεῖν. Thesei & Helenæ, Jove natæ filia fuit Iphigenia, eamque soror Helenæ Clytemnestra educavit, Agamemnoni dicens se eam peperisse: nam Helenæ fratribus auscultans virginem se à Theseo discessisse aiebat (30). What shall we think then of Menelaus, who married her some time after? he honestly believed he had bedded a pure virgin, and yet he had married a mother.

(30) Nicander. lib. iv, Alterum, apud Anton. Libanum; Narrat. 27.

When I said Helen was questioned by her brothers, I followed the learned Mr Meziriac (31), who understood in that sense the Greek passage which I have quoted: but others, perhaps, with more reason, say, that Castor and Pollux advised their sister to give out that she had preserved her virginity. It was a very wise advice, and which might have been well spared to Helen as young as she was: she would have boasted of that advantage, without any one's suggestion. She declares, in Ovid, that Theseus obtained only some kisses of her by force; and that she came off clear, abating only her fear.

(31) On Ovid's Epist. pag. 483.

No fruit his passion reap'd, tho' bolder grown,
And all I suffer'd was in fear alone.
'Tis true, he ravish'd a reluctant kiss;
From Helen he can boast no greater bliss.

She confesses however that Theseus was very young (33). Ovid has observed a decorum in making her speak in that manner; nor has he observed it less, in introducing another woman, who believed Helen told a lie:

(33) Et juvenem facti perbulisse patet. Ibid. ver. 32.

Illam de patria Theseus, (nisi nomine fallor)
Nescio quis Theseus, abstulit ante sua.
A juvenem & cupido credatur reddita virgo.

(34) Ovid. in Epist. Oenone ad Parid. ver. 227, & seq.

One Theseus (if I hit the name) before
Had born this fair one from her native shore.
Theseus was young: and can you think the dame
Return'd a virgin from so fierce a flame?
Call it a rape; yet Helen sure was kind:
Repeated rapes betray a willing mind.

The following remark will serve for a supplement to this.

[E] Our romance-writers have not observed this.] It is certain that Mr or Madam de Scuderi, and the other writers of romances, their contemporaries, have violently shocked probability, whilst they have feigned their heroines were carried off, and yet will not permit us to believe, that they granted any favours to their lovers either by consent or force. I confess they would be infinitely more inexcusable, if they did not suppose as they do, that they were stolen, without any manner of consent of theirs. There are countries where there is no punishment inflicted on such as steal away young women who consent to it: which is the cause that these sorts of thefts are very frequent: and there is no body that believes the ravishers are very dilatory in point of enjoyment: the first lodging they come to is the utmost, and most people are even inclined to suspect, that enjoyment has preceded the escape. However it be, this sort of rape is generally followed with matrimony; because, if the parents did not consent to the marriage, they would find themselves burthened with a daughter dishonoured in all mens opinion, and who is not like to find any other husband unless some one can be content with another man's leavings. Let us confess then that romance-writers secure themselves from the greatest part of the ridicule, by the care they take to suppose that the damsel opposes as much as possible her being carried off: but yet they cannot come off clear; they overturn common notions, and form a system diametrically opposite to the judgment of the public, and to good sense. What motives have their heroes when they carry off a mistress? Do they want to declare to her that they die for love of her, and that her cruelties throw them into despair? They have declared that over and over, and they have not recourse to this violent method, till they know that she is determined to make another man happy, and to be for ever indifferent to them. Do they hope their sighs, so vainly wasted before they had provoked her, will move her under the lively resentment she is in against her ravisher? This is not probable: what they propose to themselves must then be to take advantage of the condition, which submits her to their discretion, and to bring her under such terms as shall make it her interest to be the first to talk of marriage: this is no doubt one of the views of those who carry off a young woman against her will. They persuade themselves that after she has been some months in their power, her reputation at least will suffer very much, and cannot be restored but by the nuptial benediction. And it is seen, that if others marry such girls, they are suspected to have taken up with the leavings of the ravisher. They are rallied upon it, and regarded as men of no delicate taste: a new charge this against the romance-writers, whose heroes are passionately desirous of marrying those mistresses, whom their rivals have carried off more than once. You will find criticisms upon all this in Parnassus Reformed. Cyrus complains there, that they had not given him a heroin of an unblamable character. 'You will doubtless, says he (35), judge by this discourse, that I am not satisfied with Mandana, and truly what would you have me to think of her, after she has been so often run away with? Should I believe that she escaped untouched from the hands of four men who carried her off? Or will those that are the least clear sighted in these mysteries, doubt that you have given me another's leavings? Methinks you should have put her modestly to other sort of proofs, these are too rude for things so frail, and Mandana was not a sort that could withstand so many assaults? It may be she might come off well from the first attack: I am willing to believe her so fortified with virtue, as not to surrender at the very first, and her honour might be safe, without, a miracle, in that ticklish incident? But relapses are mortal in these matters: a second carrying off ruins all: and a heroin who has no more than the remains of a shaken constancy, or perhaps less, makes but useless efforts to defend her self. Apollo lent an ear to that complaint, and pronounced this decree. 'We declare that we acknowledge none for heroes that are cuckolds, nor for heroines, those who have been carried off more than once (36). Sarasin's ballad upon the carrying off of Mademoiselle de Bouteville by Monsieur de Coligny (37), is another decree of condemnation: Here is the opinion of that fine wit.

least they have preferred the scene of adventures, to probability. Every Body knows that Helen was stole away by Paris, the son of Priamus, and that all Greece resented the injury Menelaus had received. Hence rose the Trojan war, which has been so celebrated by the poets. Paris losing his life in the last year of that war, his Brother Deiphobus supplied his place with Helen. The Grecians barbarously murdered him the night that Troy was taken: in which they were favoured by Helen as much as they could wish [F]. Menelaus behaved himself like a good-natured man; he reconciled himself to his wife without much difficulty, and took her very lovingly home again [G]. After his Death she was forced to fly, and to retire into the isle of Rhodes, where

Love praëtises a thousand arts,
To carry captive female hearts:
The soft sing-song, the converse sweet,
The tournament, the ball, the treat.
But, let who will the truth contest,
Still I affirm, the rape is best.
It is love's boasted master-piece,
Of all it's pains the readiest ease;
The shortest way to Chloë's bed,
And hits the very nail o' th' head.
That lover is a fool confess'd,
Who sees not, that the rape is best.
At first, I own indeed 'tis odds
But the dear nymph invokes the gods,
Calls heaven and earth to help: 'tis true;
But, if the lover know his cue,
The fair one shall herself protest,
That of all things a rape's the best.

And from beneath my head my sword convey'd,

Thus in her crime her confidence she plac'd,
And with new treasons would redeem the past.

She thought that this barbarous sacrifice was necessary to appease the fury of Menelaus: she would have made a better judgment, if she had considered more the good nature of that Grecian prince, and reflected less on the guilt of her own crimes.

[G] Menelaus . . . reconciled himself to his wife, without much difficulty, and conducted her very lovingly home.] That poor cuckold was so silly as to believe his wife consumed herself with grief in the house of Priamus, and this was the principal motive which induced him to make war against Troy.

'Tis said, when fair Hermione began To look with pity on another's pain,
Orestes an increas'd affection prov'd,
And, whom he fear'd to lose, more fondly lov'd.
So Menelaus, when to Crete he went,
Found, ev'n in absence from his wife, content:
But when soft Paris stole the Grecian dame,
The rape reviv'd the jealous husband's flame;
Redoubt'd passion seiz'd his amorous heart:
What husband from so dear a wife cou'd part?

Antiquity must needs be strongly persuaded of the good humour of cuckolds, since it represents the god Vulcan so easy to his wife. The god of our poet, when he caught one of his wife's gallants in bed with her, was content only to make them ashamed.
And for all that suffers himself to be melted with the soft caresses which she offered him, complaining that she entertained a distrust of his love.

These words of Montagne are too ingenious to displease the judicious in this place. But not to dissemble, I must needs own, there have been some so officious, as to do Menelaus the honour, to arm him with resentment against the infidelity of Helen. In the Troades of Euripides, he threatens to kill her; and she is forced to make use of all sorts of excuses to obtain pardon. She says, amongst other things, that after the death of Paris she often endeavoured to make her escape from Troy to the Grecian camp, and that the centinels surprised her endeavouring to come down the walls by a rope. She adds, that Deiphobus married her by force. Pausanias makes mention of a statue of Menelaus, pursuing Helen with his sword in hand, to kill her, when Troy was taken (44). But others suppose he threw away his sword when he saw her bosom, and suffered that treacherous bitch to kiss him, and returned her carefices.

[H] Where she came to a miserable end.] Nicostatus and Megapenthus, bastards of Menelaus, had expelled her from Lacedæmon. She retired to Polyxo, her relation, the widow of Tlepolemus, king of Rhodes, and regent of the kingdom during her son's minority. Polyxo, remembering that her husband died at the siege of Troy, and so looking upon Helen as the cause of her widowhood, resolved to be revenged of her: and, to that end, when Helen was bathing, sent women dressed in the habit of furies, who hanged her on a tree. The Rhodians, desirous to immortalize that accident, built a temple, which they called the temple of Helenia Dendritis. This I have from Pausanias (46). The author of the old and new Athens, has reason to say (47), that a thousand people talk of the fair Helen, who know nothing of her being hanged. What is said in Moreri's Dictionary, that one of her companions murdered her, is not true. You will find in Photius that she strangled herself, and that near the oak on which she hung, there grew an herb, which they called Helenion, which made people quarrelsome who eat of it (48). Pliny attributes very different qualities to this herb: it beautified women, and exhilarated those who mixed it in their wine (49). He observes (50), that it was said to spring from the tears of Helen. You will find in the same Photius (51), that Thetis put Helen to death, during the return of the Greeks; and, according to others, that she went with Menelaus into Taurica Cheroneſus in quest of Orestes, and that there they were both sacrificed by Iphigenia. I have read in Vigenere (52), that Herodotus relates that Nicostatus and Megapenthus expelled Helen, and that she retired to Rhodes to Polyxo, the widow of king Tlepolemus, and that Polyxo's maids hating Helen, because she had been the cause of their late lord's death, one day as she went out to recreate herself in an orchard without their mistress, they hung her up and strangled her on one of the trees. I find no such thing in Herodotus.

The Spanish monk whom I have above-cited, is grossly mistaken concerning the causes of the death of Helen. He says (53) that having retired to Rhodes, to Polyxena, wife of Ptolema, king of that isle, her conduct was very irregular, as it had always been from her earliest youth; that she fell in love with the king, and gave herself wholly up to his pleasures. Polyxena, enraged with jealousy, caused her to be hanged on a tree. Pausanias, adds he, affirms, that by reason of her having committed adultery with Ptolema, during the Trojan war, Polyxena put her to death. Judge by this, if that Spanish author is faithful, or skillful in his citations.

[I] The scandalous disorders of her life.] Several authors (54) have blamed her for her leudness, but especially Lycophron in his Cassandra, where he calls her παντάλακτες, that is to say, a woman of five husbands (55). . . . Euripides, in his Andromache, makes Hermione, Helen's daughter, to be thus reproached for the vice of her mother.

Μὴ τὴν τεκῆσαν τῇ φιλανδρίᾳ γυναι Ζήτει παρελθεῖν.

Strive not in love's soft business to excell
A mother's skill, who knew the trade so well.

. . . . Ptolemaeus Hephæstion in Photius, tells a very particular story, which confirms Helen's incontinence. The fact is, that a certain Arcadian, called Peritaneus, meeting Helen with Paris Alexander, in the country of Arcadia, had to do with her. But Paris, to chastise the adulterer, cut off his parts of generation. And hence they that are thus castrated, are, in Arcadia, called Peritanes. Lycophron has used her more severely, than to call her a wife of five husbands; they pretend that he called her dove, because of her lasciviousness, and bitch because of her impudence, or her promiscuous use of men (56). I do not see that those who would excuse Helen, alledge any other reason than this (57). But she was inticed by the gods to follow Paris (58). There is no crime whatever, but may be justified by the same apology. But I confess, that taking the method of Homer's scholiast, one might make a good apology. What he says is this (59). Alexander, son of Priamus, travelled out of Asia to Lacedæmon, where he formed the design of stealing Helen, who had lodged him in her palace: but she, who had been extremely educated, and loved her husband tenderly, would never consent to it, saying she liked a lawful marriage better than a shameful adultery, and that she chose rather to stay with Menelaus. So Paris not being like to succeed, it is said, that Venus betwought herself of a stratagem, which was to metamorphose Alexander into the shape of Menelaus, and that she cheated Helen by that means: for believing him to be the true Menelaus, she made no scruple to follow him, and to go even to his ships, where Paris having made her go aboard, presently boised his sails to the wind. Eustathius also, upon the same book of Homer, touches upon this story, and observes, that Penelope governed her self much more prudently: for though she thought she knew Ulysses again, yet she would not venture to gratify him with any thing, and especially to lie with him, till he had told her many particulars, and given her many signs, to assure her, that he was really her husband, and that she could not be mistaken (60).

[K] Did not prevent paying her divine honours. . . . and attributing miracles to her.] I have already spoke of the temple consecrated to her by the Rhodians. Pausanias makes mention of that which was built to her in the country of Lacedæmon (61). As to her miracles, racles, it suffices to observe, that she struck Stesichorus blind, who had ventured to slander her in his poems (62); and that she restored his sight upon his singing his Palinode (63). She bestowed extraordinary beauty upon an ugly girl, who was every day brought to her temple (64). See the article ACHILLEA, where we have said, she was the wife of Achilles in the other world; and that she knew how to make her self considerable there. See also Isocrates, in his panegyric on Helen; you will there find, that she not only obtained immortality, but also a divine power, which she employed in placing her brothers and husband in the number of the gods: so that if Castor and Pollux were capable of succouring those who during tempests made their prayers to them, it was because their sister had communicated that power to them, to prove to the world the metamorphosis she had wrought upon them. They were in their graves, when she made them gods. What is most laudable in this is, that having conferred the same gift on Menelaus, she desired to live with him eternally. Τὸς ἀδελφὸς ἰδὼν κατεχόμενος ὑπὸ τῆς περὶ αὐτὴν εὐσεβείας, εἰς θεὸς ἀνάγαγε· βολομένη δὲ πρὶν ποιῆσαι τὴν μεταβολὴν, ἔως αὐτοῖς τὰς τιμὰς ἐναργεῖς ἔδωκεν, ὥστ' ὁρῶμενος ὑπὸ τῶν ἐν τῇ θαλάττῃ κινδυνεύοντων σώζειν, οἱ τινες ἀν' εὐσεβείας αὐτὴς ἐπικαλέσονται· μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα Μενέλαος τῶσαυτὴν χρεὼν ἀπέδωκεν . . . ὥστε . . . ἡ μόνον . . . ἀλλὰ καὶ θεὸν ἀντὶ θνητῆς ποιήσασα σύνοικον αὐτῇ καὶ παρὲς αὐτῆς εἰς ἅπαντα τὸν αἰῶνα κατεστήσατο. Frater, qui fato jam concesserant, inter Deos retulit. Cui mutationi cum auctoritatem et fidem asserere vellet, honores ita manifestos eis dedit, ut in mari confecti, periclitantes serarent, quicumque ipsos p̄ invocarent. Deinde Menelao tantam gratiam retulit, ut . . . non tantum: . . . sed mortalem ejus sortem divinitate mutaret, eumque contubernalem sibi et afflorem in omne ævum constituerit (65). Isocrates alleges, as a proof of this, the practice of the Lacedæmonians, who offered sacrifices to Menelaus and Helen, not as to heroes, but as to gods. The same author observes, it was at Therapnæ that these divine honours were paid them. But Pausanias does not say, that Helen had a temple in that city: he only says, that that of Menelaus was there, and that it was believed that Menelaus and Helen were buried in it (66).

I wish that Theodoret had built upon the authority of Isocrates, and not upon that of Euripides, to insult the Pagans with their numbring so famous an adulteress as Helen among the gods. For though Euripides has feigned that she did not die, but was exalted to the heavens, by the favour of the gods, and immortalized, it does not follow from thence, that this was the opinion of the Pagans. The episodes of a tragedy were so much at the poet's disposal, that unless they were known to be true on other grounds, they were looked upon as the particular fictions of the tragedian. These are Theodoret's words: Καὶ τὴν Ἑλένην δὲ, μετὰ τὴν πολυθρήνητον καὶ παμπόλλην μοιχείαν, τῷ Μενέλαω χωρίσαντες, εἰς τὸν ἕβρον, ἢ θῆσαν Εὐεπείδης, ἀνήγαγον (67).

[L] It is not probable that Paris delayed enjoying her till they came . . . into an island. Homer, who gives him so much patience, did not do him much honour, according to the principles of gallantry (68). See to what end he mentions that circumstance of place. Paris, being vanquished by Menelaus, was miserably reproached by Helen. He prays her not to insult him, but to go to bed with him, pretending he never felt so much of the fire of love, not even when he enjoyed her first in the isle of Cranaë. Hereupon he rose from his seat to go to bed, and was followed by the fair Helen without any reluctance.

Jafon has a patience ascribed to him, more wonderful still than this of Paris would be; which makes it hard to discover, wherein your writers of romances employ their judgment. Ought they not above all things to stick to probability? And do not they transgress it, when they suppose, on one hand, Medea so much in love with Jafon, as to be carried by her passion into the greatest crimes, and, on the other, spending many months with him, without consummating the marriage? Observe too, that it had not been consummated so soon, but for the advice which was given to Jafon. Quem cum interrogaret Arete, quidnam esset judicaturus, respondit Alcinoüs, Si virgo fuerit Medea, parenti redditurum: sin autem mulier, conjugi. Hoc cum audiret Arete à conjuge, mittit nuntium ad Jafonem; & is Medeam noctu in antro devirginavit (70).

[M] That Menelaus did not ruin that monument. Here is a passage which would bring Homer off, if it were true. It is pretended, that on the shore of the main land, which is over-against the Isle of Cranaë, there was a temple of Venus, which Paris caused to be built, after that agreeable conquest . . . to testify the transports of his joy and gratitude. He gave this Venus the name Mignonitis, and called the territory Migionion, from a word signifying the amorous mystery that had been acted there. Menelaus, the unfortunate husband of that princess, 18 years after she had been carried away from him, went to visit this temple, the ground whereof had been witness to his misfortune, and the infidelity of his wife. He did not destroy it, but only placed on each side of the statue of Venus, the images of two other goddesses, viz. Thetis and Praxidice, meaning the goddesses of Punishment, to signify that he would not suffer the affront to pass unrevenge. But he had not the good fortune to see himself revenged of Helen; for she survived him (71).

The author of the News from the Republic of Letters, having cited this passage, adds this reflexion (72): These last words would furnish an occasion of criticizing, to any one that would seek it. For it is certain, that eighteen years after Helen was stolen, Menelaus had revenged himself, as amply as he could with, by the ruin of the kingdom of Priamus, the father of the ravisher. It is therefore very likely, that that image of the goddess Praxidice, had no reference to a future revenge, but to a revenge already taken, and it is not likely, that it had relation to any design of punishing Helen. For if Menelaus had not been sincerely reconciled to his wife, he would not have delayed so long to punish her. The history of that age assures us, that that artful woman made her peace with her husband, the very night the Greeks became masters of the town, which is very probable 'probable, considering the character good Menelaus has in the Iliad.' Be it how it will, I will not maintain on one hand, that there was no temple of Venus Migonitis, near the isle of Cranaë; nor acknowledge on the other, that Paris caused it to be built for the reason that is given. I keep to probability, which strongly inclines one to believe, that Paris enjoyed Helen before he left Lacedæmon. What should hinder him? Menelaus was in the isle of Crete (73); his presence could not have hindered Helen from favouring her handsome guest, who made love to her; his absence was still less capable of doing it. See how Paris used him, and ridiculed his absence:

[N] Some authors say that Paris did not long preserve his prize. It is pretended that he failed towards Egypt, and landed at the mouth of the Nile, called Canopus, where there was a temple of Hercules, which was a sanctuary to fugitive slaves. Some of Paris's slaves having fled thither, acquainted the priests with the action of their master; whereupon king Proteus ordered him to be seized, reproached him severely, and afterwards commanded him immediately to depart. But he kept Helen, with all the other things of which they had robbed Menelaus (77). It is added, that Paris had not enjoyed that woman, before his arrival in Egypt (78); a tale that I have already refuted. I do not know very well, how Proteus used her, and whether, whilst he waited till he should restore her to her rightful lord, he did not obtain the last favours from her (79). I only know, that Herodotus thinks it very probable, that she was never brought to Troy; for he could not persuade himself that Priamus could be so stupid, as to choose rather to keep that woman, than avoid the fatal consequences of a refusal (80). He thinks then, that the Trojans answered the Grecian ambassadors sincerely, that Helen was not at Troy, and that they ought to search after her in Egypt, where she was kept by king Proteus (81). The Grecians taking this answer for a sharp railery, prepared to besiege the town, which when they had taken, without finding Helen in it, they were persuaded she was with king Proteus; whereupon Menelaus set sail for Egypt, and recovered his wife from thence (82). There is such a prodigious medley of variations in mythological authors, that I do not wonder to find Servius saying (83), I. That Theseus, after he had slain Helen, gave her to Proteus king of Egypt, and that Menelaus recovered her out of Proteus's hands, after the war of Troy: so that that war was not kindled upon the account of the rape of Helen by Paris, but of the affront which the Trojans offered Hercules, in shutting their gates against him, when he was in quest of Hylas. II. That Helen was taken out of the hands of Proteus, to whom The-seus had given her, and put into the power of Menelaus, from whom Paris stole her.

I forgot to observe, that Proteus did not send Paris away, without leaving him some sort of consolation; for he restored him the picture of Helen (84). One of Lycophron's commentators applies to this very injudiciously, what Helen says in Euripides, that Juno, to punish Paris for not giving her the victory in the contest of beauty, gave him only a living image of Helen, instead of her real person, which image was formed in the air.

(84) See Canterus and Meursius upon Lycophron, ver. 113.

Ἥρα δὲ μεμρθεῖσ', ἔνεν' ἑ νικᾷ θεᾶς,
Ἐξνέμωσεν τᾷμ' Ἀλεξάνδρῳ λᾶχην.
Δίδωσι δ' ἐν ἑμ', ἀλλ' ἑμοιώσας' ἐμοὶ

Sed Juno moleste ferens, quod non vicisset Deas, Irritum fecit meum conjugium Alexandro:
Dedit enim non me: sed assimilatam mihi
Imaginem vivam, sub cælo compactam, Filio regis Priami: putavit autem se habere me,
Falsa opinione deceptus, cum non haberet (85).

(85) Eurip. in Prologo Helenæ, ver. 31, pag. m. 303.

Robb'd Priam's son of me, his promis'd bride,
And in my stead gave him an airy phantom, Bearing my semblance. And this the cheated boy

Vain thought!*

It is manifest, that the difference betwixt these two things lies not in this, as Canterus would have it, that Proteus is the actor in one, and Juno in the other. One may likewise observe, that Juno forgot her spirit of revenge on this occasion: Paris was as happy with a living image of Helen, as he would have been with the original. I remember I have read, that the poet Stesichorus said, that the Trojans, not knowing the true Helen, quarrelled among themselves about her image. Ὅσπερ τὸ τῆς Ἑλένης εἰδῶλον ὑπὸ τῶν ἐν Τροίᾳ Στρεσίχορος φησὶ γενέσθαι περιμύχνητον ἀγνοίᾳ τῶ ἀληθῆς. Quemadmodum Stesichorus Trojanos, inquit, veræ ignaros Helenæ de imagine ipsius invicem decertasse (86). This is, in the notion of some Libertines, an image of the disputes about religion.

(86) Plato, de Republica, lib. ix, pag. m. 738.

[O] Many fables have been vented about the birth of Helen. It has not been thought enough to say that she was born of an egg; they have added, that this egg fell from the orb of the moon, and that the women of that region lay eggs, from whence are bred men fifteen times bigger than those who inhabit the earth. This we learn from Athenæus (87), who says, upon the testimony of Herodotus of Heracles, that Neocles of Crotona had published it in one of his writings. Observe here some false quotations about that chimera. Cælius Rhodiginus (88) instead of Herodotus, says Herodotus. This error has been copied by Salmuth (89). Who could forbear laughing to read this passage in a Spanish physician? 'Nonne admirabilis adhuc in tota naturæ majestate rarissimum, quod mulieres quædam produxerit, quæ non more aliarum sætus, sed ova edant ac incubent, ex quibus homines nascuntur, qui ad gigantæam proceritatem excreverunt? Et tamen hoc in Selenitidis mulieribus accidere referunt ex Lycosthene Ravifius Textor, & ex Herodoto Heracleotes, ut quoque testator Rhodiginus, lib. 27. cap. 17. licet pro mera fabula hoc habeat Adrianus Junius, lib. 1. animad. cap. 15. citatus apud Pancirolum part. 2. memorab. titulo 2. histor. tamen cum iconæ exhibet (90). — Is it not still more admirable, and the most extraordinary thing in nature, that she has produced some women, who do not bring forth children as others do, but eggs which they hatch, and from which men are produced, which grow to a gigantic stature. wards by Paris, is said by all the ancients to have been the first inventor of various pastures in the field of Venus. She is likewise reported to have published some books on this subject. In which science she was followed by the wellknown Phileas, and Elephantis, who have left writings treating of these matters with no less accuracy than immodesty. If that be true it will cast an indelible stain on Helen's memory; for it is probable if that servant gave lessons to her mistress, her mistress intrusted her with their effect; and that so both Helen and Altyanassa joined their endeavours, to perfect those horrid inventions. I have read in Photius (112) that Altyanassa stole an embroidered girdle, which Juno had obtained of Venus to give to Helen; but that Venus took it away from that maid.

(112) Photius ex Ptolem. Hierophant. pag. 480.

[2] If the authors . . . had been good chronologers, her beauty must have lasted prodigiously. It is pretended that Helen and Castor were hatched from the same egg: We may well suppose then that Helen was a woman grown, when the Argonauts went to Colchos; for her two brothers, Castor and Pollux, signalized themselves in that famous expedition. Let us allow her twenty years at least, which cannot be too much. We will not take advantage of Eusebius's error; I will speak of that hereafter. Let us make use of the chronology that is most exact. About thirty years are reckoned betwixt that expedition and that of Troy. Helen then was fifty years old, more or less, when Paris carried her off. The siege of Troy lasted ten years, and it was in the last year of the siege that Agamemnon and Achilles quarrelled. Now the admiration Priamus's counsellors (113) expressed for the divine beauty of Helen, must be referred to a time posterior to that quarrel. Thus Helen, at sixty years of age, by the extraordinary lustre of her beauty, obliged a whole senate to confess that she deserved that two powerful nations should ruin one another in a ten years war for her sake. Is not this very wonderful? Paris having been killed some time after, there arose a warm dispute between his brothers, who should marry his widow. Priamus appointed a combat, and promised her to him who should obtain the victory. Deiphobus had the best of it, and carried Helen. Ἀλκίνοος τὸν ἑλάνης γάμον ἐπαδλον ἐθηκε τὸ αἰσιν-τεσσάνη κατά τὴν μάχην. ἀντίστοιχὸν δὲ γενναίῳ ἀγωνισμένῳ ἐγχευεν αὐτὴν ἡ ἰστορία παρὰ Διόδορον (114). One of his brothers (115) was so enraged with his loss, that he departed from Troy, and contributed all he could to the ruin of his country.

them is not very certain. A strange sort of rape, to see Helen ravished from herself, to see Helen, whom the three parts of the world, which then made all, acknowledged for the finest woman of her age, seeking for her face in a glass, which presented nothing now to her but what was frightful. That thought agrees with two verses of Ovid.

(122) Ovid. Metamorph. lib. xv, ver. 232.

I must observe that if we follow Eusebius's chronology, we shall find that Helen had lived above an hundred years, when Paris stole her; for, according to his calculation, the expedition of the Argonauts was eighty nine years before the taking of Troy. He had observed the misreckoning of the Greek authors, and therefore he made this objection to them: 'Si inter Argonautas fuerunt Castor & Pollux, quomodo potest eorum soror Helena credi, quæ post multos annos virgo rapitur à Theseo (123). — If Castor and Pollux were in the number of the Argonauts, how can Helen be believed to be their sister, who many years after was carried away a virgin by Theseus. Observe here Scaliger's remark upon this Latin. 'In Græcis, says he (124), ἡ μὲν μετὰ πολλὰ καὶ παρὰ τὴν ἀρχαίαν, quæ non multis post annis virgo capitur. Sive culpa librariorum, sive quod verosimilius, Hieronymi proferantia accidit, ut negatio in latina interpretatione expressa non sit, omnino ridicula sententia efficitur. Nam quo remotior fuerit raptus Helenæ eo credibilior erit. Contra quo propior his temporibus eo remotior à Trojæ excidio, ideoque minus credibile Helenæ tempus in hujus sæculi tractum incidisse. — The Greek says, Who not many years after was carried away a virgin. But whether by a mistake of the transcribers, or, which is more probable, by Jeron's hurry, the negative particle is not expressed in the Latin version, and by that means the whole sentence is made ridiculous. For the farther back the rape of Helen is placed, the more credible it will be. And, on the contrary, the nearer it is placed to these times the farther it will be from the taking of Troy, and therefore it will be less credible that the age of Helen fell into this period of time.' This criticism appears to me very false, and the more I examine it the more I am surprized at it. I do not deny but the negative particle, the omission whereof Scaliger thinks a fault in St Jerome, may make a good sense; but I cannot comprehend that the sense would be ridiculous if that particle were suppressed; and on the contrary Eusebius's objection seems more intelligible to all sorts of readers, without that negative particle than with it. Eusebius's design is to prove that those who have said, that Castor and Pollux, Helen's brothers, were in the voyage of the Argonauts, and that Theseus stole Helen yet very young, have but ill concerted the times. If Castor and Pollux, says he, were in the number of the Argonauts, how can we believe they were the brothers of Helen, who was stole away young by Theseus many years after? The most stupid readers perceive the force of the objection, without any need of reasoning, without having recourse to any thing but to the very words of Eusebius; but if we suppose with Scaliger, that Eusebius expressed it in this manner. If Castor and Pollux were in the number of the Argonauts, how can we believe they were the brothers of Helen, who was stole away young by Theseus a few years after? Every one sees, that to be sensible of this objection, we must take our eyes off from the words that contain it, and have recourse to the arguments and calculations that are found in the following pages; for if one only considers Eusebius's expressions, one would imagine that he reasoned ill, and brought a proof directly contrary to what he pretended to assert.

(124) Animadv. in Eusebium, n. 756, pag. m. 47.

Here are some other words of Scaliger which to me seem unexact. 'Ab hoc tempore (125), says he (126), ad excidium Ilii, anni sunt LXXIX, ut Helenam admodum animum fuisse oportuerit, si Argonautica hoc tempore contigerunt. Nam adultis Castoribus, Helenam quoque maturam viro fuisse necesse est. Quod si Argonautica hic collocentur, tempore excidii Iliaci Helena fuerit major annorum CXX. Hoc est quod objicit Eusebius & merito. — From this time that Scaliger did not observe, that Eusebius had already spoken of the Argonauts under the number 746.

the possession of an old woman. This would make them very ridiculous, as they were indeed; though we allow her all the beauty that the poets ascribe to her. See in Herodotus, what value ought to be set on a woman who suffers her self to be run away with [R]. Opinions are different concerning Helen's children: some say she had only daughters (f), others assure us, that Menelaus had four boys by her (g). A son too has been mentioned that she had by Achilles, (h). She had by Menelaus, the beautiful Hermione; and by Paris, a daughter named Helen, whom Hecuba put to death. (i) Ptolemaeus says, that the father would have had her named Alexandra; but, as the mother opposed it (i), they cast lots who should give the name. Helen won, and gave her daughter her own name (k). There has been much talk of Helen's necklace [S], and of her Crater, and

* time to the sacking Troy there are seventy nine years; so that Helen must have been very old, if the expedition of the Argonauts happened at that time. For when Castor and his brother were grown men, Helen must likewise have been marriageable. But if the expedition of the Argonauts be placed late, Helen must have been above 120 years old. This is what Eusebius objects, and with reason. That is, if there was seventy nine years betwixt the voyage of the Argonauts and the taking of Troy, Helen must needs be above 120 years old when Troy was taken. What consequence is here? Is this worthy of the great Scalliger? Must a maid be above forty years old to be said to be marriageable, matura viro? This is the expression of the author whom I confute.

He has succeeded much better in his animadversions upon Eusebius's calculations; for it is not true, that the expedition of the Argonauts, and that of Troy, were at such a distance from one another, as Eusebius imagines. But it is certain that Eusebius followed very famous writers; and consequently I may affirm that if the ancient authors, who speak of Helen, had been good chronologers, her beauty must have lasted a prodigious while; for it would be above a century! Let us consider a little the calculations, which Clemens Alexandrinus borrows from Apollodorus, and some other celebrated historians. In one place (127) he says that there were thirty eight years betwixt the beginning of Hercules's reign in Argos, after the expedition of the Argonauts, and his deification; and that Castor and Pollux were deified fifty three years after Hercules, about the time that Troy was taken. Which is to reckon ninety one years betwixt the voyage of the Argonauts, and the taking of Troy, and to make Helen an hundred years old, or thereabouts, at the time that Paris carried her off as an accomplished beauty. In another place (128) the same father makes a computation, which puts sixty eight years betwixt Paris's stealing Helen, and the expedition of the Argonauts.

[R] See in Herodotus what value ought to be set on a woman who suffers herself to be run away with. Herodotus tracing up to their first original, the long continued wars betwixt Europe and Asia, owns the Asiatics were the aggressors, as having stole away the daughter of Inachus king of Argos (129). The Europeans (130) who stole away the king of Tyre's daughter, only did it by way of reprisal. But they did not stop there, they engaged in a second rape, viz. that of Medea, daughter to the king of Colchus. That prince demanded satisfaction for the injury. They answered they would give him none, because they had never received any for the rape of Io. The rape of Helen was undertaken by way of reprisal, and when the Greeks redemanded her, it was answered that they would deal by them as they had dealt by the Asiatics, when they demanded back Medea. They were not satisfied with that answer, but raising a great army they went to destroy the kingdom of Priamus. See now what pleas the Persians had to justify their wars. They pretended that the expedition against Troy gave them a right to hold the Europeans for enemies, and to treat them as such. They disapproved of the violence of those who carry off a woman, but they looked upon those as fools, who busied themselves about recovering her; and considered them as wife who despised her; since no women are carried off but such as are willing. As for us, said they, we never minded the women that were stole from Asia: it was the Greeks who first made war for the sake of a woman of Lacedæmon.

αὖν ἡρώδης οὐτο. σφέας μὲν δὴ τὰς ἐκ τῆς Ἀσίας λέγουσι Πέρσαι ἀπαγαγεῖν τῶν γυναικῶν λόγον εἶναι ποιεῖσθαι. Σε γοῦν σεντρεῖν injuriorum virorum factum esse rapere feminas: amenitium vero, raptis ulciscendis operam dare: prudentium autem, pro nulla habere raptarum pulchritudinem: quippe quæ, nisi voluissent, baud dubie raptæ non fuissent. Eoque suarum seminarum ex Asia raptarum Persæ negant ullam se habuisse rationem (131). We must not omit Isocrates's observation here. The war of Troy, says he, was very advantageous to Greece: many things were invented during the continuance of it; and Europe began to have the superiority over Asia. Before that war, the Barbarians made conquests upon the Grecians. It was Helen that gave occasion to a new turn of affairs; for after that war, the Greeks took towns and provinces from the Barbarians (132).

We must not forget that passage of Euripides, where Peleus speaks such home-truths to Menelaus. He blames him especially for two great faults: the first was for having behaved to his wife as if she had been virtuous; the second was for having raised an army to recover her. You left her, says he, entirely at her own disposal; you left your house without ordering your doors to be locked, and your servants to look after her, as if she, who was the wickedest of women, had been very chaste.

ὧς δὴ γυναῖκα σώφρον' ἐν δόμοις ἔχων, Πασῶν κακίστην.

Linquens domum non clausam, Et sine servis,
Quasi haberet castam mulierem in ædibus,
Quæ omnium est pessima (133).

She ran away with a young stranger; and you, forsooth, for the love of her, must call all Greece to arms: you should, on the contrary, after you had found out her infidelity, have left her where she was, and rather have paid a tribute, than that she should ever have set foot in your house again.

Ἦν χρεὶν σ' ἀποπύσαντα, μὴ κινεῖν δόρυ,
Κακὴν ἐφρονεῖν, ἀλλ' εἰδὼν αὐτὴ μένειν,
Μισθὸν τε δόντα, μὴ ποτ' εἰς οἶκον λαβεῖν. (134) Id. ibid. ver. 607.

Quam oportebat se conspuentem non movere hastam,
Cum invenisses malam, sed sinere ibi manere, Mercedemque dare præterea, ne unquam in ædes eam reciperes (134).

Menelaus answers in a soft manner, that the adventures of his wife had been involuntary, and the work of fate (135), and that from thence great advantages to the Greeks had proceeded (136), who first began to learn the art of war, at the siege of Troy. This confirms Isocrates's observation.

[S] There has been much talk of Helen's necklace. Menelaus preparing for the expedition of Troy, went to Delphos with Ulysses to consult the oracle, and offered Helen's necklace there. Τότε δὴ Μενέλαος ἐπεὶ τὴν περὶ τοῦ ὅρακος (137) Ἀθηνᾶ τὸν τῆς Ἑλένης ὄρμον ἀνέθηκεν ἐν Δελφοῖς. Tunc sane Menelaus Providæ Minervæ monile Helenæ Delphis dedicavit (138). The oracle ordered him to do it, and promised by that means the punishment of the ravisher. προνοία.

Athenæus (139) has preserved the oracle's answer: it contains only three verses, which shew, that this necklace was made of massy gold, and that Venus had given it to Helen. When the Phœceans pillaged the temple of Delphos in the CVIth Olympiad, this necklace and of the Nepenthes which she made Telemachus, the son of Ulysses, drink [T]. It is said lace was a part of their booty; but it produced a strange effect; the lady who wore it became an infamous prostitute (140); she quitted her house to run all the world over, with a young Epirote whom she was in love with (141). It was either a very active contagion, or a manner of punishment very unworthy of the goddess to whom Menelaus had devoted it. It should rather have been by a natural than a moral evil, that this woman's boldness, who durst appropriate to her self the spoils of so sacred a place, ought to have been punished. See the remark [C] of the article EGIALEA.

Note that there are some who will have it, that the lady who got this necklace, was a leud woman before. It is said that the wives of those who plundered the temple disputed who should have the necklace of Helen, and that of Eriphyle, and that they at last decided it by lot. That of Eriphyle fell to a grave, severe woman, who afterwards killed her husband; the other fell to a very handsome, but very leud, woman (142).

[T] And of her Crater, and the Nepenthes, she made Telemachus, the son of Ulysses, drink.] The Crater was a work of Vulcan, and a nuptial present; for when Pelops married, Vulcan made him a present of it. Menelaus deriving his pedigree from Pelops, succeeded to that part of the inheritance, and lost it, when Paris carried away Helen, with the jewels and movables of his host. But it is pretended, that Helen threw this fine present into the sea, near the isle of Cos; which being found in the net of some fishermen, there arose a dispute concerning it, the conclusion whereof was, that it should be consecrated to Apollo. According to the author from whom I have this, it was a tripod (143); nevertheless, the interpreters (144) pretend, that Lycophron, Diogenes Laërtius, Apuleius, and Philostratus, have understood the same thing. Now Lycophron has called it (145), ταμείον νεπτήης: and these are the words of Apuleius (146), 'Nunquam apud eum (Homerum) marino aliquo & piscu- lento medicavit nec Proteus faciem, nec Ulysses ierobem, nec Æolus sollem, nec Helena CRATEREM, nec Circe poculum, nec Venus cingulum. — We never find in Homer, that Proteus made use of any thing from the sea, or of fishes, to enchant his face, nor Ulysses to enchant the furrow, nor Æolus the bellows, nor Helen the crater, nor Circe the cup, nor Venus the girdle.' As to Philostratus, he says as follows in the epistle dedicatory of the Life of the Sophists. Τὸς ἐφ' ὅτι τὸ αἶμα τὸ αἶμα ὑπάρχει, καὶ τὸ αἶμα τοῖς κατέει τῆς γυναικός, ὅπως ὁ νεπτήης τῆς ἑλένης τοῖς Αἰγυπτίοις φάρμακός. It does not seem to me, that either he, or Apuleius, speak of a particular vessel which belonged to Helen, as a piece of exquisite work. It is plain, that they allude to what Homer relates, in the fourth book of the Odyssey, touching the Nepenthe, viz. that Helen, to exultate Telemachus, the son of Ulysses, and her other guests, and to hinder them from attending to their misfortunes, mingled in their wine a little Nepenthe, which was I know not what, that had an extraordinary virtue.

Αὐτὴν δ' εἰς οἶνον βάλε φάρμακον, ἔνθεν ἔπινον.
Νηπενθὲς τ' ἄχολον τε, κακῶν ἐπὶ λανθόντων.
Ὅς τὸ καταβρόχθειεν ἐπὶ νῆν κρητῆρι μίγναι.

Ibi tum alia excogitavit Helena? Jove nata.
Protinus sane in vinum misit pharmacum unde bibebant.
Absque dolore & ira, malorum oblivionem inducens omnium
Qui illud deglutierit postquam crateri mixtum erit (147).

Helen had brought that wonderful remedy from Egypt, which she had learned of Polydamna, the wife of Theon. Homer says nothing at all about the vessel, VOL. III.

which contained the mixt wine; and therefore Apuleius and Philostratus consider there only the virtue of the Nepenthe, and consequently speak not of that fine vessel mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius, I mean the nuptial present, which Pelops received from Vulcan, &c. Call to mind here, what I have said in the first remark, in mentioning the cup which Helen offered to Minerva: and if you would know the reason why I have made use of the barbarous word Crater, I must tell you, it is because the words, glafs, cup, bowl, goblet, do not express what was meant by the word Crater in Homer's time. 'The Crater was a great vessel, which was not used to drink in, but only to mingle wine with water, . . . and from this vessel they took out the wine thus mingled with cups, or they first poured it into pots and pints, and then into drinking cups (148).' Note, that the vessel mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius, was thrown into the sea before the Trojan war, but that spoken of by the others, was in Menelaus's possession after that war.

I ought not to forget, that some learned men have made Homer's Nepenthe the subject of their studies and meditations; they have made many conjectures and have built several hypotheses. See Peter Perit's dissertation, intitled Homeri Nepenthes, and printed at Utrecht in the year 1689, in 8vo. There is both wit and learning in it. The author speaks of a civilian of Naples, who has treated of the same matter, and has given himself up to all the excuses of the spirit of digression. I insert this picture of that author, because it very naturally represents the character of an affectation of displaying all that one has read; and because likewise one may observe in it many frothy imaginations, concerning the Nepenthe. 'Non morabor hic studiosos variis questionibus, ut Petrus la Sena, an Nepenthes ex eorum numero esset medicamentorum quæ chimica arte parantur, an simplex quid & solius naturæ proprietate effiac. His igitur (inquam) quæ nihil ad rem attinent, prætermisiss, aio Nepenthes fuisse unum e terra nascentibus quoddam scilicet herbæ aut virgulti genus (149). — I will not here detain my readers, as Peter la Sena doth, with various questions, as whether the Nepenthes was drug prepared by Chymistry, or a simple medicine; and all this, that he may have an occasion of giving out of his common places, all that he had read concerning the origin & antiquity of that art. With this he fills several pages, and abuses the patience of his readers. His laborious dissertation concerning the virtues of gems, is no less vain and superfluous, as if it was not obvious from Homer's description, that the Nepenthes was a plant as he himself afterwards owns. He owns that it is not worth while to spend time in enquiring, whether this potion of Helen's owed it's virtue to magic, and yet he is very copious concerning the magic of the Egyptians, and the incantations of the ancient physicians, and quotes passages out of Homer's Odyssey, which are thought to relate to magic, by those I mean, who, as Pliny tells us, think that what he says of Proteus and the Syrens songs, is to be so understood. He next subjoins a great deal concerning Helen's crater, taking said also that when she was going to be sacrificed, she was saved by a miracle [U]: And they have endeavoured to excuse her adulteries, by saying she was forced to them by the Gods [X]. The Heathens have made use of such like suppositions on so many occasions, that it will not be unreasonable to enquire what could have induced them to reason in that manner. I will bestow a remark upon this head [Z].

taking occasion from a passage of Cælius Rhodiginus. And is there any thing more absurd than his bringing in the jest put upon Zeno, because he was of a tall slender make? neglecting therefore these questions, which are nothing to the purpose, I say that the Nephews of Meré imagine, that the Nephews was nothing else but the charms of Helen's conversation. See how he expresses himself in a treatise, where he addresses his discourse to a lady. Though Homer doth not enlarge upon the eloquence of Helen, he who speaks so much of that of Ulysses and of Nestor, he omits not however, by a mystery of poetry, to make us sensible, that it was a pleasure to hear her speak; and here is in a few words, what gives me reason to think so. Ulysses wandered a long time after the sacking of Troy, without being able to return into his isle of Ithaca; his son Telemachus was in pain about him, and, to know whether he was alive or dead, he made a visit to Nestor, who could not inform him what was become of him. From thence he continued his voyage, and came to Menelaus, where he had a fight of Helen, and supped with her. He was very melancholy, and that prince's having pity on him made use of a charm to make him forget all his sorrows. That charm, saith Homer, was a liquor which she mingled with the wine, before she sat down to table, which potion was of such a virtue, that after one had tasted it, it was impossible to shed a tear all the day after. She had another excellent secret, which was given her by the goddesses of the Graces. You know, Madam, that there is no lady who can imitate the sound of your words; but if she had observed you, she had made herself so perfect mistress of your voice and manners, that she would have been mistaken for you (150).

[U] She was saved by a miracle. The miracle was this: a great plague depopulated the town of Lacedæmon: the gods let them know that health should be restored, provided they sacrificed every year a maid of quality. The lot fell once upon the fair Helen; but as she was led to the altar, an eagle stooped and took away the knife, and put it on an heifer; and for this reason Helen's life was spared (151).

[X] They have endeavoured to excuse her adulteries, by saying she was forced to them by the gods. I have touched upon this point already (152), but there is something wanting. If some say, that Venus contrived this rape, to testify her gratitude to the judge, who had determined the cause in the dispute of beauty in her favour; others assure us, that she did it to revenge herself for an affront. Menelaus had promised her a hecatomb, in case he should obtain Helen; but having gained what he desired, he took no care of his vow. Venus took this heinously, and, to punish him, contrived the carrying away of his wife (153). Others date the original of this higher; they pretend (154) that Tyndarus forgot Venus in a sacrifice that he offered to all the gods; and that in punishment of this contempt, Venus made all the daughters of that prince bigamists, trigamists, and elopers from their husbands. The best of all was, that the same goddess, who had pushed Tyndarus's daughter into these disorders, reproached him for their adulteries. It is said, that these reproaches touched him so sensibly, that, to be revenged on her, he put her feet in irons. Pausanias cannot believe, that Tyndarus was so ridiculous as to imagine he could revenge himself on Venus, by a making a statue, which he should call by her name, and tying it by the legs. But in this the historian was unacquainted with his own religion. He did not know, that, on many occasions, the heathens discharged their fury upon the temples and statues of the gods, whom they believed the authors of their ill success (155). And, in effect, is it not affronting a prince to abuse his pictures and statues? consider the indignation of Theodosius against the city of Antioch; nothing moved him more sensibly, than the outrages that were done to the statue of the empress during the sedition. See his history writ by Mr Flechier (156). For the rest, (156) Pag. 347, I must declare that when I spoke of the reproaches made by Venus to Tyndarus, I have only reported the opinion of some moderns, who have been misled by the translation of Pausanias. It is certain, that the Greek text does not import, that this goddess had reproached Tyndarus in that manner: they who understand the Greek tongue, will see that I am not mistaken.

Τὸν γὰρ δὴ ἔτερον λόγον, ὡς τὴν Θεὸν Πέδαις ἐπιμαρτυροῦτο ὁ Τυνδάρων γενέσθαι τὰς θυγατέρας ἐξ Ἀφροδίτης ἡγούμενος τὰ ὄνειδον, τὸν δὲ ἐπὶ τὴν ἀρχὴν προσέειπε. ἢ γὰρ δὴ (157) These equivocal words, but which express more plainly the reproaches translation; Nam Deam ulcisci voluisse compedidit (sunt enim qui hoc etiam memoria prodiderint) exprobrantem (157) illi filiarum adulteria, ut credam, adduci non possum. Quam enim ridiculum, si putasset ab effigie, quam ei cedro fecisset Veneris nomine, injectis compedibus pœnas expeti posse (158).

[Z] I will bestow a remark upon this. Menelaus answering the severe reproaches of Peleus, declared, that the will of Helen had not been the cause of those adventures which she had undergone, but that it was done by the will of the gods.

Helena vero venit in ærumnas non volens, sed divinitus (159).

This language was common enough among the Pagans. They imputed to fortune, that is to say, to Reflexions Go D, not only their ill success, but also their faults. Upon the Pagan This excuse, or this miserable comfort, seemed to be saying the gods always at hand, and they presently had recourse to it. forced them to Plutarch teaches us this, in rehearsing some verses, which contain what a father said to his son, and the son's answer.

The gods, son, charge poor mortals oftentimes. Anf. 'Tis easy, Sir, on gods to lay our crimes.

You will imagine perhaps, that the great ease men found in making complaints against the gods, inclined them to make use of that subterfuge, without consideration and reflexion, and that it was one of those first motions that arise in our minds, before we have time to prepare ourselves to judge of things; but it is certain, that in many instances they spoke in this manner, after mature consideration. They who examine not to the bottom, what passes in their own breasts, easily persuade themselves that they are free, and that if their will inclines them to evil, it is their own fault, as being by a choice of which they are masters. They who pass another judgment, are persons who have carefully studied the springs and circumstances of their actions, and have well considered the progress of the motion of their souls. These persons for the most part doubt of their free-will; and proceed even to persuade themselves, that their reason and their understandings are slaves, incapable of resisting the force which drags them where they had no mind to go. Now it is this sort of persons especially who charged the gods as the causes of their evil actions. They remembered, that they had well considered, that they were going on in a way pernicious to their fortune, and scandalous to their reputation, and that they had made many endeavours to destroy the passion that made them continue in it; but they remembered still better, that all these endeavours had been useless, and that reason, though called to their assistance a thousand times, and vows and prayers, had been very weak helps. They concluded then, that it must be an occult cause, some superior force, that drove and dragged them; in a word, that the gods were the cause both of the passion which they felt, and of the pernicious and criminal consequences of those passions. Here then is the unfolding of the mystery: there is, said they, something divine in it, just as in some bodily distempers which nonplus the skill and experience of the ablest physicians. We know what we ought to do, what would be most useful, advantageous, and honourable, for us, and nevertheless we take a contrary course. This is the doing of the gods. The poet Perseus addresses himself to Jupiter, to beg the favour that he would be pleased to make tyrants acknowledge the power of virtue, and feel the severest regret for not having pursued it.

Plutarch recites a poetical sentence, which shews that the heathens reasoned in this manner: they who know good, do it not; therefore the gods are the cause of it. I put his Greek words in the margin (162). Medea argued in this manner, when she found she could not resist the love she entertained for Jason, when she could not, I say, resist it, though she clearly saw the shameful and criminal consequences of her conduct, and that her own reason condemned them.

Mean while Medea, seiz'd with fierce desire,
By reason strives in vain to quench the raging fire.
But strives in vain; some god, she said, withstands,
And reason's baffled counsel countermands.

Wretch, from thy virgin breast this rage expel,
And soon, as could I! all would then be well.
But love, resistless love, my soul invades, Discretion this, affection that, persuades.
I see the right, and I approve it too,
Condemn the wrong, and yet the wrong pursue.

She proposed to herself all the arguments that might cure her of that passion; she represented to herself the heinousness of the fault which she should commit, and she had some intervals, wherein these lively images of duty were ready to carry the victory, but the sight of Jason easily defeated all her resolutions.

But seeing Jason there, again they rag'd.

So in her breast the sleeping passions rise,
When kindled by the hero's sparkling eyes.

GARTH.

Abundance of people of both sexes, whom history has made no mention of, have found themselves in the same condition. Love has made them commit a thousand faults, whereof they have seen the shame and danger so clearly, as to have endeavoured to prevent them, by calling reason to their assistance, and making many wishes against their passion. It was natural for them to conclude, that they were not the cause of their evil conduct, inasmuch as they had a reasonable understanding, and a soul that was free, and mistress of it's will. This first conclusion led them to another, which was, that some cause, that was external and superior to all their forces, sway'd them. This second conclusion made them draw this third, that some god was an external and necessitating cause. This was the original of the pretended divinity of Venus and Cupid; and because we find by experience that jealousy, envy, avarice, drunkenness, the desire of revenge, and many other passions, make men commit a thousand things which reason condemns, and which are even contrary to the true interest of self-love, and which one would not wish for, it has been believed that the gods infligated us to these things. The heathens did not accuse them therefore because they made no reflexions, but rather because they made a great many observations upon what passed in the soul. If the Pagans had had the just idea of God that we have, which represents him to us as a being perfectly holy, they would have secured themselves from that rash judgment; but attributing to the gods the same faults that men are subject to, nothing hindered them from believing the gods urged men on to evil, and rendered the light of reason ineffectual, sometimes by a flattering view of pleasure, which necessitated the will; at other times by importunate pain, which had the same effect. Paris was agreeable to Helen, and Jason to Medea; they could not think of their union with these objects, without feeling before-hand an incredible satisfaction; nor could they consider themselves as separated from them, without feeling a great torment. These impressions depended not on their liberty, and were no more under it's command, than the agreeable or disagreeable sensations we feel upon tasting honey or gall. All that these two women could do, was to oppose reason and duty to these two fortresses; feeble weapons, if Paris and Jason continued to raise the same ideas and the same impressions; since in that case they would captivate their will sooner, or later, and extort a consent from it, whatever desire it had to be unsubdued, and to pass from love to indifference. Useless are the vows, weak the velleities, in the presence of those foretastes I have spoke, and whose cause proceeds not from ourselves. Whence proceeds it then? the Pagans might well look for it on all hands, they could not abate her charms. A French author pretends she had a great deal of wit and eloquence, and was as amiable for that as for her beauty (1) [AA].

not find it upon the earth, and for that reason they attributed it to the gods. This they might do two ways, either by supposing a Cupid who wounded the heart, or by supposing that the author of human bodies had adjusted the parts of them with such an artifice, that, for example, that of Jason should excite in the heart and head of Medea, those motions of the spirits on which love mechanically and inevitably depends. According to this last principle, if Helen or Medea fell in love, he must be blamed who has fashioned and arranged the parts of their bodies; just as if a chimney should smoke when the wind blows, this must not be imputed to the wind, but to the Mason who made the chimney.

most passions and their effects are involuntary.

This was an abyss the Pagans could not get out of, and they must needs fall into it, as often as they pretended to give a reason of the contrariety that is found betwixt what we do and what we know; and consequently they fell into it very often: for humane life is hardly any thing else but a continual combat betwixt the passions and the conscience, in which the latter has generally the worst of it. And what is the most strange and odd in this battle, is, that the victory very frequently declares for the side, which shocks all at once the ideas we have of virtue, and the knowledge which we have of our temporal interests. I am willing to believe there are many so brutishly stupid, as not to see that their life would be more happy, if they did not cherish in their breasts the passions which they cherish there; but I cannot believe but that the greatest part of the jealous and envious, are fully persuaded that it would be an incomparable temporal advantage to be exempt from jealousy and envy, and worthy to be purchased at any rate. A woman jealous of her husband or gallant, a husband jealous of his wife or mistress, are persons who have the most lively sense of their misery, and passionately wish to be delivered from this tormentor. They do all that is possible to drive away this fury which persecutes them; they employ all the reasons their mind can suggest to them to deceive or undeceive themselves; but in spite of all these efforts jealousy stands its ground, and they find, to their great regret, that they are more ingenious at inventing what can nourish it, than what can weaken it. The same ailment may be said of the envious; they know very well that self-love would find its account incomparably better, in being content with their own condition, and looking on the prosperity of others with pleasure, than in afflicting themselves because your neighbour is advanced and enriched above them; yet nevertheless in spite of their knowledge they torment themselves and pine away, when they see the good fortune of others (167), and instead of rejoicing at it, as they ought to do for their own advantage, they are reduced to seek some remedy in base and perfidious actions. By reproaches and treacherous blows, they oppose their neighbour's success, and thereby endeavour to mitigate the malignant fever that preys upon them. What could a Heathen philosopher say to this? ought not he to acknowledge a superior cause in it, and rank all this sort of people in the number of phantoms, the possessors of the enthusiast, and, in general, of all those whom they believed to be acted by a divine furor (168)? Note, that Ovid supposes that the jealousy which Aglaure, the daughter of Cecrops king of Athens, conceived against her sister, was inspired into her by a divinity (169). The true system of the Christians is the only one that can resolve these difficulties; it teaches us, that since the first man fell from the state of innocence, all his posterity have been subjected to such corruption, that without a supernatural grace they are necessarily slaves of iniquity, inclined to do evil, unprofitable to all good (170). Reason, philosophy, the ideas of virtue, the knowledge of the true interest of self-love, all this is unable to resist the passions. The empire which was given to the superior faculty of the soul, over the inferior, was taken from man, from the time of Adam's sin. Thus it is that divines explain the change which this sin introduced; but as the greatest part of metaphors must not be pressed beyond a certain point, we must not abuse this; for it would not be reasonable to say, that in the state of innocence, the inferior faculty was in the same condition it is at present, but that no disorder could arise from it, because the superior could always seasonably interpose to withstand it. This would be to suppose that the body of man, as it came from the hands of his creator, was actually inclined towards sensuality and blameable passions, this would be to injure the perfections of the supreme being.

[Z] She cut off her hair being in mourning What I have to say upon this point was communicated to me by a professor at Geneva (171): I will transcribe his words. 'The subject of the first letter of John Michael Brutus's collection, is diverting: Victorius, who writes to John della Casa, pretends that Helen, to express her sorrow for the death of her sister Clytemnestra, cut off her hair to the root, without prejudice to her beauty; and Monsignor della Casa is of opinion, that she only cut off the ends, as is sometimes done to hinder them from branching; and he produces on this subject some verses of an ingenious poem of that archbishop, addressed to count Geleazzo de Florimont, wherein the prelate makes an ingenious confession, that he has not quitted the world but very superficially, and that so he has imitated Helen, who sacrificed to her grief for her sister only the extremities of her locks: the poetry of it is noble.

When Menelaus, Troy in ashes lost,
Return'd, with Helen, to his native coast,
Where the sad news of poor Electra slain
By mad Orestes, gave him added pain:
Fore'd by a law, which tyrant custom made,
Her hair to offer to her sister's shade,
Fair Helen clipt th' extremes alone, 'tis said.
To spare the honours of her head she chose,
Left, shorn too close, she left shou'd please the beaux.
So I, whom lately wandring error drew
To follow Paris, and the Phrygian crew, Reason return'd, and judgment now set right,
Put off the trappings of too rash a flight.

The fashions of head-dresses may be so diversified, that some may be found where the charms of a face may not perhaps suffer any diminution by the loss of hair; but in general it is certain this loss is reckoned a very dreadful accident to beauty. See the note [C] in the article ANACREON.

[AA] A French author pretends she had a great deal of wit, and eloquence, and owed her conquests to these as much as to her beauty. That French author is the chevalier de Meré: he proves, by two great examples, that women ought not to put too much confidence in their beauty, nor men in their genteel carriage, and that it is address, and the turn of wit, which does almost all in all, provided the person has but nothing disgusting in him (172). The first example is Cleopatra: she had no great share of beauty, saith he (173), and as the world spoke of her, she was not so handsome as to surprise at the first sight: but when she came to be considered, she was charming to a miracle, and it was by the delicacy of her manners, that she kept Cæsar enchanted three or four years. . . . For a certain proof that it was her wit that made that prince so admired, we may observe that Antony, who had as nice a taste as Cæsar, did not see her till an age, in which few women retain their beauty; yet he became so desperately in love with her, that he chose rather to renounce the empire of the world, than to lose her out of his sight. See here his second example.

Aux rares beautez de son corps

Ajoutant de l'esprit les aimables thresors;

Causa l'embrasement de Troye.

Si son esprit n'eust eu des charmes

Ce peuple n'eust jamais voulu,

Contre le droit des gens d'un pouvoir absolu;

Pour la garder prendre les armes.

La Grece aussi l'eust oubliée

Entre les bras de son amant,

Mais elle fe souvint de son esprit charmant,

Et la guerre fut publiée.

The force of wit and beauty cou'd destroy

Trojans and Greeks (renew'd in ancient song)

For vulgar wit had never fought so long.

But the remembrance of her wond'rous charms

Kindled revenge, and set all Greece in arms.

There is great probability, Madam, that her beauty was not alone, since all the gods interested themselves to give it to those whom they favoured; and if she had no more than a good face and a fine shape, they must have made them but an indifferent present. I imagine that what they more esteemed in her, was the art of pleasing which she possessed, and of making herself beloved by her conversation (174). Add to this the words of the same author, which I have related in mentioning the Nepenthes (175).

I do not examine whether he be in the right as to the particular instance of the beautiful Helen; but his maxim in general seems to be true (176). Beauty without the charms of wit and language, is of no great force; and if it makes any conquests, it is after the manner of those brave generals, who quickly subdue a province, but know not how to keep it: The empire of the fair is at least as much maintained by the charms of wit, as by those of the face. These are two sorts of graces that stand in need of one another, and mutually perform good offices to each other. Some insipid and ridiculous discourses would be extremely distastful, if the beauty of the person did not lend them. I know not what charms to adorn them: and some beauties of the body would make no impression, if they did not borrow charms from the graces of the mind. These are assistances that are reciprocally given. But as the wit is most times the principal instrument in preserving the conquest, and very frequently in making it, it may be asserted to be that which contributes most to the establishing the dominion of beauty. The poet that assures us, there is no less force required to preserve than to obtain a conquest,

Non minor est virtus, quam quærere, parta tueri:

Casus inest illis; hic erit artis opus (177).

Not less the boast to keep, than to acquire:

Chance may bestow; to keep, will art require.

is one of the greatest legislators in the empire of love; and he applies that sentence to the case we are now treating of. Nay, he goes farther, he will have the acquisition to be less difficult than the preservation.

Nunc mihi, si quando, Puer & Cytheræ, favete:

Nunc Erato: nam tu nomen amoris habes.

Magna paro; quas possit Amor remanere per artes

Dicere, tam vasto pervagus orbe puer (178).

Thy aid, bright goddess of the Cyprian shore,

And, Erato, thy favour I implore.

Vast my design, to fix love's fleeting joy,

And show what arts confine the wanton boy.

This is likewise the opinion of many historians, concerning the progress of arms (179).

HELIODORUS, a native of Emesa in Phœnicia (a), is more known by the romance which he composed in his youth [A], than by the bishopric of Trica (b) to which he was afterwards preferred. There are few who believe that he was deposed by a synod, because he would not consent to the suppression of that romance [B]. Nicephorus

(a) Heliodor. Æthiop. lib. x, sub. fin.

(b) In Theophyl.

[A] The romance which he composed in his youth.

The title of it is Αἰθιοπικά, and it contains the amours of Theagenes and Chariclea. We find an extract of it in Photius (1). Mr Huet is of opinion that Heliodorus has been, with respect to writers of romances, what Homer was with respect to poets; that is, that his work has served as an original and plan for a great number of succeeding romances. Eum sibi sequentium temporum fabulatores Romanesque tanquam exemplum proposuerunt ad imitandum, & tam erede omnes dici possunt ex hoc fonte, quàm Poetæ ex Homericis suas, sic ut dicam, aquas hausisse (2). The first edition of this book is, as I take it, that of Basil 1534. Opiopæus, who dedicated it to the senate of Nuremberg, assures us, that a soldier saved the manuscripts, when the library of Buda was pillaged (3). Stanislaus Warzewiczki, a Polish knight, is the author of the Latin translation, which was printed at Basil, with the Greek, in the year 1551. Amiôt began his French versions with this work. Melin of St Gelais, bishop of Angoulême (4), has turned a good part of it into French verse (4). John Bourdelot's notes upon this romance are very learned; they were printed at Paris in the year 1619, with the Greek of Heliodorus, and the translation of the Polish knight.

[§ a] If Sorel has said what Mr Bayle seems to make him say, to wit, that the poet Melin de St Gelais was bishop of Angoulême, he must neither have consulted the Elogies of Sammarthanus, nor the Gallia Christiana. It was Orlavian de S. Gelais, natural father of Melin, who was bishop of that city. He lived under Charles VIII and Louis XII, and several pieces of poetry of this bishop, are to be found in a collection in 4to. in Gothic characters, intitled Verger d'Honneur.

It is surprising that Mr Bayle suffered such a mistake to escape him; it has probably been occasioned one of those by inattentions, to which the greatest genius's are subject. In copying Sorel (a), from whom he has taken this, he has not observed this author's mistake; otherwise he would have, as usual, acquainted us with it. Sorel likewise probably fell into this, led by inadvertency; but still it is a great fault, since, besides Mr Bayle, this has made the author of the Essais de Literature (b), and even the famous Mr Fabricius (c), fall into the same error. Instead of Melin de St Gelais, he ought to have said Octavain de St Gelais, his father, who was indeed bishop of Angoulême (d), and who was the person they meant. However neither du Verdier (e), nor la Croix du Maine (f), nor any other author that I know, has made mention of this translation in verse, of a part of the amours of Theagenes and Chariclea; and Sorel is perhaps the only person who has spoke of it.

By the by, I shall observe that in the Incunabula Typographiæ of Brughem, pag. 176, they have changed this Orlavian de St Gelais into Orlavianus de St Gervais. This is to disfigure names strangely. R E M. 364. C R I T.]

[B] There are few who believe that he was deposed by a synod, because he would not consent to the suppression of that romance. Nicephorus relates, that a synod having given Heliodorus his choice, either to burn his romance or renounce his bishopric, the author chose rather to cease from being a bishop than to throw his work into the fire (5). This seems fabulous; a thing so remarkable, would have been related by many historians; and we should not have had it preserved only by Nicephorus, a man of great credulity and little judgment. Quæ omnia eo me facile reducant, ut diffidam iis maxime quæ addit Nicephorus, scriptor credulus, sapientiæ & fidei non satis spectatæ, Sy nodum scilicet Provinciale cognito periculo, in quod lectio fabulæ hujus, cui auctor sui dignitas tantum ponderis & autoritatis dabat, juvenes suaspe naturâ ad id propensos & quasi nutantes impelleret, eam ipsi conditionem obulisse, ut aut opus suum cephorus is the only author who says so. Socrates (c) says, that Heliodorus introduced the custom of deposing ecclesiastics, who lay with their wives after their ordination. This is a favourable prejudice for the chastity of that prelate. His romance even shews him to be a lover of this virtue. For the hero of the piece is of such a modesty as has given occasion to severe raileries [C]. The translator of Photius does not well express flammis aboleret, aut sua dignitate cederet; eumque, quod ultimum erat, prætulisse (6). — All these things make me doubt, especially what Nicephorus adds, (a credulous author, and of no great judgment or credit) to wit, that a provincial synod, being aware of the danger into which the reading of that romance might lead the youth, who are too prone by nature to be hurried away by that passion: and considering that the dignity of it's author would make it still more dangerous, offered him these terms, that he should either burn his book, or resign his bishopric, and that he chose the last. Would Socrates have been silent of it in the passage where he says that Heliodorus composed some books of love in his youth? Οὐ λήγεται παρρησια ἐρωτικά βιβλία, ἃ νῦν ἐν ἐταῖροις καὶ ἀδιστοῖς προσηγορεύουσιν: Cujus nomine circumferuntur amatorii libri quos ille dum juvenis effret composuit, & Æthiopicos inscripsit (7). — Under whose name we have some books of love adventures, which he composed in his youth, and intitled Æthiopics. Valefius, not content to reject as a fable what Nicephorus tells, will not so much as believe that this romance was composed by Heliodorus the bishop. See his notes upon this passage of Socrates. Let us hear what Mr Sorel says. I cannot believe that Heliodorus was a bishop, and so foolish as to choose rather to lose his bishopric than to burn his book, according to the option that was given him. These are little stories forged at pleasure; for if his book was so scandalous, that it could not be suffered to be published, they would not have failed to have forbidden it, tho' he had quitted his dignity, so that he would have lost his aim (8). This author had better have given his judgment without any reason; for the reason he offers is good for nothing. The condemnation of a book by a synod, does not hinder it from being read, known, and commended according to it's merit; and consequently Heliodorus would not have been defeated of his end, tho' the bishops, who gave him his choice, had condemned his romance. Father Vavasseur has argued in a more solid manner, in saying that it was no longer in Heliodorus's power to suppress his book; from whence we ought to conclude that the bishops did not give him that option which is pretended. What advantage could accrue to morality from it? Neutrum, quantum opinio mea est, vere dicitur. Neque lata Episcopo conditio tam præpostera, tamque gravis: neque ab illo accepta, aut repudiata quoquo modo: quod ipse, qui narrat, abunde narratione sua refellit. An vero fuit in potestate Heliodori, ut aboleret igni, ac perderet opus suum, aut omnino suppressum teneret, quod jam exisset in vulgus, & manibus omnium evolveretur, quodque juvenis periculo aliquo, damnoque morum, ut vult Nicephorus, legendo contrivisset (9). —

(9) Vavasseur, de
pag. 150.

Neither of these, in my opinion is true, either that so preposterous and hard conditions were imposed on the bishop, or that he accepted of, or refused, them in any sort: the relater of the story methinks abundantly confutes it. For was it any longer in the power of Heliodorus to destroy or altogether to suppress his work which had been published, and was in every body's hands, and which, as Nicephorus pretends, had been so well received by the youth as to endanger their morals? He adds, that Petavius did not think this story of Nicephorus worthy of any credit.

[C] The hero of the piece is of such a modesty as has given occasion to severe raileries. Observe a little this passage of Parnassus Reformed, where Theagenes speaks. 'If things had been faithfully reported as they were transacted, I should have no reason to complain, I should not find fault with my romancer: but he represents me as an insensible creature, and attributes to me that stupid baseness, which is offended with the most innocent liberties; making me give my mistress a box on the ear, rather than permit her to kiss me. It is my part (Chariclea interrupts him) to complain of the box on the ear you speak of. If it be scandalous for you to have given it, it is much more so for me to have received it, and the reparation you may pretend to expect from Heliodorus, belongs to me alone.' Now observe Heliodorus's answer. The box on the ear which disturbs you, is an argument of your modesty, says he to Theagenes; it is the effect of a virtue which is much to your advantage, and thereby I have preserved that decorum which the dignity of my character obliged me to. It is true, replied Theagenes, that for a bishop (10), you have represented your own character well enough in that place, but you would have represented it better, if you had burnt your romance, or if you had never thought of writing it. Lovers have nothing to do with episcopal virtues, and bishops do not well agree with the liberties of lovers. A vestal chastity ill becomes heroes, whose love ought to be disengaged from all those scrupulous formalities which check it's noble transports and charming raptures. It is observable that the author is supposed to have nothing to answer to Chariclea's complaint. And indeed what could be said to an accusation so well grounded? the heroine of a romance, who would kiss her lover, and receives a box on the ear from him in return from the favour. Doth not she make a very ridiculous figure in such a piece?

Thus I finished this remark, in the first edition of this Dictionary. I supposed that Mr Gueret having shewn a great deal of wit and good taste, in his Parnassus Reformed, had not founded his raileries upon a fallshood of his own invention: for nothing could have been more contrary to the laws of criticism and satire (11). Believing therefore he could not be guilty of such a fault, I did not question but the fact was so as he relates it; and for that reason I was not at the pains of examining the original. But Mr du Rondel had no sooner read the remark [C] of this article, but he wrote to me, that the matter was not at all as Mr Gueret has represented it; he shewed me the circumstances of the action, and made it appear that Theagenes deserved not the least censure. I have just now read the place where Heliodorus recites that adventure, and am convinced with my own eyes that Mr du Rondel is in the right, and that the author of Parnassus Reformed, imposed on the public, and took the liberty to make raileries which ought rather to be called impostures. Theagenes and Chariclea, separated from each other by the strokes of capricious fortune, which are so frequent in romances, happened to come near Memphis at the same time. They had made no assignation, nor taken so much as the same road; it happened that Chariclea arrived near the town, when Theagenes was walking round the walls, on an occasion which furnished the inhabitants with a shew. She knew him at a great distance; for, as Heliodorus observes, lovers eyes are very subtle (12). She felt such emotions on the sight of that object, that, as if a wisp had stung her, she ran with transport towards Theagenes, and threw her arms about his neck without speaking a word. She was in a sorry dress and her face all besmeared, so that he took her for a prostitute and pushed her from him: but not being able to get rid of her, he gave her a box on the ear. Χαρικλεία πῶρ' ὥρ' ἀναγνώρισα τὴν Θεαγένην ὥσπερ οἰσθηθεῖσα ὑπὸ τῆς ὀφθαλμοῦ ἐπ' αὐτὴν ἵεται καὶ περιφύσα τὴν αὐτὴν ἀπὸ τοῦ εἰχέτο καὶ ἐξήρτητο, καὶ γοῶντις τισὶ κατησπάετο θύραις. ὁ δὲ, οἷον εἶδε, ὅτι τὴν ῥῶσαν καὶ πρὸς τὸ αἰσχρῶς ἐπὶ τὴν κεφαλὴν αὐτῆς ἐπὶ τὴν ἰσχυρίαν καὶ κατεργασμένην, ὥσπερ τινα τῶν ἀγροικῶν καὶ ἀλλοτρίων ἀλμυρῶν, διωδεῖτο καὶ παρηγοριάζετο καὶ τὴν αὐτῆς ἐπὶ τὴν μέσην, ὥς ἐνοχλῶσαν καὶ τῇ δὲ τῶν ἀμφοῖν Κελάσιον ἐμποδὼν ἱσχυμένην, καὶ διεπράττειεν. [F] A modern writer knew some men who would have done what is attributed to the bishop of Trifa. This modern writer is Father Vavaler. He does not at all believe what Nicephorus relates, it appears to be ridiculous to him; whether we consider the persons proposing such an alternative, or the choice that was made (19). Nevertheless, he assures us, that he knows people to fond of their works, that they had rather lose the best benefices in the kingdom, than give up the praises they think they have merited by their romances. Cujus tamen saltem ne magnopere vituperetur, aut ne reprehendatur ex toto, nonnulli obstant, quos ego scio, si isto loco essent, foretque potissimum eligendi; hoc idem ad amplius salutis; talesque parvi ingenii, qualia Heliodori Æthiopica sunt, non Tribacii modo, sed omnium Gallicæ sacerdotibus omnibus anteposituos, & loco graduque & quovis dignitate celsiores potius, quam laboris, & industriæ, & bonæ civitatis & nationis fructum bunc qualemcumque amitterent (20).

HELOISA, concubine, and afterwards wife of Peter Abelard, a nun; and afterwards prioress of Argenteuil; and lastly, abbess of the Paraclet, has occasioned too much discourse of her, not to deserve an article of some length in this work. She had an uncle, by her mother's side, named Fulbert [A], who was a canon of Paris, and who

[A] She had an uncle by her mother's side, named the Fairbairn. This is all I have found of certainty concerning Heloise's genealogy; and therefore I have not said that she was legitimately descended from the ancient house of Montmorenci. I have read this indeed, in the apologetical preface of Francis d'Amboise (1); but as he cites no author for it, and Andrew du Chêne (2) makes no mention of it, I suspect the credit of it; and the more, because Heloise owns in her letters, that her family had been much honoured by her marriage with Abelard, and that he had married much beneath himself (3). Papyrius Masso (4) asserts, that Heloïsa was the natural daughter of one John, a canon of Paris. Andrew du Chêne is in the right not to lay much weight on this, since he does not say whence he had this curious circumstance; but he has no reason to oppose against that annalist, the calendar of the Paraclet, where are these words. VII Cal. Januar. obiit Hubertus 55 Canonicus Domine Heloïse aconculce. — The twenty sixth of December died canon Hubert, uncle to Heloïsa. For what is easier than to reconcile Papyrus Mallo with this calendar? cannot the same woman be the bastard of one canon, and the niece of another? but once more: he who loved her tenderly. He took an extraordinary care to have her well educated; and as she had a great deal of wit, she in a little time grew so learned, that her reputation was spread all over the kingdom [B]. And besides, she was pretty handsome [C]. There was, at that time, a famous doctor in Paris, who read public lectures with wonderful reputation. His name was Peter Abelard, the most subtle logician of his age, and he who first brought the scholastic philosophy and divinity in vogue. He enjoyed all the glory that a man of his profession could desire: he had an infinite number of scholars, was look'd upon as a very able master, and got a great deal of money; but he did not make love; and this he thought was a considerable flaw in his good fortune. That nothing therefore might be wanting to his happiness, he resolv'd to become a lover, and chose Heloisa for his mistress. We have told, in another place (a), the reasons that led him to this choice, and how he got into the canon's family, under the notion of a domestic tutor. Poor honest Fulbert hoped, that, under such a master, Heloisa would make a wonderful proficiency in the sciences; but he found she learnt only the art of making love. She had an incomparable disposition for it. She was taught to make so great progress in a little time, that her master soon pass'd from the first to the last favour; and that without any thoughts of demanding a promise of marriage.

says that Heloisa was the natural daughter of one canon John, without quoting any author for it, will not merit credit. If any canon were to be suspected in this matter, it would rather be canon Fulbert than any other. For that tender affection for Heloisa which Abelard ascribes to him, is so uncommon among uncles (6), and so naturally resembles the affection of the best fathers, that there might be some grounds to imagine, that Fulbert acted as a great many others do, who cannot be fathers according to the canons: they conceal that relation, under that of uncle, and educate their children under the title of nephews. This is what may be suspected. But this ought not to regulate the style, nor hinder us from giving people the titles, under which the public has known them. Fulbert in a book, must be only an uncle. Note, that according to Papyrius Masso, the canon who took care to have Heloisa educated, and caused Peter Abelard to be castrated, was called John. That historian therefore does not pretend that she was the niece of one canon, and the natural daughter of another. He pretends, that the canon whom all the other authors name Fulbert, and whom they take to be the uncle of Heloisa, was her father, and that his name was John (7).

[B] She grew so learned, that her reputation was spread. Let us hear Abelard. 'Qui (Fulbertus) eam quanto amplius diligebat, tanto diligentius in omnem quam poterat scientiam literarum promoveri studerat. Quae cum per faciem non esset infima, per abundantiam literarum erat suprema. Nam quo bonum hoc, literariae scilicet scientiae, in mulieribus est rarius, eo amplius puellam commendabat, & in toto regio nominatissimam fecerat (8). — As Fulbert loved her exceedingly, he took the utmost pains to have her instructed in all manner of learning. And as she was not the last of her sex in beauty, so in letters she was the first. For the rarer letters are among women, so much the more was she distinguished by them, and celebrated all over the kingdom on that account.' In that age a young woman with a very moderate share of erudition, might have passed for a miracle. This ought to be well observed by those who would not carry their ideas of our Heloisa beyond due bounds; and yet it must be granted that she deserves an honourable place, among the learned women. She not only understood the Latin tongue, but also the Greek and Hebrew: Abelard testifies this also, in the letter he wrote to the nuns of the Paraclet. Magisterium habetis in matre, quod ad omnia vobis sufficere tam ad exemplum scilicet virtutem, quam ad doctrinam literarum potest, quae non solum Latinae, verum etiam tam Hebraicae quam Graecae non experta literatura, sola hoc tempore illam trium linguarum adepta peritiam videtur, quae ab omnibus in beato Hieronymo tanquam singularis gratia praedicatur (9). Francis d'Amboise tells us (10), how she subtilly fascinated St Bernard, who asked the reason why in the monastery of the Paraclet, when they repeated the lord's prayer, they did not say, Panem nostrum quotidianum, but panem nostrum super substantialium. She gave him a reason for it, taken from the originals, and told him we must follow the Greek version of the gospel, which St Matthew wrote in Hebrew. I know not whether such an answer would have pleased St Bernard, but I doubt not that it was able to puzzle him, and make him give over the dispute; and I wish with all my heart the story were true; it would be an instance how a woman would heartily perplex a great author in a controversial point, by alleging the Greek text. I was sorry therefore, I confess, when, consulting the letter (11) quoted by Francis d'Amboise I found that Heloisa had no hand in it, and that the whole remark is Abelard's, who wrote thereupon to St Bernard, after having known from Heloisa the exceptions that were made to panem super substantialium. Let this be said without prejudice to the learning of that abbess. But if any one should imagine that she did not become learned till after she was a recluse, I would refer him to a letter of Peter the Venerable, abbot of Clugni, which declares, that before that time she had acquired great knowledge; 'Necdum, says he to her (12), metas adolescentiae excefferam, necdum in juveniles annos evaseram, quando nomen non quidem adhuc religionis tuae, sed honestorum, tamen & laudabilium studiorum mihi fama innotuit. Audiebam tunc tum poris mulierem, licet necdum saeculi nexibus expectatam, literariae scientiae & studio saecularis sapientiae summam operam dare, quo efferrando studio tuo & mulieres omnes evicisti, & pene viros universos superasti. — When I was only a boy, and had not arrived to manhood, the fame, not indeed as yet, of your piety, but of your polite and laudable studies, reached my ears. I was told that a woman tho' not then retired from worldly avocations, gave the closest application to letters and the study of human learning, and by that means, you not only excelled all your own sex, but almost out-did all ours.' The monk of Auxerre says, she was well acquainted with Latin and Hebrew, and the Calender of the Paraclet thus speaks of her: Heloise mere & premiere Abbesse de ceaux, de doctrine & religion tres-resplendissante (13)

[C] She was pretty handsome. I observe a great many authors ascribe to her a ravishing beauty; but are they more credible than Abelard himself, who having more reason to enlarge than diminish things, contents himself to say, that she was not the last of her sex in beauty, but that she was the first in erudition. Cum per faciem non esset infima, per abundantiam literarum erat suprema — As she was not last of her sex in beauty, so in letters she was the first. Would a man speak thus of an accomplished beauty? would a lover, concerned to justify his choice, and the violence of his passion, employ such a figure of rhetoric? and Abelard, some (14) observe that Heloisa was eighteen years old when Abelard debauched her? I have not met with that circumstance in any ancient author. It is true. The word adolescentula, which which Abelard makes use of (15), may very well suit the age of eighteen; and so may that of juvencula, which she useth (16). (16) Ibid. pag. but nothing can be concluded from such a proof. It 47. is a meer chimera to say, that Abelard in his Roman de la Rose, drew the picture of Heloisa, under the name of Beauty (17). That romance did not see the light till after their death.

marriage. Abelard so gave himself up to his pleasures with her [D], that he grew negligent of his lectures. He confesses himself, that he kept no measures, but plunged into those pleasures, without distinction of times and places; without distinction of holy-days, or worky-days, or of holy and profane places; that he made no further progress in Philosophy; and that all the productions of his genius dwindled into sonnets and love-verses [F]. His scholars quickly found out the matter, upon enquiring into the reasons of the abatement of his lectures. The scandal was quickly propagated all over the town, and at last it reached the ears of her uncle [G], but found him

[D] Abelard gave himself up to his pleasures. We must hear himself speak, that we may lose nothing of the force of his expressions. 'Nullus à cupidis intermissus est gradus amoris, & si quid insolitum amor excogitare potuit, est additum. Et quo minus illa fueramus experti gaudia ardentius illis insisteremus, & minus in fastidium vertebantur (18). — So fond we were, that no degree of love was left untried, and if ought new love could invent, it was added. And the less we were accustomed to these joys the more greedily we devoured them, and the less were cloyed.' He compares himself to those who have suffered a long famine, and come afterwards to a plentiful table. A man who has lived chastely, is more apt to fall into excess with his wife, than a debauchee.

[E] Without distinction of times and places. We must again hear him speak, in a letter he wrote to Heloisa, a long time after their monastic engagements. He puts her a little in mind of their past conduct, and how he caressed her in a corner of the refectory of the nuns of Argenteuil, finding no other convenient place, and having no respect to the Holy Virgin, to whom that place was consecrated. 'Nosti post nostri confederationem conjugii cum Argenteoli cum Sanctimonialibus in claustris conversabaris, me die quadam privatim ad te visitandum venisse, & quid ibi tecum mea libidinis egerit intemperantia in quadam etiam parte ipsius refectorii, cum quò alias diverteremus non haberemus. Nosti, inquam, id impudentissime tunc actum esse, in tam reverendo loco & summe Virgini consecrato . . . Quid pristinas fornicationes & impudentissimas referam pollutiones quæ conjugium præcesserunt (19)? — You remember when after our marriage you lived in the nunnery at Argenteuil, that I one day came secretly to see you, and what my unbridled passion made me do, even in the refectory, having no other place to which we could retire. You know, I say, what was acted there in that sacred place, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin. Why should I call to mind the follies and pollutions which preceded our marriage?' A little after he tells her, that she knows very well, that neither the most solemn feasts, nor even the Passion-Day, discouraged them from wallowing in that filthy course; and that whenever she began to be scrupulous, he made use of threatenings and whipping to bring her to consent (20). Behold a man perfectly free from the superstitions of those who observed days and feasts, new-moons, and sabbaths (21).

[F] All the productions of his genius, dwindled into sonnets and love-verses. This we learn from himself. 'Ita negligentem & tepidum lectio tunc habebat ut jam nihil ex ingenio, sed ex usu cuncta proferrem, nec jam nisi recitator pristinorum essem inventorum, & si qua invenire liceret, carmina essent amatoriae, non philosophicæ secreta (22). — I then was so careless and negligent in my lectures, that all I said was rather by rote than from any study, I only recited my former inventions, and if I then invented any thing it was rather love-sonnets, than secrets in Philosophy.' He adds, that these verses were still sung in many provinces, and especially amongst persons that made love: 'Quorum etiam carminum pleraque adhuc in multis, sicut & ipsa nosti, frequentantur & decantantur regionibus, ab his maxime quos vita similis oblectat. Heloisa tells us more of it. She says, that her Abelard had two qualifications which other philosophers wanted, by which he could soon gain all womens hearts; viz. that he wrote finely, and sung well; his love verses were so pretty, and his songs so agreeable, both as to the words and airs, that every body was charmed with them, and full of the author's praises. Women were not satisfied with being charmed with Abelard's songs and verses; they were as much taken with his person, and loved him passionately; and as the greatest part of his verses were filled with nothing but his love for Heloisa; the name of that mistress, flew presently into the provinces, and made an infinite number of women envy her good fortune. I enervate much the force of Heloisa's expressions, and I believe they ought not to be literally taken. As she loved Abelard even to distraction, she fancied no woman could look upon him, but must fall into the same passion; which made her say, that there was neither wife nor maid, who in Abelard's absence did not wish for him, and in his presence was not inflamed with love; and that even queens and great ladies envied the pleasures she reaped by the enjoyment of such a man. See here the Latin, which speaks still more significantly (23). 'Quæ conjugata, quæ virgo non concupiscebat absentem, & non exardebant in præsentem? Quæ Regina vel præpotens femina gaudiis meis non inviderebat vel thalamis? Duo autem, fateor, tibi specialiter inerant quibus seminarum quarumlibet animos statim allicere poteras, dictandi videlicet & cantandi gratia, quæ cæteros minimè Philosophos affectos esse novimus. Quibus quidem quasi ludo quodam laborem exercitii recreans philosophici, pleraque amatorio metro vel ritmo composita reliquisti carmina, quæ præ nimia suavitatem dictaminis quam cantus sæpius frequentata tuum in ore omnium nomen incessanter tenebant, ut etiam illiteratos melodiarum dulcedo tui non sineret immemor esse. Atque hinc maxime in amorem tui feminas suspirabant. Et cum horum pars maxima carminum nostros decantaret amores, multis me regionibus brevi tempore nunciavit (24), & multarum in me seminarum accendit invidiam. — What wife, what maid, did not languish for you when absent, and was not inflamed with love when you was near? What queen, what lady, did not envy my joys? Two qualities you had, rare to be found among the learned, by which you could not fail to gain all womens hearts, Poetry I mean, and Music. With these you unbended your mind after it's philosophic labours, and wrote many love verses, which because of the sweetness both of the words and music, were in every mouth, and carried your fame to every corner, and made even the illiterate sound your praise. By this it was that you chiefly gained the womens love. And as the greatest part of your songs celebrated our loves, they spread my name to many nations, and kindled there the envy of the women against me.' If the Romance of the Rose had been Abelard's performance, and if he had characterized his Heloisa under the name of Beauty, no doubt she would not have concealed it; and here was the proper place to speak of it. So that though we did know that this romance was written an hundred years after Abelard, we might learn from Heloisa's silence, that there is no reason for ascribing it to him in the little book I have quoted more than once (25). Much less has any one had reason to make Heloisa say this in the translation of her letter. But to return to our subject: a man would not believe, were it not for experience, that verses, letters, and sonnets, had the power of advancing so much the affairs of a lover (26); but here is a witness of it that is worth a thousand. The wits of this age complain, that their wares have not the same effect as in the time of our ancestors. The times are changed, I confess, but not entirely. See the New Letters against Maimbourg's History of Calvinism (27). As for what Heloisa declares concerning the weakness of those of her own sex with respect to Abelard, it is confirmed by a certain prior named Foulques; whose article must be consulted.

[G] The scandal . . . at last . . . reached the ears of her uncle. That word at last seems at first somewhat strange; but they who know the world, are not ignorant that on such occasions, they who are most concerned in a piece of news, are the last who hear it. Abelard cites upon this subject, a notable passage from a letter of St Jerome to Sabinian (28). 'Solemus mala domus nostræ scire novissimi, ac liberorum ac conjugum i, Epist. xlviii, vitia him at first incredulous, so much had he trusted to the discretion of Abelard and of Heloisa; but at last, by repeated assaults, his incredulity was over-powered. The pretended tutor left the canon's house, from whence he likewise removed Heloisa, when he found that she was with child; and having disguised her in the habit of a Nun (b), sent her into Bretagne, to one of his sisters, where she was brought to bed of a boy. Fulbert was enraged to the last degree against Abelard, who stood upon his guard, not without hopes that they durst not proceed to kill or mutilate him, whilst they might fear reprisals upon Heloisa. To get clear of all his trouble, he promised her uncle to marry her, provided the marriage might be kept secret. He had all the difficulty in the world to bring Heloisa to consent to it, who brought a thousand arguments to put him out of conceit with the conjugal tie [H]. She had conceived so strong and unbounded a passion for him, that it stifled all sentiments of honour in her soul

A writer of the XVIth century, brings a famous example to prove the maxim he had laid down, that they who have the greatest interest in knowing their family misfortunes, are the last that know them; whereas they are the first who learn the news of what should but little concern them. Solet usu venire, (says he) (34), ut domestica mala ultimi sint qui norint, quorum maxime interest ea non ignorare, iidem principes norint aliena, & quorum nullus ad eos pertinet sensus. After having given some reasons of this odd phenomenon, he says, that it was not long since a great king punished with death the dishonours of his nuptial bed, and that the execution was so sudden, that there did not intervene one hour betwixt their accusation and their death; an argument, that that prince had not heard of that disorder before, though the news of it had spread far and wide into foreign countries. Accidit hoc quidem, me puero, in magna atque illustri Europæ regia, quod prius diu obscura res esse possit, ut in regina, lesa pu-doris fama prius apud exterarum gentes longe lateque evagata emanaret, quam is, cujus in eo erat lesa majestas, maculam regio nomini impostam, eorum sanguine quorum erat scelere violata, elueret. Satis quidem potuit indicio esse, postremum omnium revertisse, ita sumptum de reis supplicium, ut inter id, & delatum tantum nomen, ne bona quidem momentum intercedere sit passus (35).

[H] She brought a thousand arguments to put him out of conceit with the conjugal tie. These arguments were reduced to two heads; the danger and the dishonour to which marriage would expose Abelard. I know my uncle's temper, (said she to him) nothing will appease his rage against you; and then what glory will it be to me to be your wife, since I shall ruin your reputation by it? What curses have not I reason to fear, if I shall rob the world of so bright a luminary as you are? What injury shall I not do the church? What sorrow shall I not give the philosophers? What a shame and injury will it be to you, whom nature has formed for the public good, to give yourself up entirely to a woman? Consider these words of St Paul, Art thou loosed from a wife, seek not a wife. And if the counsel of this great apostle, and the exhortations of the holy fathers, cannot dissuade you from that heavy burden; consider at least what the philosophers have said of it. Hear Theophrastus who has proved by so many reasons, that a wife man ought not to marry. Hear what Cicero, when he had divorced his wife Terentia, answered to Hirtius, who proposed a match to him with his sister; that he could not accept that offer, because he could not divide his thoughts betwixt philosophy and a wife. Besides, what conformity is there betwixt servant maids and scholars, ink-horns and cradles, books and distaffs, pens and spindles? How will you be able to bear in the midst of theological and philosophical meditations, the cries of children, the songs of nurses, and the disturbance of house-keeping? I say nothing of the stink and nauseness that attends little children (36). The rich can screen themselves from all these inconveniences, by the several apartments in their houses. The daily cares and expences cannot disquiet them; but it is not so with philosophers; and whoever would heap up wealth, and engage in worldly affairs, makes himself incapable of the functions of a divine, and of a philosopher. Observe the conduct of the ancient sages, both amongst the Jews and Heathens; in what if Pagans and laymen have preferred celibacy to marriage, what a disgrace would it be for a clergyman and a canon to prefer sensual pleasures before divine offices? But if you are but in little concern for the prerogative of your priesthood, maintain at least the character and dignity of a philosopher. The conclusion of her sermon was, that there would be more honour for himself, and more delight for her in the quality of a galant, than of a husband; that she desired to be united to him, not by the necessity of a conjugal bond, but by the sole affection of her heart, and that their pleasures would be infinitely more sensible, if they saw each other only from time to time. We shall speak of this last reason in the remark [U]. In the mean time, observe Pasquier's opinion on Heloisa's discourse. I will not (says he) (37) represent to you all the reasons whereby she tried to gain him; but I can assure you I never read in any orator, so many elegant expressions and persuasive sentences to gain a point, as she made use of there. I must acquaint my reader, that I have extremely abridged this lady's remonstrance, and that I was surprized, not to find one reason borrowed from her lover's being in orders (38). Does not this seem to prove, that it was not as yet believed that the law of celibacy was obligatory to ecclesiastical persons?

soul [I]; it struck its roots so deep, and made such a havock in her soul, that she never was cured of it [K]. In vain poor Abelard lost his virility [L], in vain she took the veil. There remained still a grain of that folly [M]. And it is not from the Portuguese letters that we first learned that it only belongs to Nuns to speak of love. The letters of Heloisa had been long before a proof of this truth. Be it how it will, this amorous creature in vain employed all her wit and eloquence to dissuade Abelard from the marriage. They were married in secret; but she always denied with oaths that she was his wife (c). This conduct made her uncle use her harshly, who, to cover the dishonour of his family, published the marriage in all places, though he had promised to Abelard not to mention it. The ill treatment to which Heloisa was exposed in the house of canon Fulbert, made her husband resolve to remove her from thence, and to put her into the nunnery of Argenteuil, where she had been educated. This second carrying of her away put her relations out of all manner of patience, and inspired

[I] Her love stifled all sentiments of honour in her soul. It often happens that the passion of love stifles or surmounts the sentiments of conscience; but it is rarely observed to suppress the sense of honour: and excepting a small number of persons of mean birth, who for the most part have not had even common education, all the young women who yield, put one or other of these four strings to their bow. They either hope they shall not conceive, or by some medicine to procure abortion, or to lye-in privately, or to oblige their galant to marry them: and this shews that if love be sometimes the strongest tyrant in the world, it is a tyrant who leaves honour in possession of its rights. See the famous sonnet on an abortion, where we have so fine a description of the power of honour, and the power of love, by turns conquered and victorious. Our Heloisa was so desperately in love, that she no longer regarded either her honour or reputation. For in the first place she was overjoyed when she found herself with child (39); and in the second place she did all that was possible to prevent her marriage with the father of it. Two things, which are not only rarer than the most frightful monsters, when they are joined together, but such as the first only is never found but in such cases, where love has little to do, and where the design is only to make sure of a good match, which they despair of obtaining without the noise of a great belly. How many young women are there that rather choose to have an husband given them by a decree of court against his inclination, than to live with a stained reputation. They are well satisfied that he will take his revenge with usury, and that this decree will cost them dear; but that signifies nothing, provided the title of husband repairs the breach made in their honour. Our Heloisa had none of these niceties. See the following remark, and especially the remark [U].

[K] She never was cured of it. Is this to be cured, to lay many years after she had renounced the world, and engaged in a monastic life, that she had rather be the whore of Peter Abelard, than the lawful wife of the emperor of the whole world. Now this is what our Heloisa, said when she was abbess of Paraclet, and what she was pleased to call God to witness to. Deum testem invoco, si me Augustus universo præsidentis mundo matrimonii bonore dignaretur, totumque mihi orbem confirmaret in perpetuo præsidentum, cbarius mihi & dignius mihi videretur TUA DICIMERETRIX quam illius Imperatrix (40). How can it be said that her passion had left her in the abbey of Paraclet, when she wrote an ingenuous confession there of the bad state of her soul, which shews that the fire of love preyed on her to the very marrow. I dare not express in French all that she accuses herself of: she confesses that the pleasures she tasted in the embraces of Abelard had been so delicious to her, that the thought of them night and day, sleeping and waking, and even during the celebration of the mass. She continually regretted the loss of them, and for want of a better way repeated them in imagination. They who understand Latin may see with what force of eloquence she could represent her thoughts. In tantum vero ille, quas pariter exercuimus amantium voluptates, dulces mihi fuerunt, ut nec displicere mihi, nec vix à memoria labi possint. Quotunque loco me vertam semper se oculis meis cum suis ingerunt desiderii. Nec etiam dormienti suis illusionibus parant. Inter ipsa missarum solennia ubi parior esse debet oratio, obsecra earum voluptatum sanctissima ita sibi penitus miserrimam captivant animam, ut turpitudinibus illis magis quam orationi vacem. Quæ cum ingemiscere debeat de commissis, suspiro potius de amissis. Nec solum quæ egimus, sed loca pariter & tempora in quibus hæc egimus ita tecum nostro infixæ sunt animo, ut in ipsis omnia tecum agam, nec dormiens etiam ab his quiescam. Nonnuncquam & ipso motu corporis animi mei cogitationes deprehenduntur, nec à verbis temperant improvisi

(41). This obliged her to cry out with St Paul (42). O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? Would to God, continues she, I could truly add, the Grace of GOD, through JESUS CHRIST our Lord. That grace, says she, to her Abelard, has prevented you, my dear, in delivering you from all the incentives of sensuality, by that one stroke of a knife which made you an eunuch. . . . But my youth and experience of past pleasures kindle these fires in my soul; and the weaker my nature is, the more I am overpowered by those violent attacks. Hæc te gratia, charissime, prævenit, & ab his tibi stimulis una corporis plaga medendo multas in anima sanavit. . . .

... bos autem in me stimulos carnis, hæc incentiva libidinis ipse juvenilis fervor ætatis & jucundissimarum experientia voluptatum plurimum accendunt, & tanto amplius sua me impugnatione opprimunt, quanto infirmior est natura quam oppugnant. (43). Lastly, she recommends herself to his prayers with so much the more solicitude, and that was the only remedy which her incontinence could find in him. Time, obsecro, semper de me potius quam confidas, ut tua semper sollicitudine adjuver. Nunc vero præcipue timendum est (44), ubi nullum incontinentiæ meæ superest in te remedium. Those who censured Abelard's frequent visits to the Paraclet (45), were doubtless guilty of a rash judgment, since they knew not the internal dispositions of Heloisa: but had they known them, they had been obliged to have gotten these visits forbid; having reason to fear that it was impossible, humanly speaking, that this woman should not commit acts of impurity with that man. The holy fathers never trusted to mutilations. They compared an eunuch to an ox that has lost his horns, and yet does not leave off giving blows with his head. See a fine passage of St Basil on this subject, in our remarks upon the article COMBATUS (46). But as appearances are sometimes fallacious, I should not approve of those, who, knowing what Heloisa had in her heart, should imagine she transgressed the rules when she met again with her husband, and that she had sometimes occasion to write to him, Si libidinosa essem, quererem decepta, nunc etiam languori tuo gratias ago: in umbra voluptatis diutius lusi (47).

[L] In vain poor Abelard lost his virility. It was an effectual remedy for love, if we will believe some verses of Cyrano de Bergerac (48). They are addressed to a man whom he had bespoke in this manner.

Qu'on fit de vrai trop excessif
Sur votre chaque genitif, Vous prohibe le conjunctif.*

Then he adds,

inspired them with an exquisite piece of revenge, which they executed by corrupting Peter Abelard's servant. That villain introduced, by night, into his master's chamber, the persons who were to commit the fact. They surprized him in his sleep, and cut off those parts which are not to be named (d). That action made a great noise [N]; people went the next morning, as in a procession, to Abelard's chamber. His scholars made still greater lamentations than the rest. The women distinguished themselves by their doleful complaints [O]. Some very curious letters of consolation were wrote to him [P]. That action was severely punished by the magistrates [Q]. But all that did not hinder Abelard, overwhelmed with shame and grief, from sequestering himself from the world, in the monastery of St Denys; after having taken care that Heloisa should become a nun at Argenteuil. We have said, in another place, what happened to him after he became a monk, and how he was condemned to burn, with his own hands, a book he had written, &c. The loss of that work afflicted him still more than the loss of his virility had done [R]: And yet the loss of a book may be made up by another, which cannot be said in the other case [S]. As for Heloisa, she was made prioress of the nuns at Argenteuil; but, as they behaved very ill in that monastery [T], the abbot of St Denys, who claimed a jurisdiction over it, expelled the nuns; and then Heloisa stood in great need of her husband. He had built an oratory near Troies, to which he had given the name of Paraclet (e), and afterwards he had accepted an abbey in Bretagne. Understanding that his Heloisa was quite destitute, after her expulsion from Argenteuil, he gave her that oratory, with all its dependencies, which

But as there is no rule so general but has an exception to it, the love of Heloisa was proof against this violent remedy. She had that in common with queen Stratonice whom I have mentioned before (49).

[M] There remained still a grain of that folly in her.] This appears by the passages I have cited in the remark [K]. They not only prove that the love of concupiscence prevailed in Heloisa, but also that she was somewhat besides her self: for a person in her perfect senses, would never have talked at that rate. It is probable that study began first to disorder her, and that love made a great addition to the breach. There appear in her writings many marks of a disordered imagination; something so extravagant, and so many inconsistencies, that she is a proof of Seneca's maxim, Nullum magnum ingenium sine mixtura dementiæ (50). — Great wits to madness nearly are allied.

[N] That action made a great noise.] See what Abelard says of it (51); Mane autem facto tota ad me civitas congregata quanta superet admiratione, quanta se affigeret lamentatione, quanto me clamore vexarent, quanto planctu perturbarent, difficile imo impossibile est exprimi. Maxime vero Clerici, ac præcipue Seculares nostri, intolerabilibus me lamentis & ejulatiibus cruciabant. See the article to which I refer in the following remark.

[O] The women distinguished themselves by their doleful complaints.] Abelard does not speak of this: but we learn it from one of his friends who wrote a letter of consolation to him. See the article FOULQUES (52).

(52) Rem. [I].

[P] Some very curious letters of consolation were wrote to him.] Foulques, prior of Deuil, wrote him one which has been inserted in the edition of Abelard's works. We speak of it in the article of that prior, and we refer thither many things belonging to Heloisa and her husband, which would make their articles too long, if they were not separated, in order to be placed elsewhere. They who say they had rather find it altogether in the same place, have not well considered of the matter.

[R] The loss of that work afflicted him yet more than the loss of his virility.] Authors have been sufficiently bantered upon their excessive fondness for their own works; and, amongst other instances, bishop Heliodorus, has been quoted, who chose rather to renounce his bishopric than to condemn his romance of Theagenes (54). What Sarrasin makes Voiture say has also been alleged (55). But I do not know that Abelard has been cited upon this occasion: though there is something more strong in his example; for Job was restored to his prosperous state; he begat sons and daughters, and it is certain that Voiture would rather have been a Job for some time, than an Abelard to his grave; and that he would gladly have thrown away all his books and all his muses, if there had been a necessity for it, to preserve the fund of his love-intrigues. Where are the prelates who would refuse to sign the resignation of their bishoprics, should they be threatened with razor in hand with in case of their refusal. Doubtless Heliodorus would have consented to the condemnation of his romance, if they had reduced him to this sad alternative. But now here is a man who declares he reckons the loss of his natural parts, as an inconsiderable thing, in comparison of the loss of a work which he was obliged to cast into the fire. But to judge impartially in this case, we must not attribute Abelard's whole grief, to the paternal affection which his character of an author inspired him with for his book. There was another thing here that afflicted him more than this; which was, that by obliging him to burn his own book, they branded him with the mark of heresy, a punishment which answers to that of the hot iron. His murmurs against the providence of God are another testimony of his concern. See his words, which I ought to produce, that I may not be suspected of aggravating things, to divert my reader. 'Deus, qui judicas æquitatem quanto

Good JESUS, where was thou? The sorrow with which I then was torn, the shame which confounded me, and my horrible despair, I then could feel, but cannot now describe: I compared with this, what I before had suffered in my body, and what I now endured, and concluded, that I was the most miserable of men. I judged the former treachery but small compared to this, and lamented more this injury done to my fame, than that done to my body.*

[T] They behaved ill in that monastery.] Suger, abbot of St Denys, took advantage of the disorderly life of the nuns of Argenteuil, to re-instate himself in the possession of that monastery. He sent his titles to Rome, and received a favourable answer. See what he says of it in the history of his life under the year which donation was confirmed by Pope Innocent II. Thus she was the first abbess of Paraclet. She obtained such favour with all ranks of men, that she was quickly loaded with riches. The bishops loved her as their daughter, the abbots as their sister, and the laity as their mother (f). However, she was very ill satisfied with the providence of God (g), and murmured much more than Job. She kept up a correspondence by letters with Abelard [U], and desired him to give her rules for her nuns, and the solution of several difficulties. He complied with her desire in both. I do not find, that the hope she had of seeing him dignified with the mitre was the reason of her reluctance to marry him [X]. When he died, being a monk of Clugni, she requested his corps of the abbot, and having obtained it, she interred it in the Paraclet, and desired that she might be buried in the same tomb (b). They tell a most surprizing miracle that happened, as is said, when the sepulchre was opened in order to lay Heloisa's body there, who are inclined to judge ill of their neighbour, will not read this passage without violent suspicions of Heloisa's conduct. She confesses her self subject to the raging heats of lust (59): and it is often seen, that the abbess of a convent carries herself ill, when leudness is prevalent in the society (60). From these two principles, they who are fond of scandal, may easily draw this consequence, that the priorels of Argenteuil, was no better than her nuns. But for my part having never read that she was by name comprehended in the scandal her monastery gave, I shall be cautious of fixing the least blemish on her. We should imitate our lord, and make use of his maxim (61), Has any body condemned, or accused, thee? Neither do I condemn, or accuse, thee. And it is very true that inferiours imitate the bad and not the good life of their superiours. The court of France under Lewis XIII, was not chaster than under Henry IV.

[U] She kept up a correspondence by letters with Abelard.] That correspondence began but late, and it was a fortuitous adventure that occasioned it. Abelard had written to a friend a long relation of his misfortunes, which fell into the hands of Heloisa, then abbess of Paraclet. Having read it, she immediately wrote to Abelard the reflexions she had made upon it, and passionately desired him to write to her, that she might be no longer deprived of the consolation his letters might afford her in his absence. She represented to him the disinterestedness of her affection, and how she had neither sought the honour of marriage, nor the advantages of a dowry, nor her own pleasure, but the sole satisfaction of Abelard. She tells him that though the name of wife has something in it more great and sacred, she had always found that of his mistress, concubine, or whore, more agreeable. Est uxoris nomen sanctius ac validius videtur, dulcius mihi semper extitit amicæ vocabulum, aut si non indigneris, concubinæ vel sortis (62). She adds, that he had related a part only of the reasons she had represented to dissuade him from marriage; but that he had almost suppressed all those which were drawn from the preference she gave to love, before the conjugal tie, and to liberty before necessity (63). I know not how this lady meant; but there is here one of the most mysterious refinements of love. It has been for several ages believed, that marriage destroys the principal poignancy of this sort of salt, and that when one does a thing by engagement, duty, and necessity, as a task and drudgery, he no longer finds the natural charms in it: so that, according to these nice judges, a man takes a wife ad honores, et not ad delectationem. Marriage has on

it's side profit, justice, honour, and constancy; a flat but more universal pleasure. Love is founded only upon pleasure, which then is more touching, brightly, and poignant: a pleasure excited by difficulty, there must be a relish and smartness in it. It is no longer love, if it be destitute of darts and flames. The bounty of the ladies is too profuse in marriage, it blunts the edge of affection and desire (64). Pater (64) Montagne, re me, said a Roman emperor (65) to his wife, per aliam Exercere cupiditates meas, nam uxor nomen est dignitatis, non voluptatis (66). — Suffer me, to satisfy my desires with others, for spouse is a name of dignity, not of pleasure. One might therefore give an unlucky interpretation to Heloisa's design of never being the wife, but still mistress of the dear mistress of Peter Abelard. One might suspect she was afraid lest marriage should prove the grave of love, and hinder her from talking so deliciously as before, the caresses of her friend. The author, who here has paraphrased some pieces of our Heloisa's letters (67), at bottom ascribes this view and taste to her, though his words are nicely couched. He makes her say Maimbourg, and (68), That she found nothing but what was dull and insipid in those public engagements which tie those knots, that only death can loose, and which make a sad necessity of life and love: that (69) it is not to love, to court wealth and honours, in the tasteless embraces of an insensible husband; that she never would believe one could this way taste the sensible pleasures of an agreeable union, or feel the secret and charming commotions of two hearts, which have a long time sought one another in order to be united; and that she is fully satisfied, that if there be any such thing as happiness in this world, it is only to be found in the union of two persons, who love with liberty, whom a secret inclination has joined, and a reciprocal merit has rendered satisfied. We shall see presently that another cause has been supposed of Heloisa's design not to marry Abelard.

[X] I do not find, that the hope of seeing him dignified with the mitre, was the reason of her reluctance to marry him.] The Sieur d'Amboise (71) makes mention of an ancient French poet, who after having exhorted men not to submit their necks to the yoke of marriage, confirms his opinion by that of our Heloisa, who, says he, most importunately begged and intreated of her lover, that he would not marry her. She was much better satisfied to be loved by a man, whom she should one day see elevated to a good bishopric. Satis esse dicitur si illa intimo prætoris amore mutuum servans, illum videret mitra & insulis Pontificalibus quibus dignus erat ornatum. — Saying, it was enough, for her while she cherished their mutual love in her breast, to see him adorned with the mitre and pontifical robes which he so well deserved. The Sieur d'Amboise observes, I, that this poet gives another turn to illa innuere vocit, viz. that Heloisa intimated, that the embraces of married people are not attended with so delicious a pleasure, as those that are illegitimate (72). II. That we ought not to believe that Heloisa preferred a licentious concubinage, before the condition of a wife; Id, but that her love and respect for her gallant, inclined her rather to turn recluse, than by her marriage to hinder Abelard from receiving the rewards that were due to his wit and learning, as suppose a cardinal's cap (73). I have found no footing of this in Heloisa's letters, and for that reason, I have made the sixth fault of Mr Moreri, in the article of ABELARD. That which gives birth to these sorts of excellent insinuations, is the liberty an author takes to lend people those thoughts, which he thinks agreeable to their interests. There is sometimes more advantage for a

it, viz. that Heloisa intimated, that the embraces of married people are not attended with so delicious a pleasure, as those that are illegitimate (72). II. That we ought not to believe that Heloisa preferred a li-centious concubinage, before the condition of a wife; Id,

but that her love and respect for her gallant, enclined her rather to turn recluse, than by her marriage to hinder Abelard from receiving the rewards that were due to his wit and learning, as suppose a cardinal's cap (73). I have found no footing of this in Heloisa's letters, and for that reason, I have made the sixth fault of Mr Moreri, in the article of ABELARD.

That which gives birth to these sorts of excellent insinuations, is the liberty an author takes to lend people those thoughts, which he thinks agreeable to their interests. There is sometimes more advantage for a

there, viz. that Abelard stretched out his arms, to receive her, and closely embraced her [7]; and yet he had been above twenty years dead: but that's no great matter; they pretend that they have instances of things of this kind [Z]. She died the seventeenth of May 1163. The letters she wrote to her husband, are to be met with in the edition of Abelard's works. But what Mr Moreri advances, is not true, viz. that Andrew du Chefne has made remarks on these letters, and on Abelard's answers. He has only commented on the letter wherein Abelard gives the history of his misfortunes to a friend. John de Meun translated into French the letters which Heloisa and Abelard wrote to one another (i). A little book (k) was lately published, intituled, The History of Heloisa and Abelard, with the passionate Letter she wrote to him, translated from the Latin. This pretended translation, is nothing else but a collection of some passages taken at pleasure from this woman's letters, to which the author has given what form he thought fit, by suppressing what he did not like, and adding what he thought more to his purpose.

The Count de Buffi Rabutin translated into French some letters of Abelard and Heloisa. This translation was published after his death, in the second volume of his letters. I never saw, (says he) (l) finer Latin, especially than that of Heloisa, nor more love and wit than she was mistress of. If he had been as good a judge of the Latin style as he was of the French, he would not have given this elogy to the latinity of Heloisa.

woman to suffer a young galant to rise to the dignities of the church, than to stop his way to them by marrying him. But must we therefore suppose that Heloisa had such views? Here is a well known story. A man who had a prebend, quitted it to marry: the day after the wedding, he said to his wife, See, my dear, how I love you, I have even quitted my prebend for your sake. You are a fool, says she, for your pains: you ought to have kept your prebend; and you might have had me notwithstanding (74).

[Y] They tell us that Abelard stretched out his arms and closely embraced her.] A manuscript chronicle of Tours (75) relates this pretty miracle. 'Hæc, (Heloisa) sicut dicitur, in ægritudine ultima posita præcepit ut mortua intra mariti tumulum poneretur, & sic eadem defuncta ad tumulum apertum deportata, maritus ejus qui multis diebus ante eam defunctus fuerat, elevatis brachiis illam recepit, & ita eam amplexatus brachia sua strinxit. — Heloisa, as we are told, when a dying, ordered that she should be buried in her husband's grave, and accordingly after her death, being put in the grave, her husband, who, had died before her, received her with opened arms, and folding his arms together embraced her.' But how comes it then that they are not in the same tomb? Francis d'Amboise, who tells us, that he has seen at the Paraclet, the tombs of the founder and foundress by one another, contigua fundatoris fundatrici sepulchra, should have solved this small difficulty.

ing two married persons, who always remained virgins, and whom the inhabitants of the country (77) called the two lovers. The wife died first: the husband, in burying her, made use of this thanksgiving: I thank thee, my Lord and my God, that I have returned thee this treasure in the same purity that thou was pleased to commit it to me. The woman with a smile said to him: Why do you talk of a thing which no body asks you about. The husband died a little after, and was buried over against his spouse; but on the morrow their corps were found both in the same grave. That blunt interrogatory might give occasion to some of the profane to think, that the virgin wife was not willing she should know her husband had been so cold. She confined herself to the merit of her continence, without being willing to be exposed to the opinions, that might be formed to the prejudice of her charms. It is not thus that depositum ought to be preserved; it is not restoring it well, to render it just as we received it. It is not for this that God instituted marriage; non hoc questum munus in usus. One may therefore be sorry, that the public should think one has not sufficiently pleased the depositary. But the historian will remedy this inconvenience, if you consult the thirty second chapter, concerning the glory of confessors, where the discourse of the deceased wife is a little better turned. Ten chapters after, he relates, that a senator of Dijon, called Hilary (78), having been buried a whole year, lift up his hand to put it round his wife's neck, when she was laid in the same tomb.

HELVICUS (CHRISTOPHER) professor of Divinity, of Greek, and of the Oriental languages in the university of Gießen, was born the 26th of December, 1581, at Sprendlingen (a), where his father was minister [A]. He was not one of those tardy wits, which do not shew themselves till the latter season. He was able, before the age of twenty, to teach Greek and Hebrew, and even philosophy; and he had composed many Greek verses at the age of fifteen or sixteen. He studied at Marburg, and was made master of arts there in 1599. He might have obtained it sooner if he would; for he was admitted bachelor at fourteen (b). He made himself such a master of the Hebrew, that he could speak it as his mother-tongue. He made himself thoroughly acquainted with a vast number of Greek authors. He studied also physic for some time, though he had dedicated himself to the ministry. In fine, he gave so many testimonies of his capacity, that he was chosen, in the year 1605, teacher of Greek and Hebrew in the college the Landgrave had then erected at Gießen (c). The nalized himself in the defence of Darmstadt, during the war of Smalcalde. One may see in Sleidan, and Thuanus, the opinion which the count de Buren had of him. Seeing no prospect of relief, he went upon the ramparts to capitulate, but he received a shot which pierced his right-arm, after which the place was taken by storm. They designed to hang him, and perhaps they would have done it, if the ransom that was promised for him had not hindered them. He had attended the landgrave Philip in almost all his expeditions (1).

[A] His father was minister.] He was called Christopher as his son; he had been in his younger days, two years together, director of the college of Geraw. After which he studied divinity at Tubingen, and was made minister of the church of Griseim; but prince George, landgrave of Hesse, preferred him a little after to Sprendlingen; Helvicus served this church till his death, and went through many troubles. Multa propter sinceram confessionem perpassus, tandem ibidem vitam banc terrestrem cum celesti commutavit. He was son to QUIRINUS HELVICUS, who fig-

The year following, the emperor honoured that college with the title of an university, and the privileges belonging thereto. Helvicus having for five years acquitted himself in the duties of his profession with great reputation, was advanced to be professor of divinity in the year 1610. He married the same year. I know not whether he deferred his marriage till he saw himself rais'd to a preferment that might help him to a better match, or whether he had other reasons that engaged him to continue in a single life till that time; for the author whom I shall cite, says nothing of it; but he observes, that marriage did not make Helvicus less diligent in the discharge of the duties of his function (d). He was offered a church in Moravia, in the year 1611, and a professorship at Ham-burgh, with a considerable salary. However, he refused both these invitations. He took the degree of doctor in divinity, in the year 1613: the Landgrave desired it; as also, that he should go and see the libraries of the Jews at Francfort, who had been driven lately from thence, by popular commotions. Helvicus, who was much addicted to the reading of the Rabbies, purchased many of their books there. He died in the flower of his age, Sept. 10, 1617, having many designs of books in his head [B]; and had the reputation of a man who had the greatest dexterity, and best method of teaching languages (e) [C]. He was not only a good Grammarian, but a good Chronologer. His chronological tables have been much esteemed [D], though they are not entirely

[B] He died having many designs of books in his head. He had published several grammars, a Latin, a Greek, a Hebrew, a Chaldee, and a Syriac. (2). But they were only abridgments. His Hebrew and Latin Lexicons, were only a sort of essay for the use of youth. He had a great desire to perfect all these Grammars, and to make Lexicons for the use of the learned, and he begged of God that he might live so long as to finish these undertakings. He moreover prayed for life sufficient to reduce the ecclesiastical histories into order, and to animadvert on Piscator's translation of the Old and New Testament, and on that author's commentaries on the Scripture. He thought also, it was requisite to publish a new edition of Luther's bible, with a good apology, and necessary explications. The edition of that bible, which Paul Tossanus had procured not long before, with marginal notes, containing the opinions of Calvin, put Helvicus upon that project, and gave him a vehement desire to execute it (3). 'Cum ante biennium Paulus Tossanus Heidelbergensis Doctor, versionem Bibli- cam B. Lutheri Germanicam in lucem edidisset, non solum variis notationibus marginalibus (quæ quales hinc inde sint viri cordati judicabunt) consperlam, sed etiam erroribus Calvinianorum contra ipsius Lutheri mentem & voluntatem proterva temeritate & impudentia contaminatam, judicabat operæ pretium esse, si opus illud Biblicum Lutheri cum solida ubi opus esset apologia, necessariis explicationibus, & modularum quas Pontificii & Calviniani illi asperferunt absterione in lucem prodiret. Ubi animadverti in ipso fingere hoc ipsum præstandi desiderium, si Domino ita visum esset (4). — Paul Tossanus, a doctor at Heidelberg, having two years before published Luther's German translation of the Bible, not only with many marginal notes (with what success let the learned judge), but likewise corrupted it most impudently, and contrary to the doctrine and intention of Luther, with many Calvinistical errors, Helvicus thought it would be a service to the public, to publish that work of Luther's, with a solid apology where there is occasion for it, with necessary explications, and purged from all these foul interpolations, by which the Papists and Calvinists had polluted it. I observed, that he vehemently desired to have executed this design if it had pleased GOD.'

art of teaching, nova Didactica author & informator felicissimus. The thing deserved it, titulus res digna sepulchri, and merited to be copied more exactly than has been done by the Sieur Freher, who, instead of Didactica, has put it Dialectica. One would think, that Helvicus had some idea of a project, which, they say, a very learned man is employed about, which is to reduce languages to common principles, which may serve to learn them very easily all together; one might believe this, I say, if we depended on this title of one of his books: Libri didactici Grammaticæ universalis Latina, Græcæ, Hebraicæ, Chaldaicæ (6): but it is plain by his funeral oration, that there is a comma wanting after universalis. See, above, quotation (2).

[D] His chronological tables have been much esteemed. I speak of the work which is intitled, Theatrum Historicum, sive Chronologia Systema novum. He published it in the year 1609. Seth Calvisius, who was a great master of history and chronology, much approved of that work, and found it a new and very useful invention, since things are there seen altogether, and at one view: Utpote in quibus exemplo antebac non viso omnia uno intuitu lectorum oculis subjiciantur. Wynckelman observes, that this approbation is found in the letter that Seth Calvisius wrote to Helvicus, September the seventh 1609. He adds, the work is at present reprinting, corrected, and enlarged by the author. Jam secundum emendatius & ex ipsius auctoritate auctius editur. We must say then, that the first edition of this work was in the year 1609, and the second in the year 1618, John Steuber, professor at Giessen, had the care of the latter, and dedicated it to a Danish lord (7), a patron of learned men, and who had honoured Helvicus with his friendship. Twenty years after a new edition of this book was published by the care of John Balthasar Schuppius, son-in-law to the author, and professor of Eloquence at Marburg. He advertises in his preface, that he will say nothing of the English edition. Since that time this Chronological Theatre has been often reprinted. Vossius hath not been exact in the account he gives of the date of the first edition, and hath given that for the second edition, which was not so. Anno 1610CXXII scilicet de (8). libred a system of chronology, with equal intervals of tens, fifties, and hundreds. It was afterwards continued and revised by John Balthasar Schoppius. He published it in 1618. It cannot be objected to me, in favour of Vossius, that it is very true, that Helvicus published a book of chronology in the year 1612, which was augmented by Schuppius, in 1638, for that is not the book which Vossius speaks of; the title of it is Chronologia Universalis ab origine mundi per quatuor summa imperia, quas Monarchias appellant, ad annum usque MDCXII, num. in Cippo deducta, cum præcipuis synchronismis virorum illustrium eventuum & politiarum caterarum (9). entirely free from errors [E]. We may conjecture by the books we have of his [F], that if he had attained the age of sixty, his works would have made many volumes in folio. As for the rest, he was a man of an unblameable life; he studied to have peace with all mankind, and never had any difference, either with his colleagues, or with other people (f): Rara avis in terris. He was much esteemed by several princes of Germany, and received Letters from them, full of civilities. Anne Dorothy, duchess of Saxony, did him the honour to write frequently to him. He was lamented in an extraordinary manner; all the poets of Germany, of the Ausburg confession, made funeral elegies, lamenting his untimely death. A collection of these poems has been printed, with the funeral oration, and some other pieces, under the title of Cippus memorialis, by the care of Wynckelman, colleague of the deceased. The son of this Wynckelman had the Cippus reprinted in the year 1650.

seventh chapters of Daniel. This character doth not agree with the Theatrum Historicum. On the other hand, the title and character by which Vossius represents the book he speaks of, agree perfectly with the Theatrum Historicum, sive Chronologiae systema novum, where we see only divisions of tens, fifties, and hundreds, which do not exceed one another. In fine, John Justus Wynckelman, the son of him who pronounced the funeral oration, remarks very expressly (10), that Schuppius published two works of his father-in-law Helvicus, with Continuations until the year 1639; one is, Theatrum Historicum, in folio; the other Chronologia Universalis, in quarto. I forbear observing, that Helvicus did not at all publish his chronology himself, which he had continued to the year 1612. It was published by his colleague, Steuber, in the year 1618.

Tanquillus Faber, doth not find them exact as to the time in which the poets, philosophers, and other learned persons flourished. 'Primum hoc mihi credas velim, Helvicum non satis locupletis esse fidei in hac Chronologiae parte quæ virorum scriptis illustrium ætatem signat: dein hoc quoque habet Helvicus, quod fere plerumque recentiores scriptores sequatur, ut elegiarum, biolothecariorum, &c. quale ali- quid quoque in Calvisio improbat Scaliger, quem admodum ex Epistolis ejus apparet; quamvis Calvisii opus, ex quo totus est Helvicus, mirifice laudaret. Sed quod dico, allatis infra exemplis planius constabit (11). — In the first place, I desire you to observe, that Helvicus is not entirely to be depended upon, in that part of chronology, which relates to the age of famous authors: and likewise he for the most part follows modern authors, such as collectors and writers of Bibliothèques &c. Scaliger finds some such fault with Calvisius likewise, tho' he highly commended that work of Calvisius, from which Helvicus takes most of his. What I say will be more evident from some examples, which I shall afterwards produce.' The instances he promises and afterwards gives, relate to the errors of Helvicus concerning Athenæus, Lucian, Justin, and Hermogenes.

[F] By the books we have of him.] I have already taken notice of some of them, and here follow more. He published chronological dissertations on the four monarchies, on the seventy weeks of Daniel, on

Cyrus, and the other kings of Persia, &c. He so solidly confuted the opinions of Angelocrator, that nothing could be replied (12). And yet Angelocrator pretended to inspiration, declaring in the front of his book, that he had composed it, Deo illuminante (13). This much diminishes the glory of those who confused him, it being an easy thing to find a thousand chimeras in the writings of those pretended inspired men. Though they should not be actually Fanatics, and had only in view, the raising of the passions, they would, by their boast of such a thing against their conscience, betray such a disordered mind, as must needs expose them to the lashes of the meanest critic. Helvicus wrote some treatises, de Dialecticis Græcis, de ratione carmina Græca conscribendi, de Paraphrasi Bibliorum Chaldaica, a Latin art of poetry, desiderium Evæ, cum aliorum dictorum Bibliorum a depravationibus Judæorum, Calvinianorum & Photinianorum erroribus annexa vindicatione: Synopsis historiae universalis. He had put to the press the Hebrew art of poetry, and had already written the epistle dedicatory to it; but he suppressed it for some reasons (14). See the Sieur Witte, in his Diarium Biographicum; but especially see the Theatre of Paul Frenerus (15), and the Templum Honoris of Spizelius. You will there find a long, and, I think, a pretty exact catalogue of Helvicus's works. Most of them are in Latin, the rest in High-Dutch. Correct Frenerus in the epitaph XXXVI (16), and IX and make it XXXV, and IIX. It is strange, that they who have corrected this great book, should not see, that a man who was born the twenty sixth of December, 1581 (17), and died the tenth of September, 1617 (18), did not live thirty six years, nine months and a half. There are XXXV years and IIX months 393, in the epitaph recited by Wynckelman (19), he has likewise been guilty of a mistake by saying, in the funeral oration, that Helvicus died in the thirty seventh year of his age, anno ætatis suæ trigesimo septimo. He writ this all at length, and not in figures. He writes in the same manner the day of his birth, and the day of his death; the first is, according to him, the twenty sixth of December 1581, and the other is the tenth of September 1617. How then doth he make out the thirty seven years? the easier it is to avoid these faults, the more a man is obliged to avoid them.

He applied himself much more to the study of polite learning, and the science of medals [A], than to theological disputes. He was both a poet and an orator. At Rome he made a panegyric upon Clement VIII, with so great success, that the choice was given him of being either keeper of the Vatican library, or of of having a very good benefice (b). He contented himself to be a canon of the cathedral of Antwerp (c). He had a great share in the esteem and friendship of Justus Lipsius, his professor; which appears by the letters that Lipsius wrote to him (d), and the testimony he gave him in the year 1600 (e). Hemelar was then preparing himself for his voyage to Italy. He lived six years at Rome with cardinal Cesi (f). He was a friend of Grotius, and published some verses, congratulating him on his escape out of prison (g). He was brother to the mother of James Golius, that learned professor at Leyden, who acquired so great a reputation by his profound knowledge of the Oriental tongues. He would doubtless have desired to bring over this nephew to the Roman communion, as he had done Peter Golius, the brother of James; but he would not have been able to accomplish this design. James Golius was a good Protestant, who all his life entertained a grudge against his uncle, for having persuaded his brother to change his religion (h). Moreri, who in the article of Golius, informs us, that he speaks elsewhere of our John Hemelar, gives us but a false information. I shall not imitate him with regard to the promise I have made in the same article, of saying something concerning PETER GOLIUS [B].

'passed the highest fame he conceals his name.' The words preceding these in Gronovius's oration, are too fine to be omitted. 'Mater (Golii) omni sexus laude prædita . . . vel unica Johannis Hemelarii fratris imagine sat nobilis est, viri & in veterum literarum tractatione cum primis exercitati, & poëtae disertæ, & probitate ac tranquillitate vitæ fugaque honorum & negotiorum T. aliquem Pomponium Atticum referentis. He delivered a panegyric on Clement the VIII, which gained him such applause, that, being desired to choose either the office of keeper of the Vatican library, or a rich benefice (a canonry as it is called), he contented himself with a living at Antwerp.' Mr Colomiés (3) assures us, that Hemelar's book upon medals is very scarce, and yet there were three editions of it (4). The other works of this canon of Antwerp, are, Gratulationis in inaugurationem D. Christiani Michaëlis, D. Michaëlis apud Antwerpenses Præmonstratensis Canonici Abbatis. [B] I shall say something concerning PETER GOLIUS.] He had the same inclination as his brother for voyages to the Levant, and for the Oriental tongues. He turned a barefooted Carmelite, and took the name of Celestin of Saint Liduina. He sojourned many years upon mount Libanus, and was professor of the oriental tongues at Rome. He translated Thomas à Kempis, into Arabic, and undertook, at the age of seventy four, a voyage to the coasts of Malabar, to endeavour the conversion of the infidels. The diversity of religion and profession, did not hinder the two brothers from loving one another very affectionately. Peter wrote to James that he was beholden to him for the civil treatment which he received in Asia. 'Frater Ascetes è familia discalceatorum cum per vestigia fratris in Oriente decurreret, scripsit ad nostrum diu jam reducem omnia sibi evenire præter expectationem: parasse se ad vincula carceres verbera, cruces, invenire amplexus, gratulationes, studia, gratias potentium ob nomen Golium: eam memoriam id desiderium sui reliquerat: ita gratiam absentis referebant. (5) — When his brother, the Carmelite was travelling in the east, in the same places where James had before been, he wrote to him that every thing had happened to him beyond his expectation, and that he had prepared himself for bonds, imprisonments, buffeting, and crosses, and instead of these he had found embraces, welcomes, civilities, and carresses, from the great, on account of his name Golius: so acceptable, so beloved, had he rendered himself when there, and so did they show their affection to him when absent.' Thus the name of Golius was in such esteem there, since James's travels, that a great deal of honour was paid to it in the person of Peter. For the rest, we must not imagine that Hemelar had need of much wit or industry to bring over his nephew to the Roman communion; for he persuaded him to it when he was but a child. Peter Golius was bred in his house from eight years of age. I will transcribe the words of Gronovius, upon which I ground this opinion. They will shew that this child had a very forward wit. 'Unum in eo (Hemelario) non sine gemitu solebat accusare noster, quod fratrem Petrum revocasset ad religionem parentibus ejuratas virum alioquin egregium, & fraterno secum animo, nec minus gnarum rerum & linguarum Orientis, dique in partibus iisdem versatum & Arabicæ linguæ Romæ Professore: qui quam præcoqui fuerit indole, testis est oratio, quam Christiano Michaëlio Abbati Præmonstratensi ab Hemelario scriptam gratulandi causa, puer octo annorum constanter, & quasi fecisset, memoriter pronuntiavit. — Our Golius used to accuse Hemelar of one thing, not without sighs, that he had seduced his brother Peter to the Roman communion, who was, in other respects, a very extraordinary person, and he always retained a brotherly affection to him, who was no less skilled in the affairs and languages of the east, where he had long sojourned, and was professor of the Arabic tongue at Rome: a proof of the forwardness of his wit, we have in a gratulatory oration composed by Hemelar, to Christian Michaelius, abbot of the Præmonstrants, which he, when a boy of eight years of age, pronounced with as much ease as if it had been his own performance.'

HEMMINGIUS (NICOLAS) professor of Divinity at Copenhagen, was born in the year 1513, in the isle of Laland (a). His first education could not be very advantageous to him, being under the direction of a Blacksmith, his father's brother. However he made some progress in learning, and afterwards went to Wittemberg, where for five years he was one of Melanchthon's most constant auditors. As he was obliged to get his living either by instructing scholars, or writing for them, we must the more admire the learning he acquired. He returned from thence to Denmark, and by Melanchthon's recommendation, was taken into a gentleman's house to instruct his daughters. He was afterwards made minister of the church of the Holy Ghost at Copenhagen, and afterwards professor of the Hebrew tongue. He took his doctor of divinity's degree in the year 1557, and immediately after was made professor in the same faculty at Copenhagen. He discharged the duties of it excellently well till the year 1579, when he was declared emeritus, and vested with a canonry in the church of Roschild. He peaceably enjoyed that preferment to his death; that is, to the twenty third of May 1600. He was blind the last years of his life (b), which is the less surprising, when we consider that he was very studious, and lived eighty seven years. It ought to be observed, that he not only was not a very rigid Lutheran [A]; but that there is some probability, that if it had not been prevented, he would have shewn himself a good Calvinist. His inclination for the opinions of Geneva was perceived: he was obliged to explain himself, and even to make a recantation [B]. He gave a confession of the Lutheran faith, and yet not long since there has been a divine who has endeavoured to shew that it agrees with that of the Calvinists [C]. Hemmingius published

[A] He was not a very rigid Lutheran.] This one proof will be sufficient for me. The articles of union, which the divines of Saxony, and their adherents, endeavoured to establish over all the Lutheran world, were rejected with great indignation in Denmark. King Frederic II forbade all his subjects to sign them, and threatened all with banishment who should disobey that order, or bring copies of that book into his dominions (1). See the remark [E]. Now Hemmingius was the principal promoter of this affair (2), as Hopsinian observes, who in this fact has not been contradicted by Hutterus.

Hopsinian (3) relates that Hemmingius, in his Synagoga Institutionum Christianarum, published in the year 1574, explained himself upon the Real Presence like a Calvinist. Mr Masius does not disown this; but he adds, that Hemmingius, being admonished of his error, solemnly retracted it (4). "Non dissimulandum esse"

(says Masius) Calvini sententia de S. Cæna aliquandiu indulsisse, (Hemmingium) sed monitum à cæteris Theologis ad meliorem mentem reversum deposito errore palinodiam cecinisse. Quam in rem ejus confessionem, ipsius manu scriptam (5) sibi quæ à Viro Illustri D. Engberg Consiliario Regis & Judice Provinciali Seelandiaæ dono datam, subiungit. The author from whom I borrow these words, shews us, by some passages of the Synagoga, that Hemmingius impugned the ubiquity, and bestowed eulogies on Calvin for accusing, and on the magistrates of Geneva for punishing, Servetus. "Com his hæresiarchis damnatus etiam impius nebulonem Michaelem Servetum, qui ratione contentis sanctorum Patrum Conciliis, Arii & aliorum fanaticorum hominum damnatas hæreses revocare conatus est, quem iusto accusatum à D. Johanne Calvino, merito Genevates affecere supplicio"

[C] A divine has endeavoured to shew that Hemmingius's confession agrees with that of the Calvinists.] Mr Masius, professor of divinity at Copenhagen, has communicated to the public the confession that was required of Hemmingius. It imports that he firmly believed that JESUS CHRIST wholly, God and man, is substantially present in the Lord's Supper, wherever it is celebrated according to his institution; and that he conveys and delivers to all communicants, worthy and unworthy, his true body and true blood, which he has shed for us, for the remission of sins; and that his body and blood are truly and really taken with the bread and wine by the communicants, inasmuch that it is a true meat, and a true drink, with which man is nourished, refreshed, and quickened to eternal life. Se statum & firmiter credere totum Christum Deum & hominem substantialiter adesse presentem in Cæna sua ubique celebratur juxta ipsius ordinationem, ipsique adesse & exhibere omnibus communicantibus dignis & indignis suum verum corpus & verum sanguinem quem effudit pro nobis in remissionem peccatorum, & hoc corpus & hunc sanguinem vere & realiter eum pane & vino à communicantibus sumi, ita ut verus sit cibus & potus quo homo pascitur, reficitur & vivificatur ad vitam æternam (7). For the rest, Hemmingius acknowledged that his confession was consonant to that of Augsburg, to the little Catechism of Luther, and to the system of the doctrine of the Saxon churches, and he declared that he disowned whatever in his Synagoga has offended the churches, and is agreeable to Calvin's opinion about the Holy Supper, or that is not consistent with his present confession. Cum jam aliter in Synagoga sua scripsisset juxta sententiam Calvini de re sacramentaria quo Ecclesia offensa sint, & quod cum bas sua præsentis confessione pugnet, id quicquid sit in universum revocare, & hoc suo scripto revocatum velle (8). He begs pardon of the king, and of all those whom his Synagoga had offended (9). It is plain, that his confession is wholly Lutheran, and we ought to believe that the doctors who obliged him to retract, prescribed him the expressions that they thought most capable of taking away equivocations, and denoting precisely and formally his orthodoxy, and the abjuration of his error. And yet it is incredible what efforts the divine, whom I cite, hath made in order to shew that Hemmingius did not make a recantation. The Parentheses, and the Nota Bene's with which he intermixes the words of the confession, in order to evade the consequences and pretensions of Mr Masius, seem to him so solid, that he is not afraid to affirm that Hemmingius retracted but very little, and that good Calvinists might honestly sign that confession, explained and understood in it's true sense. Videt itaque rursum vir clarissimus, quantum id sit quod hac confessione sua Hemmingius revocavit, cui & nos dummodo recte intelligantur & recte explicentur possumus assensu assensu: & quam preter ille adduc absque rum cum collegi à fide prænotis Lutherana (10). From whence we may conclude, how difficult it is to draw up any Formula, that shall cut off all occasion of dispute. Men believe they have prevented all sorts of equivocations, but in the end they find that an adversary finds a thousand evasions, and would persuade us, that we had quite other thoughts than what we know very well we had. In certain cases this is to undertake what Pericles undertook, and in which he succeeded. Being thrown upon the ground in wrestling, he persuaded the spectators that he did not really fall (11). Some readers may possibly here call to mind an unlucky observation which they may have read in the History of the Variations remark [D].

(12). The Lutherans assure us in their book of Concord, that Luther was led to that expression (13) by the subtleties of the Sacramentarians, who found a way of variations, to accommodate to their moral presence, the strongest and most precise expressions of Luther, for the real and substantial presence; from which we, by the by, see once more, that we ought not to wonder if the defenders of the figurative sense, find a way of drawing the holy fathers to their side, since Luther himself, alive and speaking, who knew their subtleties, and undertook to confute them, was hard put to it to find words which they did not pervert to their own sense by their interpretations: being tired with their subtleties, he resolved to find an expression which they could no longer elude, and therefore composed the article of Smalcalde in the form that we have seen it. The bishop of Meaux might have found a famous instance of all this in his own church. The bull of Innocent X, against the opinions of Janse- nius, did not hinder the Jansemits from proceeding in their disputes. They intrenched themselves in abundance of subtleties and infinite distinctions. To drive them from that hold, Alexander VII was made to speak in a more precise manner, and they inserted in his bull whatever was thought proper to ruin the distinctions and subtleties of the Port Royal. That signified nothing. The Jansemits continued to maintain, that the doctrine of Jansenius was not yet condemned. Mr Arnould displayed a hundred observations borrowed from the subtlest logic (14). The reading of such a paper must have greatly astonished the Pope: he would have seen the vanity of his precautions, and perceived that they proved to him, that he did not mean what he knew very well he had meant. As far as I see (he might have said) you know my thoughts better than myself. What a pretty thing is the Canonis of cardinal Laurea (15)? And when we consider the infinite distinctions that are necessary in order to discover exactly what is ordained by the bulls, and what is not (16), we easily perceive that the infallibility of St Peter's chair is of no use, unless we suppose that every lifted several books: his short theological treatises were so highly esteemed by Simon Goulart, that he caused them to be re-printed at Geneva, in the year 1586 [D]. Add to this, that at the age of seventy years, he composed a book, intituled, Immanuel, which seems principally to have been designed as a confutation of James Andreas, the great promoter of Ubiquitism (c). This work which is much praised (d), was not printed till after the death of the author. It was published at Francfort, in the year 1615 (e), with a preface which will furnish us with a supplement to what we have said concerning the vigour with which the king of Denmark rejected the Book of Concord [E].

[D] His short theological treatises were so highly esteemed by Simon Goulart, that he caused them to be re-printed at Geneva in the year 1586.] See the epistle dedicatory of the edition which he procured. For the rest, he acquaints the reader, that he has cleared some things which Hemmingius had not sufficiently explained, and which offended many people.

[E] Here follows a supplement to what we have said (17) concerning the vigour with which the king of Denmark rejected the book of the Concord. An Englishman (18), who wrote the preface to this posthumous Work of Hemmingius, acquaints us (19), that queen Elizabeth left no means untried to induce the king of Denmark to act in this manner. He relates several particulars of the indignation of this prince, and, among others, that he threw into the fire, the book of Concord, which was sent him covered with silk, and adorned with jewels: 'Imo quod memorabile imprimis est è pietissimo Danorum Rege Frederico 2. ab aula Electorali Saxoniâ, ut ut missus, holserico obductus, auro, gemmisque pretiosis affabre ornatus magno, & pio Zelo Vulcano traditus est, annexâ gravissimâ penâ & inspectione ejus rei universi Regni Episcopis demandata sub confiscatione, in regnum ne importaretur, ibidemve distraheretur, neve sub exilio certissimo ab ullo possideretur, eo quod in illo nova, & in istis regionibus antè inaudita, ac (prout habet ipsum diploma Regium in librum Concordiæ vibratum, à doctis viris mihi non semel in Regni explicatum) inusitata comprehenderentur dogmata: recepta verò ibi ex adverso sunt cum Lutheri, Philippi quoque scripta, inter hæc cum primis CORPUS DOCTRINÆ, tribunitiæque illæ, ac declaratorie conciones S. Cathedralis pulse (20). — Nay which above all deserves to be observed, it was with a holy zeal thrown into the flames, by that pious prince, Frederic II, king of Denmark, though it was sent to him from the electoral court of Saxony, covered with silk, and richly adorned with gold and jewels, the importing or vending of it in his kingdom, was likewise forbid under a high penalty, and the inspection was committed to all the bishops of the kingdom, under the penalty of confiscation, and that none should presume to keep it in their possession, under the pain of banishment; it containing many new, strange, and unheard-of doctrines, in these parts: (these are the words of the Royal Edit, published against the book of Concord, as I have heard it more than once explained by learned men in Denmark.) On the other hand, the books of Luther and Melancthon are here received, and above all his CORPUS DOCTRINÆ, and these seditious and declamatory harangues were banished from the pulpits.' He observes that Hutterus highly condemned this conduct of the king of Denmark. 'Heroicum istud Regis Frederici factum vocat (Hutterus in libro quem appellat CONCORDIA CONCORDS) durum nimis & Rhadamantheum plane, Regemque & quidem Christianum haud decens, sed cum enormi, tantoque Rege indignâ proflus animi impotentia, & nimia affectuum vehementia conjunctum, quod tanti Regis dignitatem, prudentiam, & exultationes haud leviter, omnibus, qui saltem aliquid judicare possunt, suspectas reddit. — Hutterus, in his book he entitles CONCORDIA CONCORDS, calls this heroic action of king Frederic, harsh, and altogether Rhadamantian, unbecoming a prince, and a Christian, attended with great folly and heat of passion, altogether unworthy of so great a king. And that it gives no small ground, to people of sense; at least to call in question his dignity, prudence, and reputation.' But that it has been highly celebrated by Christopher Knobius, in his funeral oration on that prince. I shall quote the passage which will show us the warm zeal of that prince, who frequently said, that this controversy among the Lutherans, had done more mischief, than the Turks could have done, by sacking these provinces where it first arose. 'Christophorus Knobius Aulicus illius (Regis) Concionator in Concione funebri in exequiis Regis habita anno 1588. 5 Junii sic de illo loquitur: Sollicitus erat ne sui quoque Doctores in abyssum hujus periculis, & nocentissimæ disputationis abriperentur, ideoque voluit isti negotio immiseri: etiam querebatur, damnum quod Christiana Ecclesia ex hac disputatione sentiebat, non posse tali Concordiæ Bergenfis formula sanari: & sciunt complures honestissimi viri, quanto cum affectu id factum doleat, quinimo illum sæpius dixisse, si Turca illas regiones, in quibus hæc certamina nata sunt, & adoleverunt, depopulatus fuisset, non tantum damni potuisse inferri, quantum hæc disputatio intulit, nec finem posse videri hujus certaminis (21). — Christopher Knobius, chaplain to that prince, in an oration pronounced at his obsequies in the year 1588, June 5, speaks of him in this manner. Being afraid lest his clergy should be hurried into the abyss of this dangerous and hurtful controversy, he would not at all meddle in it; and he complained that the hurt which the Christian church had sustained by it, could not be healed by this form of Concord of Berg. Many men of great note know what sorrow he felt on that account, and that he has frequently said, that if the Turk had sacked these provinces wherein these disputes began, and were cherished, he could not have done so much hurt as this dispute had done, and that no end of that controversy could be foreseen.' Queen Elizabeth made use of the same comparison in her letter to the elector of Saxony. Your country, says she (22), has sustained more prejudice by this pretended Concord, than if the Turks, had entered it with fire and sword. The author (23) who mentions this particular, observes that the ministers in Holland, prevailed with this queen, to persuade the king of Denmark to reject the book of Concord. We see, in the preface to Hemmingius's book, that the success of this king continued to reject that book, for which the author of the preface bestows great praises on him. 'Robinson pag. 10. ejusdem ad Lectorem præfationis sic concludit. Deus qui nunquam deest Ecclesiæ suæ, irrequietorum talium hominum conatus ut olim per pios Magistratus, in Daniâ præsertim, mirè impedit: ita etiam nunc per optimi patris optimum filium, re & nomine verum Christianum, patris vestigiis severe insistentem, pietate, & justitiâ regna sua firmantem, Pontificiorum, Ubiquitariorum, & aliorum schismaticorum ac turbulentorum hominum studia maturè, & prudenter in ipsâ herbâ reprimentem, benignè retardavit (24). — Robinson in the tenth page of the said preface to the reader concludes thus. GOD, who never forsakes his church, put a wonderful stop to the attempts of these turbulent spirits, as in former times, by pious rulers, especially in Denmark. So likewise in our days has he graciously curbed them by the excellent son of an excellent father, a Christian, both in name and thing, and who worthily goes on in his father's foot-steps, establishing his kingdom in piety and justice, and prudently checking in the bud the designs of Popists, Ubiquitarians, and other schismatics, and seditious persons.'

I frankly own that I do not take those things from the fountain-head, I have no other original but the notes of Lewis Gerard de Renesse on a letter which he reprinted at Breda in 1651 (25); and which had been first published in 1579, in Latin, Dutch, and German. It is intituled, 'Apologetica Reformatarum in Belgio Ecclesiarum Epistola, ad, & contra Auctores Libri Bergenfis, dicti, Concordiæ. — An Apology for the Reformed Churches in Holland, by way of Epistle to and against the authors of a book from Berg called Of Concord.' HENAUULT (N). A French poet in the XVIIth Century, 'Author of the sonnet upon Mrs de Guerchi [A], and teacher to Madam des Houlieries, was pretty famous in Paris whilst he lived, and is so still, though he has been dead these fourteen years (a). It is true, his merit not being in print [B], to use Mr Menage's phrase, his reputation could not spread itself like that of some others, who at Paris never enjoyed so great a one as himself. He was a man of wit and learning, loving pleasure with refinement, and a debauchee with art and delicacy; but he had the worst turn of mind imaginable. He pretended to be an Atheist, and made ostentation of his sentiments with a fury and affectation that were abominable. He composed three different systems concerning the mortality of the soul [C], and made a voyage

[A] Author of the sonnet upon Mrs de Guerchi. Before I published, in the remark [G] of the article SPINOZA, the extract of the letter where these words are contained, I had already observed (1) that the sonnet of the Abbotive was thought to be Mr Henault's, and that he had composed it upon Mrs de Guerchi. But as soon as my dictionary appeared at London, a learned English gentleman there, did me the honour to write to me, I. that he knew from the first hand, that this sonnet was seen two or three years before the death of Mrs de Guerchi; II. that some persons who pretended to know it very well, assured him, that it was made by Subligni, author of the Falsé Clelia. I communicated this to the ingenious gentleman, who had written to me the letter, whereof I had inserted an extract in the article of SPINOZA. He answered me, that Mr Lucas had assured him that the sonnet on the Abbotive was composed twenty years before the accident of Mrs de Guerchi, but that all connoisseurs in these matters, whom he had consulted, said, it was written upon a miscarriage of that handsome woman, but not that which cost her her life. Twenty of my friends, adds he, who have lived with Henault, have assured me, that the sonnet was positively his, and that he owned it. Subligni was still in the college when that piece was first published: his widow and his daughter have confirmed it to me, that he was not the author of it. Let us then lay down for certain, that it is a piece of our Henault; for we shall see, below, that it was put into the collection of that poet's works: but let us very much doubt that it was made on Mrs Guerchi. It is looked upon as a master-piece, though it be against the rules (2) and has even one barbarism in it (3).

(1) In the article P A T I N, pag. 744, letter (d), I have left it out in this second edition.

* He made himself esteemed at the Bar. There are some plays of his composition, and some critical remarks on Andromache.

† Judgment upon the works of St Evremont, 1668, in 12mo, at Paris by the Sieur Dumont. It is a false name: it is attributed to Mr Cotelendi, author of Arlequiniana; some think Mr Erard, a famous advocate, had a good hand in it.

[B] His merit not being in print. This is found to be false. 'Mr d'Henault himself in his life-time, caused a little collection of his works to be printed at Paris by Barbin in 1670, in 12mo. Oeuvres diverses . . . par le Sieur D. H. It is dedicated to Monsieur Doort without any other title, it contains prose and verse, and letters in prose and verse to Sappho, who very probably is Madam des Houlieries. The sonnet on the Abbotive is there . . . We must not forget the first piece in the book intitled, Consolation to Olympia. It will furnish me with two critical observations: one is, that the compilers of St Evremont's works, being perhaps deceived by some body, or by a pretended conformity of style, have placed this whole letter, which is very long, among his works, and a great many people who pretend to be nice judges, have taken it for a genuine piece of his. This is an example, which you may add to those which you have collected concerning the errors, into which this likeness of style daily leads the critics. The second observation falls directly upon a new censor . . . who has pretended to pass a judgment upon the works of St Evremont † . . . This man has fallen headlong into the snare that was laid by the compiler. He attacks that letter of Consolation to Olympia in the style, on the thoughts and sentiments, and he bestows a fourth part of his book on this notable criticism. This is what I have found in a collection of remarks, which a young advocate of the parliament of Paris did me the favour to send me in the year 1698, and which convinced me, that he has an infinite deal of wit, and an exact knowledge of many curious matters of fact, and such as are very proper for this dictionary (4).

[C] He had made three different systems concerning the mortality of the soul. Let us give one passage more out of that collection of remarks just now mentioned. 'Henault saith, in his epistle dedicatory, You know that I am a man wholly by my self, that I do not place my happiness in the opinion of others, that my maxims or my errors are very different from those of all the world besides. By this he begins to discover what he was. Many of his verses are imitations of the Chorus of Seneca, and amongst others of the second act of the Troas, where the mortality of the soul is established: that subject hit his taste.'

(4) See, below, the end of the remark [Q], in the article of GUISE.

Comme se perd en un moment
Cette portion d'air dans les corps enfermée;
Que le plus actif élément
Développe & pousse en fumée;
Comme au souffle des aquilons
On voit bien-tôt évanouïe
Une grosse nuée ou de grêle ou de pluie,
Qui d'un déluge affreux menace les valons;
Ainsi s'épand cette âme vaine
Qui meut tous les ressorts de la machine humaine.
Tout meurt en nous quand nous mourons:
La mort ne laisse rien, & n'est rien elle-même,
Du peu de tems que nous durons
Ce n'est que le moment extrême, &c.

'I am surprized that this was printed with the king's privilege. This man had a tender heart; he said to his mistress:

Sappho fit des vers comme vous, Faites l'amour comme elle.

'He would have her to renounce glory.

Pour moi je ne suis point la dupe de la gloire,
Je vous quitte ma place au Temple de mémoire,
Et je ne conçois point que la loi du trépas
Doive épargner mon nom & ne m'épargner pas.
Je me mets au dessus de cette erreur commune,
On meurt, & ressource & sans réserve aucune.
S'il est après ma mort quelque reste de moi,
Ce reste un peu plus tard suivra la même loi,
Fera place à son tour à de nouvelles choses,
Et se replongera dans le sein de ses causes.

† Mais les gens de de là les monts Aurent bien-tôt pleuré cet homme, Car il défend les sanctiones, chose très nécessaire à Rome. La Fontaine, in his Posthumous works, speaking of Isaac cent XI, Quand l'objet en mon cœur a place, Et qu'à mes yeux il est joli, Do nomen quod libet illi. Id. ibid.

'This is no translation, but an original, and thus it is, that this man scattered in his works the seeds of his errors. In the two pieces that have been inserted in the Furetieriana, you will find also the same opinions which he endeavours to insinuate every where. To his impieties he added gross impurities. Some are to be found in a piece intitled le Bail d'un cœur à Chloris, the leasing of a heart to Chloris, which is in that collection, and assuredly that Chloris might well be one of la Fontaine's Jeannetons †. These verses are bolder than all his

* voyage to Holland on purpose to see Spinoza, who yet made but little account of his learning. At his death matters changed extremely: he was converted, and would have carried things to excess: his confessor was obliged to hinder him from receiving the Viaticum in the midst of his chamber with a halter about his neck. D' Henault was of no considerable family, his father was a Baker, and he himself was at first receiver of the taxes in Forez, where he did not manage his affairs well. He taught Madam des Houlières all that he knew or fancied he knew. It is pretended that this appears in the works of that lady [D]. This is an extract of a letter which an ingenious gentleman honoured me with the twenty seventh of April, 1696. He writ to me another the nineteenth of July, 1697, in which he informed me, that d' Henault had drawn up the plea of Mr Clodré, governor of Martinico, against Mr de la Barre, governor of the isles of America, and a manifesto of Mr de Gadagne, about the affair of Gigeri. You will find in the Fureteriana, an elegy (b) and an eclogue (c) of this author. The elegy is usher'd in with this commendation, Monsieur d'Henault was esteemed by every body . . . He was every way a gentleman, and amorous. He composed a sonnet which gave occasion to Mr Colbert to do a handsome thing [E]. He was married, and left one daughter, who is a pensionary in a convent at Paris. Our remarks are filled with several particulars which have been communicated to us, to which I refer the reader.

[D] It is pretended that this appears in the works of that lady. The reader may have seen in the first edition of this dictionary, pag 1088, of the second tome, that he, to whom the words of this text belong, immediately adds, I have seen some people take notice, among other verses in the laylle, on a river †

† Pag. 164, Tome I, of Madam des Houlières's Poems: you will find it also in the Cosmographie Galante of May 1693, pag. 552.

Courez, ruisseau, courez, fuyez & reportez
Vos ondes dans le sein des mers dont vous sortez;
Tandis que pour remplir la dure destinée
Où nous sommes assujettis,
Nous irons reporter la vie infortunée
Dans le sein du néant d'où nous sommes sortis.

Run, river, run, and hasten to the sea;
There lose yourself in it's immensity.
So we, the struggle ore with care and strife,
In non-existence lose a wretched life.

It is certain that a person, who should speak after this manner, dogmatically would deny the immortality of the soul. But for the honour of Madam des Houlières, let us say that she only followed poetical ideas which are not to be drawn into consequence. Thus in imitation of the ancient poets, she says in another place (s), that after our death our soul wanders on the infernal shores. This could not have been her belief, if Mr de Henault had taught her his impieties. Let us not judge her by poetical phrases. Not but that abundance of licentiousness may be concealed under the privileges of versification. The advocate I have mentioned, has a note upon this passage. You have quoted, says he to me in his letter, some verses of

(s) See the article PLOTI. NUS, remark [A].

Madam des Houlières which are suspected of Libertinism: but they have made you omit one † which is not the least emphatical, and which is in the edition of her poems. To speak the truth; there are many moral, and even Christian and sacred, pieces in her works, which correct this one. Some people however were at pains to represent her as a Libertine; for she complains of it in her epistle to Father la Chaise on the hypocrites. She was a very great wit, the honour of her sex, and the shame of ours.

Note, that under pretence that she says we are produced out of nothing, it could not be pretended, that she believed the creation; for Mr d'Henault shews plainly enough (6) that by the word nothing, he meant not the privation of existence, but the meer privation of life. In this sense he did not admit of the creation.

[E] He composed a sonnet which gave occasion to Mr Colbert to do a handsome thing. The collection of remarks before cited, furnishes me with another good commentary. To return to Mr d'Henault, it is of him Mr Boileau speaks in two places of his ninth satire: Je le declare donc, Haynault est un Virgil. I declare it then, Haynault is a Virgil. But Mr Boileau told me himself that he thought him a pretty good poet, and that his best piece, not for it's matter, but for the composition, was a sonnet against Mr Colbert, which began with this verse, Ministre avare & lâche, esclave Malheureux. — O griping base minister, O miserable slave. Mr Colbert on this occasion did a noble thing; he was told of this sonnet, which made a noise at that time. He asked whether there was nothing in it against the king, he was told there was not; whereupon he answered, that he minded it not, and would not resent it against the author. Is not this something nobler than the sonnet?

HENICHIUS (JOHN) professor of Divinity in the university of Rintel in the country of Hesse, was the son of a minister of Winhusen, and was born in the month of January 1616. He went through the Classics at Zell and Lunenburg, and then was sent to Helmstadt in the year 1634; where, after he had studied four years, he was admitted doctor of philosophy. Having afterwards read some lectures, and moderated in some public disputations, he gained, in a very particular manner, the friendship of Dr Calixtus and Dr Horneius, two celebrated divines. He went to Heldeſheim towards the end of the year 1639, and he lived there about three years with a gentleman of merit (a). He took a journey after that towards the Rhine, and then staid some time with James Lampadius at Hanover. He was made professor of Metaphysics, and of the Hebrew tongue in the university of Rintel, in the year 1643, and at the end of a year and a half he was called to Bardewic to be super-intendant there. He exercised the functions of that office five years together, with so much diligence, that Augustus, duke of Brunſwic, would have given him the inspection of the whole diocese of Wolfenbüttele; but he did not accept of it. He even quitted his employment, because the fatigues he had gone through had brought on him a tedious sickness. He returned to Rintel in the year 1651, to be professor of Divinity there. He was solemnly invested with the honour of a doctor's degree in the same faculty, and had a place soon assigned him in the ecclesiastical Consistory, and was made inspector of the churches of the county of V O L. [A] Several works which he published.] Here is the catalogue that Mr Witte has given of them (1). Dissertatio de Mosephate civili: Rintel. 1653 in 4to. De Cultu creaturarum & imaginum Dissert. ibid 1653 in 4to. De Libertate Arbitrii, imprimis de concursu causae secundae cum primis: ibid. 1645 in 4to. De officio boni Principis pique Subditi: ibid. 1661 in 12mo. Dissertatio de Penitentia lapsorum: ibid. 1659 in 4to. De Gratia & Prædestinatione Dissertatio: ibid. 1663 in 4to. Compendium S. Trinitatis: De Confessione Augustini, de Fide & Operibus: &c.

I have something to observe upon the book of Veritate Religionis Christianae, which is in that list. It is a very good supplement to that of Grotius on the same same subject: for Henichius explains, illustrates, and proves more at large the arguments that Grotius had made use of. He informs us of this in the title, where he says, quod ea quae vir illustris Hugo Grotius de hac materia commentatus est, aliquanto uberius expenuntur. By the way let us observe, that Grotius has been accused of plagiarism, and let us place here an addition, which was at the end of the first volume of this dictionary in the first edition, and which the Printer has not placed where it ought to be in the second. It contains these words: 'to me there seems nothing more false, than what was said to Mr Wheeler and Mr Spon, That Grotius had stole his principal argument for the truth of the Christian religion, from an Arabic author, and particularly from the works of an excellent man, whom the Latins held for an arch-heretic but whom the Copti look upon as a saint, who has written an excellent book against the Turks and Jews for the truth of the Christian religion' (2). Note as to the three volumes of our Henichius's Ecclesiastical History, that they reach but to the end of the Vth century; and though the title promises the civil as well as the ecclesiastical history, the author dwells principally on the latter. The first volume contains the three first centuries; the second contains the fourth, and the third, the fifth. Bosius who had said, in his Sebediasma de comparanda notitia scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, that Henichius's work comprehended the six first centuries, was too rudely censured for it. He acknowledged his error, and corrected it with his own hand in the copy of his book. Such faults as these may be pointed out, but it should be done without bitterness and insulting, remembering that it is very easy to commit them. Aberationem agnovit, ac manu sua in exemplari privato correxit: ut adeo acrem illam Clarissimi Slateri censuram non videatur meruisse. Et quam facili in his talibus sit lapsus, unusquisque intelligit (3). The author who says this, observes, that Henichius, after giving the substance of what is said by the ancient authors, afterwards sets down the passages at full length. He has reason to say that this ought to recommend his work. Cæterum Henichianum opus vel eo etiam nomine meretur commendari, quod integra auctorum veterum testimonia adscribat, quorum summam prius attulerat (4).

[B] He passionately desired an union betwixt the Lutherans and Calvinists.] He is praised for it in his funeral Program (5): 'Pacis & concordiae perpetuus studiosus, nihilque magis in votis habebat, quam ut schisma inter Evangelicos funditus tolleretur, & togata praelia in suggellibus & Cathedris cum salutifera, DEO & hominibus gratâ pace, fausto omine, commutarentur: qua de causa immortalem nominis gloriam apud omnes bonos, adeptus est. — He was a constant lover of peace and concord, and desired nothing more earnestly, than that the schisms among Protestants should be entirely healed, and that instead of these contentions among divines, both in their chairs and pulpits, we might be blessed with peace grateful to God and man: and on this account his name will still be remembered with honour among all good men.' The author of the Program says a little after (6), 'Equidem invidia & malignitas, ut sunt virtutis fata, non unum in eum jaculata fuit pugilum: sed & illa, quæ viventis gravis fuit, mortui famæ, credo, favebit, suamque vel imperitiam vel livorem tandem profitebitur. — Indeed the envious and malicious, as the common fate of virtue, did not spare him, but these which afflicted him while living will, I do not doubt, add to his fame now he is dead, and at length own their ignorance or spite. He doth not point out the causes of that malicious envy which persecuted Henichius: but I conjecture, that the peaceable disposition of that professor, furnished pretences to slander him.'

HENRY VI, emperor of Germany, son of Frederic Barbarossa, was crowned by Pope Celestin III [A], the fifteenth day of April, 1191. He marched with a potent army to take possession of Naples and Sicily, which fell to the empress Constantia his wife, after the death of the young William, king of Sicily (a). He found so many oppositions to his taking possession of it, that we may almost say, that he obtained those two kingdoms by conquest. He made himself so much feared, that the emperor Alexis, surnamed The Angel, could not obtain peace of him without paying tribute (b). If he had only done that, his valour might have been praised; but all the applause he may have merited, on that account, is swallowed up by the cruelty and treachery he shewed, in exterminating, under false pretences, all that remained of the race of the brave Normans who had conquered that part of Italy, which the empress, his wife, their heirs, gave him right to possess (c). It is said, that this prince, to punish him for it, made him swallow poison, whereof he died at Messina, in the year 1198, being thirty two years old (d). He left a son, who was emperor under the name of Frederic II. Constantia was so old, when she brought that son into the world, that, to avoid all suspicions of imposture, she was brought to bed publicly [B]. These precautions did not not hinder the world from saying, that this child was supposititious [C]. There are authors who maintain, that Constantia was neither a nun, nor very old when she married Henry VI [D].

[A] Was crowned by Pope Celestin III.] They have changed their aspect since, and there is not tell this circumstance of that coronation. As the emperor 'was at his feet, Celestin, who put the crown on his head, lifted up his foot, and kicked it down, to shew that he could give it and take it away. Baronius praises this action, but things, in my opinion, have changed their aspect since, and there is not one prince who would sincerely subscribe to the opinion of that cardinal (1). I cite the author who speaks thus. [B] To avoid all suspicions of imposture, she lay in publicly.] Here is a passage of Brantôme, which deserves

deserves to be read: 'Constantia, queen of Sicily, who had never stirred from the cloyster, leading all her youth and life in Vestal chastity, setting herself at liberty at the age of fifty, tho' not handsome, but quite decrepit, had a mind to taste the pleasures of the flesh; she married, and became with child at the age of fifty two, which she resolved to be delivered of publicly in the plains and meadows of Palermo, having caused a tent and pavilion to be erected there for that purpose, that no body might distrust the legitimacy of her fruit, which was one of the greatest miracles that has been seen since St Elizabeth. The history of Naples says, notwithstanding, that he was reputed supposititious: however, he proved a very great man: but most bastards are brave, as a great man once told me (2).

[C] These precautions did not hinder the world from saying, that this child was supposititious. Brantôme whom we have just quoted tells us this. But here is another author, who will point out the proofs of it better. 'It is certain, says he (3), that women fifty years old and upwards, have born children. We have an example of it in that renowned Nun Constantia, the mother of Frederic II, who, being taken from a cloyster, was the only heiress and queen of Sicily, being with child at the age of fifty two years compleat, to take away all suspicion, had a pavilion set up in a public place of a certain town in Sicily, and in the presence of the greatest ladies of that country, lay-in in public. Notwithstanding which many disputed that fact; amongst others the marquis of Ancona, named Marquardus, who offered to prove, that that child was not the issue of Henry and Constantia, and so was supposititious. As it is said by Pandolfo Collenuccio *. If it may be said, that the most exquisite precautions are useless against love, we may likewise say, that they are so against ambition.

Do whatever you please to convince the public that such or such a child-birth was not imaginary, but most real, they will always find answers ready for you; the expedient which cured St Thomas's incredulity, is the only one that can be proof against these cavils: unless I put my finger, &c. will they say to you, as that apostle did, I will not believe (4). Nay I know not but after feeling they would say, I have seen and felt how the child came out, but not how it came in. Was your husband capable of begetting it.

[D] Some authors . . . maintain that Constantia was neither a nun, nor very old, when she married Henry VI. It is the common opinion, that she was taken from a cloyster, and that she obtained a dispensation to be married to the emperor Henry VI, and that she conceived about the age of fifty five. But there are historians who deny this. Let us see the sequel of the passage of Camerarius, which I have cited (5). 'Possibly John Michael Brutus (6) took occasion from this story, flatly to deny, that Constantia was ever a nun or abbess, or that Pope Celestin dispensed with her marriage, so far as according to his calculation she must have been sixty years old. On the contrary, he alleges Hugo Falcandus the historian, who says she was then in the flower of her age, and married to Henry, in the reign of William, surnamed the Good, when Frederic Barbarossa was yet alive: but that the confusion of times was the cause of that mistake. I am of opinion, says he, that she was conveyed from the palace royal to an abbey of nuns, when the people mutinying, imprisoned king William, surnamed the Bad, and that no more convenient place could be found for her security, during these commotions. When these were appeased, that prince, who was entirely at liberty, and was neither veiled nor professed, lived among the nuns, till she married Henry.

HENRY II, king of France, succeeded Francis I, his father, the last of March 1547. One of the first things he did, was to despise the order his father gave him on his death-bed. I mean, that a few days after he came to the crown, he recalled the constable of Montmorency [A], whom Francis I. had banished for very good reasons (a). That disobedience cost him dear [B]. For it may be affirmed, that the most grievous events that were the stain of his reign, were owing to the constable. It was he that by his evil conduct lost the famous battle of St Quintin (b); after which he was the cause

(a) See the remark [B].

(b) The tenth of August, 1557.

[A] He recalled the constable of Montmorency. His father had seriously recommended to him Annebault for his chief minister, in whom he had found great experience, wisdom, and zeal, and no stain of avarice or ambition; but more especially advised him to beware, if he loved the good of his kingdom, of recalling the constable of Montmorency. . . . Nevertheless, although he had paid a most dutiful obedience to his father during his whole life, yet he paid no deference to his commands after his death. He took the administration of all affairs, from Annebault and from the cardinal de Tournon, to give it to Montmorency (1). We shall see, that this most dutiful obedience had its exceptions, which will not permit us to think that Mezger had reason to give it so good a character as he has done. 'The precaution of Francis, reached even to the forbidding most expressly the Dauphin, his eldest son, who was afterwards king Henry II, from having any communication with the constable. . . . But all that he could obtain of his son, was to dissemble, for seven years together, his friendship for the constable. And he did not even dissemble with so much artifice, but that the whole court knew, that no day passed without their receiving letters from one another. But Francis I. was at no pains to break off that correspondence, whether because the Dauphin, and the constable were equally successful in concealing it from him: or that having no other son than the Dauphin, he was unwilling to do oblige him (2). These are Mr Varillas's words, and they may be very justly criticized; for first, if the Dauphin had dissembled his friendship seven years together, he would not so often have pressed his father to re-call the constable; and yet Mr Varillas assures us, he did this (3). Secondly, how shall we reconcile this author's alternative, with what Mezger relates (4), that the king was much offended, that the Dauphin, in defiance of his orders, corresponded with the constable of Montmorency.

[B] That disobedience cost him dear. Mr Varillas will furnish me with a commentary upon this text! I will not content myself with citing him for Henry the second's reign, but shall take his words something higher; 'the disgraces of constable Montmorency, says he (5), of admiral Chabot, and of chancellor Poyet, are related in the ninth book in such a manner as not to surprise those, who have read in Bodin's republic, that Francis I. grew worse humoured as he advanced in years; that he had been convinced, by his own experience, that he could not have made choice of two men less fit for the intrigues of the cabinet, than Montmorency and Chabot; and that tho' he could not charge Poyet with the same defect, yet this chancellor had another as great, which was to carry things too far; that this had been the source of all the misfortunes which had happened to his majesty, and that if he continued the same ministry, he was not to expect a more favourable success. The event proved, that the three ministers, who succeeded to the places of the disgraced, were more capable of filling them than they: and that if Henry II had not restored the constable Montmorency, he had not been obliged to give up, in order to recover him, 198 towns, or strong places, and almost as much extent of ground, as one third of France.'

cause of a treaty of Peace (c), much more scandalous to the French monarchy [C], than the loss of that battle. Possibly he would not have been able to have made Henry II consent to that disadvantageous peace, had it not been for a spirit of persecution, which had got the mastery of this prince [D]. The constable deserves also much blame,

(8) This brings to my mind the words of Terentius Pallus: Pudet numerate inter hæc tempora quam ista gererentur, quæ sæpe Gallienus malo generis humani quasi per jocum dixerit. Nam quom ei amentum esset, Ægyptum deservisset, dixisset ferretur, Quid? sine livo Ægyptio esse non possimus? Quom autem vallatam Aulam & elementorum concursionibus & Seytharum incurtionibus compertisset, Quid, inquit, sine apertis esse non possumus? Perdit Gallia arripisse ac dixisset perhibetur, Non sine atrocibus sagis tuta Respici? Sic denique de omnibus partibus mundi, quom eas amitteret, quasi detrimentum vilius ministeriorum videtur afflicti, joculariter Terentius Pallus in Gallienis, dicit, cap. vi, pag. m. 200.

[C] The constable was the cause of a treaty of peace much more scandalous to the French monarchy. Mr Mezerai, though, of all the historians of France, he is the highest favourer of the subjects against the court, yet he blames the joy that the people expressed for that peace. 'The people, says he (6), who always desire peace at any rate, greatly rejoiced at this . . . But the party of the Guises, the wise politicians, and all the nobility, highly condemned it, as a manifest cheat, which made France lose 198 strong places, only for three that were restored, which were Ham, Catelet, and St Quintin.' He speaks with greater force in his great history (7). For in relating the articles of that peace, he inserts after these words, that the more strongly to unite the hearts of the princes, this parenthesis (but rather to cover, with some honourable pretence, the shame and loss that France received by this unfortunate treaty); and towards the end of the same page he says as follows. 'These articles being brought to the king, and communicated by his majesty to the princes and grandees of his kingdom, there were few but judged them entirely disadvantageous, and shameful to France: all France indeed universally condemned them by their murmurs. Brisac having advice of it, though the articles had been disguised to him, dispatched Boyvin-Villars to court, he that has left us the memoirs of the war of Piedmont, with instructions to lay before the king his most humble remonstrances, and to dissuade him from so dishonourable a peace. Concluding, that if his majesty was resolved to give up what he possessed in Italy, which was worth the best province of his kingdom, and could bring him in, all expences defrayed, a revenue of 300000 crowns into his treasury, he only begged for all the recompence of his good services, that he would please to banish him, together with all the forces that were beyond the Alps, as rebels, and that he knew how to preserve the places which he held, at the expence of the Milanese, and the republic of Genoa, or at least would die gloriously, in a country, where all the forces of Europe had not been able to force him to lose an inch of ground, in the ten years time that he had the defence of it . . . The king expressed an approbation of his zeal, but having his heart wholly set upon peace, he answered, that he should make it upon the conditions proposed to him, he should still retain enough to make himself feared by his enemies (8). Whereupon Guise, moved either by his own interest, or by a sense of honour and conscience, boldly interrupting him, said, Sir, your majesty will pardon me, if I say, that this is not the right way to do it, and that though you should fight for twenty five years to come, as contrary a fortune as that of the last year, you would not lose in all that time, what they would have you give up in one day. It did not cost the late king, when he was vanquished and a prisoner, but, &c.' I omit all the reasons of the duke of Guise, but not what follows them in the historian; 'he said many other things with so much vehemence, as made the king often change his colour, but not his resolution; the dice were cast, and whoever was the cause of it, either his favourites, or his natural temper, his courage was so cast down, that he could no longer bear the war; he therefore ratified the treaty, and the peace was published the tenth of April . . . All the French authors, who have written of that time, have called it the unfortunate and cursed peace. Brisac hearing that it was made, cried out often, ab miserable France, what evils . . . He remained governor of the five towns and eight castles which the king retained, with 8000 foot and 450 horse, and restored the other places, but he first demolished the greatest part of them, and sold the ammunition according to the king's command; not without much difficulty of receiving the money, and orders that were necessary from court, because the constable, favouring the duke of Savoy, did all that he could to put the places entire into his hands, and even those which the king had reserved to himself (9). We shall see below (10), that the court of France was so weak under Charles IX and Henry III, as to suffer itself to be persuaded to evacuate that little it had reserved; and there is no doubt but that in Charles IX's time, the constable had a great share in that mismanagement. When we consider the immense wealth he heaped together, we cannot say of him, as of many others; that in managing his master's affairs well, he managed his own very well; but we must say, that in managing his own affairs very well, he managed those of his master very ill. Did not he, under Charles IX, enter into a league with the Guises? was not he the cause of that prodigious power they rose to, that was so fatal to the monarchy, and had like to have given to France a fourth race of kings? when Francis I. disgraced the constable, he charged him with ignorance in the two principal parts of his employment, which was war and policy (11). See the character which the partisans of the Guises give of him in Mezerai (12).

Some critics will say perhaps, that Mr Mezerai does too much extenuate the advantages granted to Henry II by the treaty of Cateau. Why does he mention only the three towns that were restored to France? Why doth he suppress the conquest of Calais, Metz, Toul, and Verdun? but that criticism would be a very bad one; for the treaty of Cateau did not grant these four places to Henry II. It left the empire at full liberty to redemand the restitution of the three last; and it solemnly engaged France to restore Calais to England at the end of eight years. This is a thing which an anonymous historian has not observed who speaks thus (13). 'The king of France restored to the king of Spain, all that he had conquered of him on both sides the Alps. Item, to the prince of Piedmont, Bresse, Savoy, and Piedmont, except four towns: to the Genoese, the isle of Corsica; Siena, to the duke of Florence; and retained nothing but Calais, without gaining a foot of any other land in that long and pernicious war, which had laid waste so many provinces, plundered, burnt, ruined so many cities, towns, villages, castles, and had occasioned the death of so many princes, lords, gentlemen, captains, soldiers, citizens, and peasants, caused the rapes and violations of so many women and maids; in a word, that had turned all Europe topsy-turvy. The king gave up above 200 (others say almost twice that number) places, for the conquest whereof a sea of his subjects blood had been spilt, the treasures of the kingdom exhausted, his own demesns mortgaged, and himself indebted on all sides.' This historian supposes, that Henry II saw his dominions enlarged at least by the cession of Calais, but that is a falsehood: all the rest of his discourse is solid. And as it is certain, that one might have represented to the king of Spain, what Hannibal represented to the Roman general (14), what thunderbolts does that discourse level at the head of Henry II? it might have been said to the king of Spain, that the countries he had stripped France of by this treaty of peace, were not worth the immense sums which that war had cost him, nor so many soldiers and officers as he had lost. If this was capable of lessening the joy which an advantageous peace made him feel, how must it break the heart of the monarch to whom it was disadvantageous? to return from a long war with empty hands, is a disgrace, said Homer (15). He would have used much stronger expressions in such a case as this.

[D] The spirit of persecution . . . got the mastery of this prince. Henry II was extremely severe against the Protestants, he put them to death without mercy, and yet they increased much under his reign. If they were not concerned for the extreme consternation which seized the court of France, and the city of Paris, after the battle of St Quintin, it was but what nature inspired them; every sect which is ill used, and which can hope for no relaxation, unless the court finds itself embarrassed, will rejoice at the progress of an enemy, and be glad to see their persecutors so taken up with affairs abroad, as not to know blame, for not having given better advice to his master, with relation to the duchess of Valentinois, who, at an age ill suited to that of Henry II, held him in her chains, and made a very unjust use of his slavery. Instead of fortifying this prince against the snares of that woman, the constable intrigued for her, and devoted himself to her faction (d). It is pity the reign of Henry II had these stains in it, for it was otherwise remarkable for glorious actions, and for very noble successes, which cruelly mortified Charles V. We cannot deny Henry II the glory of being brave, and it is said that queen Elizabeth of England admired him upon that account [E]. But after all, it will be an eternal testimony of his weakness, and of the dominion which his favourites had over him, that, contrary to the advice of the wisest heads of his kingdom, he signed the treaty of peace of Cateau in Cambresis. A peace, not less scandalous to France than that which the emperor Jovian made with the king of Persia, so much decried by all antiquity (e). A peace, which by one stroke of a pen, lost in one moment all the labours and conquests of many years, and an extent of country, equalling one third of the kingdom (f). No body profited so much by that disgrace of France, as the duke of Savoy; for, besides being restored to his dominions, he married the sister of Henry II, a princess of great merit [F], and who knew how to bubble the court of France know which way to turn themselves. Of all the Christian sects, there is none more disposed to this sort of conduct, than those of the Romish communion. And therefore we need not wonder, though what Mr Maimbourg affirms (16) should be true, namely, that the Protestants 'took advantage of the public affliction after the battle of St Quintin . . . and ventured to hold their meetings in open day, in the most frequented streets of Paris, and even to appear in public, and assemble openly in great bodies, in the Pre-aux-Clercs, there to sing aloud Clement Marot's Psalms.' This ought to teach princes, that their persecuting edicts expose them to great inconveniences. This is the cause why their bonfires afflict one part of their subjects, and why the successes of their enemies afford them comfort. If they complain they have bad subjects, it ought to be answered, it is you who make them such (17); for to pretend, that a persecuted party will afflict themselves for the public calamities, which are the source of their repose, and the foundation of a very plausible hope of prosperity, is to pretend, that the primitive ages of Christianity should return again; now those times will not come twice. It is to expect, that men should be like those of the Millennium if it ever comes. But let us return to Henry II. When he saw that the Protestants 'thought to take advantage of the loss which he had sustained in the battle of St Quintin, he published a new edict, forbidding all the judges to moderate the punishment of death, and confiscation of goods, with regard to all those, who should be found not only guilty of Heresy, but convicted of having brought into France books, printed at Geneva, against the doctrine of the Catholic church. Thus they proceeded against the Calvinists more rigorously than before (18). But as that hindered them not from multiplying, nor even from engaging persons of the first quality in their party, the king saw, that, in order to extirpate them, he must make peace with the house of Austria; and this doubtless was one of the great motives which made him shut his eyes upon the good condition in which he had settled his affairs (19). He had stopped the progress of his enemies, and had even taken some very strong places from them. But that signified nothing, he chose rather to grant them all they had a mind to, than not to have his hands at liberty to exterminate the Protestants of his kingdom. Thus we have seen the same court, let slip the most favourable occasions of aggrandizing itself in the year 1684, in order to apply itself solely to the suppression of the Edict of Nantes. They who suffer themselves to be possessed with this spirit, must renounce the title of conquerors. If Henry II had long survived this ignominious peace, which he accepted, we should have seen him entirely taken up with tournaments and persecutions, but he died a little after it was signed. Mr Maimbourg is an exceptionable witness, as to the joy he says the Heretics conceived upon it; his words are these (20). 'Thus he was lamented with most unfeigned tears, and infinitely regretted by all his subjects, except the Protestants alone, who thinking themselves delivered by his death, from what they called the persecution of the church, expressed in a most unworthy manner by their words and actions, and scandalous writings, the excessive joy which it gave them.'

VOL. III.

We may with regard to Henry II make the same observation which we made concerning Francis I (21). He attacked the party weakly on one side, while he made it stronger on the other. He put to death some inconsiderable private persons in France, and at the same time entered into alliance with the Protestants of Germany against Charles V, &c. (22). And was fond of the title of protector of the German liberty, which was to say at that time, protector of the Protestants (23). The other Catholic princes observed the same conduct (24). I think the following words of Mr le Laboureur are worthy of notice: 'To pluck the tares from amongst the wheat (says he) (25). GOD will only chuse princes who are innocent, and of a good life, and will not employ politic hands, as were those of the counsellors of all the Catholic crowns of that time, who only weeded their own fields to cast the darnel into those of their neighbours, and who persecuted Heresy only as a faction against authority.' Charles V, and the kings of Spain his successors, have favoured, on many occasions, the Protestants of Germany and France. See the proof of this in the first Tome of the Apology for the Catholics (26), composed by Mr Arnauld. The Spanish ambassador solicited success in England for the duke of Rohan. What Grotius writes concerning this is remarkable. 'Validus est rumor, Gonthomerum, & qui in aula Anglica Hispanice sunt factionis, aperte profiteri, non debere à Rege Britanniarum deserti religionis consortes in Gallia, ne si quando vetera jura repetere ipsi sit animus, desint, qui partes Anglicas sequantur (27). — It is confidently reported, that Gundamor, and those of the Spanish faction in the court of England, openly affirm, that the king of Great Britain ought not to desert those of his own religion in France; lest he might want their assistance, if ever he should think of asserting his ancient pretensions to that crown.' See in the Political Testament of the marquis de Louvois (28), some reflexions upon the violences exercised in Hungary against the Protestants, by order of the same court, which a little after rendered such great services to the Protestants of Great Britain and Holland, whom Lewis XIV and James II were resolved to oppress, as was reported.

[E] Queen Elizabeth of England admired him for his bravery. Brantôme will instruct us about this matter: 'I have heard, says he (29), the present queen of England say, that he was the king and the prince whom she most desired to see, for the great character she had heard of him, and the great renown which he every where had obtained. . . . Being at table, discoursing familiarly with those lords, she said these words, (after having bestowed great praises on the king) he was a prince that I most desired to see of any, and I had already sent him word that I would quickly see him, and for that purpose I had given order to have my galleys splendidly fitted out (these were her words), that I might go over to France on purpose to see him.' See the same story in the Memoirs of the Dames Galantes, where it is expressly observed, that the queen desired to see Henry II, because he was brave, valiant, generous, and very martial (30).

[F] The duke of Savoy married the sister of Henry II, a princess of great merit. Her name was Margaret, as was her aunt's the queen of Navarre, and she was like her,

France very advantageously for her husband [G]. She was not young when she married; for which reason the murmurs against the peace reached even to her [H]. It is without reason that a modern author has attempted to justify the conduct of Henry III [I], who

her, much addicted to study, and a patroness of the learned. She was suspected to have imbibed the new opinions, and to have communicated something of them to Catherine de Medicis (31). See her elogy in Brantôme (32), and in Mr. le Laboureur. The latter tells us a passage which deserves to be known. 'Margaret of France, says he (33), was married at forty six years of age (34), and as she seemed to be too old to bear children, it was believed that the noise of her great belly was a stratagem, to oblige the king to restore her more willingly the places he detained. It was on this account that the Sieur Huraut de Bois-Taillé, ambassador at Venice, wrote a letter of the twenty seventh of July 1561, to Bernardin Bochetel, bishop of Rennes, the French ambassador in Germany, wherein he had these words. It is said that the duchess of Savoy is big with child, but I believe, that is done ad aliquid. That report was verified by the birth of Charles Emanuel, grandfather to the present duke of Savoy (35).'

[G] Who knew how to bubble the court of France, very advantageously for her husband [The treaty of Cateau imported that in three years the rights which the king pretended to upon the territories of the duke of Savoy, should be examined and regulated by commissioners on both sides (36).] King Francis II, and the duke had named deputies for that purpose in the year 1560. The king's deputies made six very considerable demands; but instead of obtaining any thing, France abandoned all the towns he had kept. She ordered by Letters Patents the eighth of August 1561, 'that there should be restored to the duke, Turin, Chivas, Quiers, and Ville Neuve d'Ast, excepting the ammunition and artillery, in exchange for Pignerol, Savilian, and Perouse, with their dependencies. Imbert de la Platiere Bourdillon, the king's lieutenant beyond the Alps, formed many difficulties, and sent great remonstrances to the council, to hinder the execution of that order; and would not obey it till after three commands, and upon the most solemn discharges imaginable.' The duchess plaid her part very well in that negotiation; 'her prudence was praised for having obtained by her address the places that still remained undelivered, and which the king's commissioners could not guard against her gentle way of raising an innocent revolt in their hearts, and forcing the most impenetrable places.' It is Mr. le Laboureur who says this (37). Brantôme tells this whole affair at length; the diverse sentiments of the ministers, the oppositions formed by Bourdillon, and the manner in which he suffered himself to be wrought upon. It cost the duke and duchess of Savoy many presents (38). There remained still three places in Piedmont in the French hands, viz. Pignerol, Savilian, and Perouse. The duchess seconded her husband wonderfully to regain them, when Henry III passed by Turin in his return from Poland. I shall make use of the words of Mr. Varillas. 'The duke and duchess of Savoy, who proposed to do what Spain had not been able to accomplish, when in the most flourishing condition, that is, to send back the French beyond the Alps, made use of an artifice wholly new, which was that of diversions, and feasts succeeding one another so fast that there was scarce time left for sleeping. Some relations that come from very good hands, speak of a magnificent collation which cost 100000 crowns; the duke and duchess were at the expence of it, and to reimburse themselves they pressed Henry III to restore to them Pignerol, Savilian, and Perouse (39). Henry promised to gratify their requests, and kept his word: for holding a council at Lyons upon that affair, the evacuation of these three places was there concluded on; notwithstanding the strong reasons alleged against it by the person who commanded there. It was the duke of Nevers (§ a). 'He had the liberty of saying what he pleased, and the satisfaction that the memorial which he presented to second his speech, though very long, was read in the presence of Henry III; but the restitution of these three places was nevertheless resolved on, and his majesty gave him orders with his own mouth to evacuate them. He should have stopped there, since all the world did him the justice to believe he had satisfied his conscience and his honour; but he had recourse to other precautions, which drew upon him the aversion of the court, and hindered him a long time from being re-admitted into the council of state. He obstinately solicited, that the order he had received from the king's mouth should be likewise written with the king's own hand; that the queen-mother, the princes of the blood, and the officers of the crown should sign it, and that it should be registered in the parliament together with the writing, which he had drawn up, desiring to be dispensed with from complying with it, and that the principal cities of the kingdom should insert it in their archives. All this was almost granted him, but not without reproaching him that he affected to signalize himself at his master's cost, and that he ought to imitate the marshal Bristac, who was content in a like case to redouble his most humble remonstrances and to desire that they would send him a successor (40).'

[H] The murmurs against the peace reached even to her. Brantôme, who lived at that time, tells us very freely some circumstances of these murmurs. 'This marriage . . . cost France dear, as being obliged to return in one hour all that had been conquered and preserved in Piedmont and Savoy for the space of thirty years, so much king Henry desired a peace and loved his sister, that he would spare nothing in the world to place her well, when yet the greatest part of France and Piedmont murmured at it, and said it was a little too much. Others thought it very strange, and others very incredible, until they had seen it with their own eyes; and even strangers laughed at us for it; and they who loved France and its interest, wept and lamented it, especially those of Piedmont, who did not desire to return to their first master. Can the dukes of Savoy justify themselves masters and lords of Piedmont, since the kings of France were so formerly, and are still lawful lords, titulars, and masters of it, as justly belonging to them. As for the soldiers who had been a long time accustomed to the garrisons, and to the ease and delicate sustenance of that country, we need not ask what they said, how they cried out against it, and lamented, and what fine speeches they made upon that occasion; not only the Gascons, but others. Hey-day, said they, must so many fine and large pieces of ground be given up for one little piece of flesh about a woman: others cried she had done mighty well to keep her virginity for forty five years (41), to lose it at last for the ruin of France. If they had been as disorderly, seditious, and mutinous, at that time, as we have seen them since in our civil wars, we may be assured every one of them would have taken his share and have seized those places, out of which they could not easily have been driven (42). Is it not strange that Mr. le Laboureur, who has had not long before read these words, should come and tell us notwithstanding, that only a few politicians found fault with her being married at so dear a rate, and that ALL OTHERS were glad that she carried with her a recompence suitable to her merit, and that she had got for her dowry, the territories which had been taken from her husband (43). This is the language of a panegyrist: such a man without any authority, takes upon him notwithstanding, in the name of the public, to make all the steps necessary to a panegyric, and is not at all concerned that the fact is related by authors of the greatest credit. Mezerai, who wrote a history, not a panegyric, agrees much better with the testimony of Brantôme, than with le Laboureur (44).'

I cannot read these words, and even strangers laughed at us for it (45), without crying out, what a happy time was this for the writers of the Low-Countries, and all others, who had no good will to France? What insults had they not a fair opportunity to make upon it? What gasconades might they not have published? For I suppose they were within a little of the humour of the present time.

paid so dear for the good reception which that princess gave him. The peace of Cateau is not the only monument of the too great weakness of Henry II. The impunity of his favourites after the prodigious wealth they had got by so unjust means [K], is another monument of it. He died of a wound he received in a tournament (g). A strange adventure, and still more extraordinary than fatal, for I do not believe there ever was a monarch who lost his life on such an occasion. It would have been infinitely more glorious for him to have lost his life in a battle, than in these mock-fights, or combats of peace; where besides, he behaved himself unsuitably to his dignity, and in a way more becoming a young cavalier, than the royal majesty [L]. Many reflexions were made upon this sad destiny [M].

ture (46) was censured for having said by way of railery, that he valued a good soup more than the panegyric of Pliny, or the longest oration of Isocrates. Monsieur de Girac, adds he, thinks Monsieur de Voiture, is as great a fool as that profane person, who sold his birth-right for a mess of pottage, or that prince of ours, who gave Pignerol for a good meal. To what length doth not one go when carried away by the heat of a dispute? The smallest faults which escape an adversary are converted into crimes. Girac, who with regard to another man, would probably have been content to have said, that the word fool was too strong to be employed to express the fault of a prince, accuseth Coltar, his enemy, as guilty of treason. Consider well all his words (47). 'He has dared, says he, by an attempt, which deserves the severest punishments, to dart his venom and malice against the sacred person of our kings. Does not he compare the liberality of Henry III, to the folly of Esau, who parted with his birth right for a mess of pottage? Does he not call that prince a fool for having restored Pignerol to the duke of Savoy, who had the honour to be his uncle, and from whom he expected great succours in the pressing necessity of his affairs? Was ever Lewis XII taken for a fool, who made a present of the principality of Bearne to the king of Navarre, and who dismembered his kingdoms of a part of that importance? Has any body accused the people of Rome of folly, though they frequently gave intire provinces and kingdoms to kings their allies? and if Alexander, as Plutarch says, willingly parted with the isle of Cyprus, as a price for some verses composed in his praise, can a king of France be looked upon as a mad man amongst any that have the least share of common sense, for having restored a place to his near relation, who had received him in his dominions with great cost and magnificence?' A little after he asks whether Mr Coltar is not afraid of being punished under the reign of a prince so nearly related to Henry, who lived not so very long ago? And he cites Guicciardin and Paul Jovius for the extreme veneration the French have for their monarch. He returns often to the same accusation (48); this must be attributed to the symptoms of a sort of fever, which seizes writers when they are upon replies and rejoinders.

Though he had named all the sovereigns that gave up cities, or provinces, or even kingdoms from the beginning of the world, he would never have persuaded men of sense, men versed in politics, that any one ever made such presents in circumstances like those of Henry III, without being guilty of a folly. Henry III gave up Pignerol in favour of a prince, who owed his glorious re-establishment to the Spaniards, who in his heart was a violent Spaniard (49), that is, was always ready to favour the most formidable enemy France then had. It was to such a duke of Savoy that a place was delivered which opened a way into the kingdom to the enemy, and which kept the same duke in awe, and hindered him from leaguings with Spain. But some will say, that duke had so much carested Henry III, and been at such vast expences to regale him at Turin, was it not reasonable to regard him as a good and constant friend? No, that was not reasonable: it is only the ignorant who can rely upon the constancy of friendship among sovereigns. To see the presents they make and the letters they write in time of peace to one another, one would swear they are most hearty friends, and would continue so all their life: but it is often true that they are negotiating at the same time a treaty in order to a rupture, and have no design of serving one another any farther than till a proper occasion shall present itself of beginning hostilities to advantage. This was never so true, as when Henry III was so infinitely carested at the court of Savoy.

The duke was entirely disposed to take advantage of the confusions he saw in France, and to make use of the assistance of the Spaniards to that purpose. And he left a son who inherited the same passion and not only seized the marquise of Saluces, but also formed designs for the dismembering of France, and totally ruining the monarchy (50). Can we then sufficiently blame this blunder of Henry III? See the remark [F] of his article.

[K] His favourites acquired great riches by unjust means. Left I should be accused of aggravating things, I will make use of Mezerai's words. 'The expences the disposers of his favour and affairs put him to, a good part whereof they converted to their own advantage, were so excessive, that he oppressed the kingdom with great imposts, and ran above forty millions of livres in debt. Besides this, they ruined abundance of families by their damnable avarice. The invention of farmings and monopolies being not then so much in use, they had another method, which was no less pernicious, namely, to accuse those who were richest under the pretence of Heresy, and other crimes, and to find, or to make, delinquents that they might have their spoils, or force them to purchase their pardon by their intercession (51).' This historian had just been saying that Henry II was not accused of any other fault, than of being too easy and more capable of being governed than governing himself. This is one of the greatest faults of a king, because generally they who govern him, when he is in that case, do more mischief than if he governed them.

[L] He behaved himself unsuitably to his dignity, and in a way more becoming a young cavalier, than the royal majesty. This was the judgment of the wife, as we learn from an author of that time (52). 'A tournament was appointed in St Anthony's street before the Tournelles, with all the magnificence and pomp imaginable, for as much as the king was one of the combatants, followed by the dukes of Ferrara, Guise, and Nemours, which a great many people of good sense thought strange; saying, the majesty of a king ought to be judge of the combat, and not enter the lists. Even in the old romances, kings, on such occasions, never attempted acts of common knights, but disguised themselves, if they had a mind to enter the lists, or abstained wholly from it; yet such was the misfortune of the king, that he would have the first honour of the jousts. And I believe the desire he expressed for it was to shew strangers how dextrous he was at arms, and skilled in the management of a horse. So that those that were near him, durst not dissuade him from that enterprise. A thing which has since opened a dismal scene to France.'

[M] Many reflexions were made upon this sad destiny. I will not alledge the testimony of Protestant writers; it is visible, that of Stephen Pasquier will have greater force (53). 'You see how our good king Henry died. And as the common people naturally fix their eyes upon the actions of their king, so that death did not happen without the commentaries and interpretations of some people. For to tell you at large how things happened in France; as soon as the peace was concluded, the cardinal of Lorraine, who had been one of the principal mediators of it, declared, in full parliament, that it had been the king's opinion that it should be made on any terms, that he might be more at liberty from thence forward to exterminate and banish the Heresy of Calvin. And in fact on the tenth day of June, he came actually in person into parliament to take the opinion of every councillor concerning the punishment of Heretics. Whereupon many gave it with great liberty; some being of opinion that he should suspend the punishment till the decision

He never spoke after he was wounded [N]; so that all the discourses which are ascribed to him, are only stories forged at pleasure. The sincerity wherewith the French historians have confessed the faults of this monarch, and the ignominy he brought upon the nation by preferring the counsels of the constable before the remonstrances of the duke of Guise [O], is scarce to be seen in other historians. The Protestants imagined, that they should be gainers by his death, but they experienced still greater severities under Francis II, and humanly speaking they had been intirely ruined in France, if he had lived two years longer [P]. They are accused of having expressed their joy in too insulting a manner upon the tragical end of Henry [Q]; but nothing can be more modest than Theodore Beza on that subject (b). I forgot to observe, that this prince, when he was only dauphin, lived in a misunderstanding with his brother, decision of a general council, which they said was necessary. Whereupon the king was moved with so great and just a passion, that he commanded immediately Montgommery to seize some of the company, who had given their opinion more freely than he would have them. They were forthwith carried prisoners to the Bastille. For which reason, said these new commentators, this disaster befel the king, by God's just judgment, as a vengeance upon him for these unjust imprisonments. That opinions ought to be free, and not founded by a king, in order, after hearing them, to commit the counsellors to a close prison. That God had chastised him by the hand of that minister, who had assisted him in making those imprisonments. Likewise that, as on the tenth of June, he had done that dishonour to the court of parliament, so on the tenth of July following, day for day, he lost his life. Thus some of the people discoursed, according to their particular passions, concerning this death; being ignorant, at the same time, that the mysteries of God are wholly concealed from us, and such as, by reason of our weakness, we often refer them to our opinions than to truth. Anne du Bourg was one of those whom the king shut up in the Bastille, and against whom he was most enraged, for amongst other discourses, he said he would see him burnt with both his eyes (54). Father Paul observes, that the queen-mother was horribly provoked at the Lutherans publishing in their manifesto, that the wound of the king her husband in the eye was a punishment of God for his threats against Anne du Bourg, when he said to him, that he would see him burnt (55).

all they had a mind to. And he so well knew the weak side of his master, that he easily persuaded him to consent to that treaty. In vain the duke of Guise employed a thousand demonstrative reasons (59), to make him reject a peace which sacrificed to the Spaniards, the glory of the French name, and more places in one day than they had been able to conquer in an age, the king was deaf to all that. We must mention here an observation of Brantôme (60); he pretends that Henry II, tired and disgusted with the influence of the Guises, resolved to send them home; for which end he was obliged to regain his constable, and to terminate the war; he wrote to him therefore, and to the marshal de St André (61), to negotiate a peace, which they did to our disadvantage. Let us not forget another artifice; these two prisoners and the dukes of Valentinois enriched themselves with the spoils of the Heretics, and who can doubt but that, to obtain a peace, they obliged the king to accept of any conditions, that they might more easily prosecute the business of the Inquisition? it is certain (62) that the cabals of that dukes, seconded by the constable, drew the king into that precipice.

[P] The Protestants had been intirely ruined in France, if Francis II had lived two years longer.] It is the opinion of Theodore Beza; for, having drawn out all the reasons that promised them a more prosperous time after Henry's death, he adds (63): 'But God had otherwise ordered it, being willing to have the honour that belongs to him, of re-establishing his church by his own arm and might alone, which is so much the more wonderful, as the resistance of the greatest men had been most furious against it. It was therefore in the reign of Francis II, successor to Henry, that the rage of Satan overflowed beyond all bounds; so that it might be said of this reign, which lasted but seventeen months, what Jesus Christ says in St Matthew, viz. that unless those days had been shortened, no man could be saved: but for the elects sake they were shortened.' The particulars of the measures that were taken to ruin that party entirely, are to be seen in a few pages of Maimbourg (64). Take notice of the words which he sets at the head of this detail (65).

[Q] They are accused of having expressed their joy in too insulting a manner upon the tragical end of Henry.] I have already cited (66), Maimbourg upon this, and here are the words of Mezerai (67). 'As he was a prince of great goodness, he was lamented by all his people, except the new sectaries, who believed his death would be their liberty and advancement. They were so over-joyed at it, that they made songs and thanksgivings to God, or rather blasphemies, daring to say, that the Almighty had smitten him under the walls of the Bastille, where he kept the innocent in prison. It must not be thought strange that, in a great number of people, there are some that are indiscreet; but the historian of the Reformed churches deserves to be very much praised for observing that moderation which the following words express. 'There remained nothing, in all probability, but a most horrible spectacle of extreme desolation, when the Lord prevented it. For king Henry, in the midst of his peaceful triumphs, joined with a marriage . . . tilting in the lists . . . was struck with a counter-blow of a lance . . . and died the tenth of July following. Strange things were observed in the unexpected death of that prince, who in his own nature was gracious and kind, but neither saw nor heard but with the eyes and ears of those, who possessed and governed him at their pleasure (68).

brother, the duke of Orleans, that cost France dear [R], and had been more fatal; if the duke had not died. Who knows but the duke of Orleans might have disputed the succession with him [S]. The ladies had the boldness to hand horoscopes about, which could not but foment the jealousy of these two brothers. They had shewn those pretended astrological predictions to Francis I. Castellan confuted them [T], and the event confuted them still more effectually. Several authors say, that a famous astrologer foretold that Henry II should be killed in a duel [U]. The different accounts that are given of [R] He lived in a misunderstanding with the duke of Orleans, his brother, which cost France dear.] The chief of the Dauphin's faction was Diana of Poitiers, who was his mistress. Which was the reason the dukes of Etampes sided with the duke of Orleans. I have spoke elsewhere (69) of the prejudice the intrigues of that duchess did to the affairs of Francis I.

[S] Who knows whether the duke of Orleans might not have disputed the succession.] Tavares, who was in his service, and who had a boundless passion for aggrandizing himself, hoped much from the ambition of this prince, who thought of making himself master during the life of the Dauphin, his elder brother. The emperor Charles V flattered him very much with hopes, which had much exalted his courage; wherefore being at the point of death at Farenmonstier, where he had rashly defied death in an infected house, which he chose on purpose, Tavares, his confident, coming to tell him the news of the exploit he had performed against the garrison of Calais, whereof he had killed 800, and taken 400 prisoners he said to him these words; my friend, I am dead, all our measures are broken; my great sorrow is that I cannot recompense your merit (70).

[T] The ladies had shewn Francis I, these astrological predictions, Castellan refused them. About two years before the death of that prince, some ladies, who had a great share in his friendship, told him that the stars promised the duke of Orleans great conquests, and prognosticated that the Dauphin would perform nothing worthy of the quality of a king of France. They talked in this manner because they knew the particular affection of Francis I. for the duke, and they hoped to enrich themselves by the interest of that young prince. They praised him, they cried him up to the skies, and decried the Dauphin as having a dull and eavy genius, and who had the most unfortunate nativity in the world (71). Castellan could not bear either their flatteries or slanders: but turning to these ladies with a stern look, he told them that astrology was a difficult thing to understand, and that it was still more difficult to adjust it to human events; he added, that the vanity and impudence of astrologers rendered them unworthy of credit: that he had formerly studied those things under Turreau (72), and made as much progress in them as another; that for a sort of amusement, and for the satisfaction of the curious, he had erected the schemes of the Dauphin and the duke of Orleans with all possible exactness; and that according to the rules of the astrological art, he had found that the duke was to have a good, great, and warlike soul; that he was to be supported with the forces and friendship of the great, and should arrive at a very considerable power (73); that the Dauphin should not be inferior to him either with respect to military virtue, or those other qualities that are worthy of a prince; and that he should enjoy a happy reign, and be a most successful conqueror of his enemies (74). But that all these ways of predicting futurities, being vain and dubious, the surest way to guess at the fortunes of these two princes, was to ground our conjectures upon their manners and genius.

The king heard this discourse very favourably; the flatterers of both sexes were enraged at him. The Dauphin having heard what Castellan had said, was extremely pleased with it, not because he had been praised, but because his innocence had been declared before Francis I, to whom he afraid least they should render him odious (75), apud quem ne in suspicionem aut odium traheretur metuebat (76). Oh curbed pests of a court! who can sufficiently detest you? what malice is it to cherish by so many artifices the jealousy of two brothers! we must not forget that the astrology of Castellan proved false with respect to the duke of Orleans. He died a little while after; and yet it had promised him a very great power, which Castellan considered as a thing to come; and he could not consider it otherwise at that time; for this prince died nineteen months or thereabouts before his father, and was not yet twenty four years old.

[U] Many authors say, that a famous astrologer foretold that Henry II should be killed in a duel.] See what Brantôme says of it (77). I have heard, and I have it from good hands, that some years before he died, (some say some days) there was an astrologer who calculated his nativity and presented it to him, in which he found, that he was to die in a duel and single combat. The constable was present, to whom the king said, see, friend, what death is foretold me; ah, Sir, answered the constable, will you believe these rascals, who are only liars and braggadoos? I throw it into the fire. Why so, friend, replied the king? they sometimes speak truth; I do not care whether I die that death or another, nay, I should rather chuse it and to die by the hand of any man whatever, provided he was brave and valiant, and I should purchase glory by it; and, without minding what the constable said to him, he gave that prophecy to be kept by Monsieur de l'Aupespine, ordering him to keep it till he asked him for it. . . . (78) Now the king was no sooner wounded, drest, and carried to his chamber, but the constable remembering that prophecy, called Monsieur de l'Aupespine, and ordered him to go and fetch it, which he did, and as soon as he had seen and read it, the tears came in his eyes; ah! says he, see here is the combat and the duel he was to die in, it is done, he is a dead man; it was not possible for a diviner to speak better and clearer than this, tho' by their natural temper, or by the inspiration of their familiar spirit, they are always ambiguous, and doubtful, and therefore always speak ambiguously, but here he spoke very clearly. Cursed be the astrologer who prophesied so truly and so fatally.

Thuanus does not, like Brantôme, omit the name of this diviner: he calls him Luke Gauric, and adds, that this scheme was erected at the request of Catherine de Medicis, and that it was laughed at till the king received his wound. Thuanus mentions this prediction as a certain matter of fact (79). But they who cite Luke Gauricus's own words, taken from the horoscope of Henry II, deserve more credit. Now it is certain by these words, that the astrologer promised a long life to this monarch, and never threatened him with a fatal duel. Gassendus has not failed to cite this great example, and to add that Cardan was no less mistaken in the horoscope of this prince than Gauricus (80). Constat ex Historiis Henricum II, Gallie nostrae Regem obiisse anno ætatis quadragesimo completo, ex oculari ulnere: En autem de eo Gaurici vaticinium in P. . . . nollitico Anni MDLVI. Because in the scheme of his almost divine nativity, he had the sun almost in partile aspect with Venus, and the Moon and Venus in the constellation of Aries, advancing thro' his horoscope, he shall live happily the space of seventy years, wanting two months, if, by the divine favour, he survive the critical years, sixty three and sixty four, and shall be remarkable for his piety. Thi Gauricus had before published almost the same things as we find them related by Heminga. Here also follows a prediction of Cardan concerning the same Henry II. His old-age says he, shall be so much the happier, as he shall have experienced the more vicissitudes.

Thuanus mentions this prediction as a certain matter of fact (79). But they who cite Luke Gauricus's own words, taken from the horoscope of Henry II, deserve more credit. Now it is certain by these words, that the astrologer promised a long life to this monarch, and never threatened him with a fatal duel. Gassendus has not failed to cite this great example, and to add that Cardan was no less mistaken in the horoscope of this prince than Gauricus (80). of that prediction, would be alone sufficient to make us doubt whether it was made by an astrologer [X]. He had ten lawful children, and two natural. Some pretty remarkable particulars are told concerning the mothers of the latter [Z].

Henry II was born at St Germain en Laie, the thirty first of March, 1519. He bore the title of duke of Orleans, when he married Catherine de Medicis, at Marfeilles, the twenty eighth of October, 1533. He was but fourteen years and some months old: which made Pope Clement VII, uncle to Catherine, fear that the marriage was not consummated the wedding-night; and some authors pretend, that by the curiosity he had to be

This matter is of such importance, as to deserve that I should cite a second witness; he is not a man who goes upon hear-say, he relates what he read in the very writings of Gauricus; he saw there the most fortunate predictions that could be wished to Henry II. 'Et memini in Italia quædam Ephemerides annuas Lucæ Gaurici, vidisse, in quibus cum pro libertate scribendi quæ tunc vigeat, singulis principibus Europæis maximas felicitates aut gravissima damna minaretur, nihil postea perinde cecidit, ac ipse futurum prædixerat. Atque utinam Henricus secundus, quem ille extremâ tantum senectute, & morbo placidissimo satis concessurum dixerat, non ætate potius florenti, & tam acerbo præcipientique fato nobis ereptus fuisset (82). — I remember to have seen in Italy, certain annual ephemerides of Luke Gauricus, in which, according to the liberty of those times, he had foretold either great felicity, or terrible disasters, to the several princes in Europe, but nothing happened of all that he had predicted. And would to GOD, that Henry II, who, according to him, was to arrive to an extreme old age, and to die of the most gentle disease, had not, on the contrary, been snatched away in the flower of his age, by a cruel and violent death.'

[X] The different accounts . . . were alone sufficient to make us doubt whether it was made by an astrologer.] Let us see Stephen Pasquier's account of it; wherein we do not so much as find the name of Gauricus. It turns quite upon other persons, and other circumstances. 'It seems that a long time before . . . this disaster had been secretly prognosticated to the king by Hierome Cardan, who, in a scheme which he erected of his nativity, promised him all things easy at the beginning of his reign, but assured him in the decline of his life of an unfortunate end, and which, for the Grandeur of a king, he thought himself obliged to conceal. There was likewise a report spread at court, that, upon the cardinal of Lorraine's return from his last voyage to Italy, a letter was presented to him from a Jew of Rome, who was greatly versed and practised in these fantastical predictions, and divinations, who admonished him carefully to avoid a single combat. Which letters the king having heard read, made no account of them, not imagining, considering his high rank, that he should ever fight a duel. These letters were from that time laid up by Monsieur de l'Aubespine, who after the king's death shewed them to several lords, as is reported. Besides it is added (I will not assert it for a truth) that the queen remembering these letters, and the time that had been prognosticated, intreated him several times, that since the two preceding days were past to his honour and contentment, he would for that third day not enter the lists, to avoid all accidents, and substitute some other lord in his room. To which however he would not condescend. And that on the very day in which he was wounded, the queen sent a gentleman from her seat on purpose to intreat him, in her name, to be content with what he had done; he made answer, that he would run but once more, in which, as ill fortune would have it, he was wounded (83). Observe well that Pasquier tells this story only upon an uncertain hear-say, of the truth whereof he was not himself persuaded. But takes still more particular notice, that it is not said, that Cardan published that pretended horoscope after the death of Henry II. And yet he was vain enough and sufficiently bigotted to astrology (84), to have desired to take the glory of so surprising a discovery. Nothing could have dignified his art so much as that, he might have called to witness the constable of Montmorency, Catherine de Medicis, Aubespine, and other persons of the highest rank. For what cause could he have neglected the interests of his glory and fortune (85) in such a manner? We have seen in the foregoing remark, what Gauricus promised Henry II, in the year 1556. Let us see what he predicted to him four years before. Inclitissimus Gallorum Rex, this is what he put at the bottom of the scheme of the king's nativity in the Venice edition, 1552, printed by Curtius Trojanus Navò, 'Henricus Christianissimus, erit Regum quorundam Imperator, ante supremos cineres ad rerum culmina perveniet, felicissimamque ac viridem senectam, uti colligitur ex Sole Venere & Luna horoscopantibus, & potissimum, Sole in suo trono partiliter supputato. In civitatibus Arieti subjectis maximum fortietur dominium, si forte superaverit suæ ætatis annos 56, 63, 64, ad annos 69 Menses 10 dies 12 facili ac felici tramite perducetur' (86). — The most Christian king Henry shall rule over certain kings, arrive at the height of power, and live to a happy and vigorous old age, as is plain from the Sun, Venus, and the Moon, strong in the ascendant in partile aspect, and chiefly from the Sun, being in his exaltation. He shall obtain great dominion in the states, lying under Aries, if he survive the fifty six, sixty three, sixty four, to the sixty ninth year, ten months, and twelve days of his age, and shall enjoy great felicity.

[Y] Some pretty remarkable particulars are told concerning the mothers of the two natural children.] Read what follows out of Brantôme (87). 'Henry II who was of an amorous complexion, when he went to visit the ladies, did it in the most secret manner possible to prevent any suspicion of their dishonour; and if any of them were discovered, it was not by his fault, or by his will, but rather by the ladies, as I have heard say of one Madam Fleming, a Scotch lady of a good family, who being with child by the king, did not mince the matter, but speaking boldly in her French Scotch, said, I have done all that I could, so that by good fortune I am with child by the king, which I take to be a great honour and happiness; I think there is something sweeter and more delicate in the blood royal, than in any other, so well I find myself after it, without reckoning the good presents that attend it. His son whom he had by her then, was the late grand prior of France, who was lately killed at Marfeilles (88), which was a very great loss; for he was a very honourable, brave, and valiant lord.' What I have to say of the other mistress, is a singularity of another nature. 'The Dauphin, afterwards king Henry II, falling in love, with a young lady of Cony in Piedmont (89), in the journey that he made thither with the constable of Montmorency, his servants set the house on fire in the night; and the danger giving access to all people, they ran there in great numbers, crying salva la Donna, and taking her out, they carried her to the Dauphin (90). He had a daughter by her, called Diana, who had for her first husband, Horatio Farnese, duke of Castro, and for her second, Francis duke of Montmorency, eldest son to the constable. The second marriage commenced the fifth of May 1557 (91), and ended by the death of her husband, sixth of May 1579 (92). The only son they had, died before his father. The widow lived to the third of January 1619, being a widow eighty years of age. She mediated a reconciliation between Henry III and Henry IV, and tenderly loved Charles de Valois, her nephew, natural son to king Charles IX. She saved his life, when Henry IV would have involved him in the affair of the duke of Biron. She represented to that prince, that it was too much his interest to render sacred and inviolable the heads of the natural sons of kings, not carefully to avoid the establishing of so fatal a precedent against them. She married that nephew to Charlotte de Montmorency, her husband's niece, and left his children heirs of all her estate, and of the palace of Engoulême (93), which she had at Paris (94).

be informed about it, he found such proofs as satisfied him [Z]. This young prince came to be Dauphin, the tenth of April, 1536, by the death of his elder brother. We have seen elsewhere (i), that his wife was barren several years, and afterwards bore him many children. He persecuted his subjects of the Reformed religion, with the utmost cruelty; and yet he forged those arms himself, which aided them most effectually to maintain their cause [AA]; for by his means the Protestants of Germany put their affairs in so good a posture, as to be able to send great succours to the Calvinists of France. The comparison which has been made betwixt his reign, and the latter years of Francis I. teaches us, that a prince which is too liberal of his favours, is more prejudicial to his kingdom, than a prince who is excessively sparing of them [BB]. remark [K].

[Z] Some authors pretend, that by the curiosity which Clement VII had to be informed about it, he found such proofs as set his mind at rest. I have read this, only in Mr Varillas. 'The interview of his holiness, saith he (95), and of his majesty, was at Marseilles, and the nuptials of the duke of Orleans and Catherine were there celebrated with great magnificence. As the bridegroom was but sixteen years old, and the bride but thirteen, the king, who was unwilling to hazard his son's health, would have had the consummation of the marriage deferred for two or three years. But this did not relish with the Pope; who feared, that if he should happen to die before his niece's marriage was consummated, she would be sent back to Italy. And indeed he was not satisfied, says Paul Jovius, till he had seen certain proofs of the consummation of the marriage.' If Paul Jovius has made mention of such a circumstance, it is not in the place of his history, where he speaks of that interview of the Pope and Francis I, which yet was the most proper place, and the most natural occasion of touching upon that particular, especially considering, that the author forgot not to take notice of the tender age of the duke of Orleans. And to make many other observations; and even to say, that the marriage was consummated the first night. 'Augebant suspitionem maturatæ nuptiæ, quæ impares regio sanguini viderentur. Siquidem nobilissimus adolescens Henricus, quamquam ætate tenerior, Catharinam celebratis insigni ceremonia nuptiis, ex virgine mulierem prima nocte reddiderat (96). — The hastening of the nuptials, which seemed unsuitable to the royal blood, increased the suspicion. For Henry, tho' very young, after celebrating the marriage with great magnificence, enjoyed Catharine the first night.'

(99) Pasquier's Letters, Tom. II, book xv, pag. 218.

I confess then, that Mr Varillas may be suspected to have cited Paul Jovius wrong. What he says of the bridegroom's being sixteen years old, and the bride thirteen, is not exact. For it is certain, that Henry II was born the thirty first of March, 1519, and that he married Catherine de Medicis, the twenty eighth of October, 1533 (97). Father Anselm, who dates his birth the thirty first of March, 1518, adds, that it was before Easter, and consequently, that that year was 1519, new stile. He says also, that Catherine was born the thirteenth of April, 1519. Gauricus sets down the same day and year in that lady's nativity. There was therefore but fourteen days difference betwixt their ages. Spondanus is no less mistaken than Varillas, since he says, that Catherine was but thirteen years, and that Henry was fifteen years and seven months (98).

[AA] He forged those arms himself which aided the Protestants: the most effectually to maintain their cause. See what I have said concerning this in the remark [D], and join to it this passage of Stephen Pasquier (99), 'we saw the emperor Charles V make war upon his German subjects, for having embraced heresy. . . . His affairs went on successfully; this made them implore our assistance. Could there be any thing more plausible in point of interest of state, as politicians judge of it, than to take their cause in hand, not to suffer a great prince to aggrandize himself still more at our very gates, by the ruin of all the princes of Germany? but, on the other hand, could there be any thing more unjust than to assist a subject against his lawful sovereign? and especially to take the part of a Heretic, against a Catholic emperor, who fought only for the honour of God, and the good of his church? our king was a Catholic prince, as were also the lords who had the greatest share in his favour; yet, notwithstanding, we take upon us the protection of the German Heretics; and the king in full parliament caused himself to be proclaimed by the glorious title of protector of the German liberty, that was to say of the German heresy; and as such caused money to be coined bearing that inscription. Under that specious title he undertook this expedition with a powerful army; wherein things succeeded in such a manner, that upon the meer fame of our enterprise, when we were on the point of passing the Rhine, the emperor was forced to come to an agreement with his subjects, and to grant them many privileges against the honour of God, and his conscience, whom he would not otherwise have tolerated. As for my part, I firmly believe, that God afterwards was pleased to chastise us with the same rods, wherewith we afflicted the emperor. Having permitted, that, after Henry's decease, his children, while minors, should be made war upon by their subjects, for the maintenance of an opinion more violent than that of Luther, and that they should make use of the assistance of the German princes against them. And when God was pleased to exercise his vengeance upon us, it was past all human power to put a stop to it, whence all the remedies that we thought to apply to it, turned to our destruction.' Pasquier makes another remark, which doth not appear to me to be good. 'At our return, says he, from that fine German expedition (100), Calvin began to solicit one after another by letters, who suffered themselves to be easily overreached, thinking, probably, that since the king and his council had undertaken the protection of the Lutherans, they were in their hearts of the same religion. Thus by little and little the seeds of a new religion spread through France, which at length came to the noble parts, I mean, even to princes and great lords.' The author here commits two faults, he supposes, that Calvin did not begin to solicit the French by letters, till towards the end of the year 1552. Which is false; for he had never ceased to do it since the year 1536; and besides, it is not true, that the French could believe, that the king and his council were Lutherans in their hearts. They, of the very contrary, could not doubt, since they saw him persecute with fire and sword, those of the new religion over all his kingdom. The protection that he granted, and the good offices he did the Protestants of Germany, where of no force to elude this proof of his aversion to their sect. That only shewed, that he sacrificed the interests of his religion to the political interests of his state. This is the common course of sovereigns. Though they sometimes take another, and sacrifice to the spirit of persecution, not only the conquests they might make, but even those they have already made, and the most solid advantages of their kingdom. Henry II was an instance of this, when he accepted of the peace of Cateau.

[BB] A prince too liberal of his favours is more prejudicial to his kingdom, than a prince who is too niggardly of them.] A French civilian (101) has maintained, 'that they are in a great error, who praise and adore the goodness of a gentle, gracious, courteous, and simple prince; for such simplicity without prudence, is most dangerous and pernicious in a king, and much more to be feared than the cruelty of a severe, morose, rough, covetous, and inaccessible prince. And methinks our forefathers have not used this proverb without cause, An ill man makes a good king: which may seem strange to delicate ears, and which are not accustomed to weigh the reasons on both sides. By the indulgence and foolish simplicity of too good natured a prince, it comes to pass that flatterers and parasites, and the worst of men, carry off all of

fault was the ill management of his revenues, by which means he perverted the administration of them, and contracted immense debts [CC]. 'fices, employments, benefices, and grants, draining the treasures of a kingdom; by which means the poor people are gnawed to the very bones, and are cruelly enslaved by the great: so that for one tyrant there are ten thousand, &c. To confirm this position by examples, he afterwards adds what follows (103). 'We have seen this kingdom great, rich, and flourishing in arms and laws, towards the latter end of the reign of Francis I, when he became morose and inaccessible, and when no body durst approach him to ask any thing of him; then governments, offices, and benefices, were only given to the merit of men of honour; and pensions were so retrenched, that there was found in his treasury, when he died, a million of gold, and seven hundred thousand crowns, and the March quarter to receive, whilst there was nothing due, except a little to the Grisons, and to the bank of Lyons, which they did not pay, that they might keep them in their duty: peace was settled with all the princes of the earth; the frontiers extended even to the gates of Milan; the kingdom full of great commanders, and the learnedest men in the world. We have afterwards seen in the twelve years that Henry II reigned, (whose bounty was so great, as not to be paralleled by any prince of his age) the state almost quite changed; for as he was gentle, gracious, and good natured, he could refuse no body any thing: thus the treasures of his father in a few months being exhausted, places of trust were more than ever exposed to sale, benefices given without regard to merit, civil offices sold to the highest bidder, and consequently to the most unworthy: taxes greater than ever they were before; and yet when he died, his Exchequer was found in debt forty two millions: after having lost Piedmont, Savoy, Corsica, and the frontiers of the Low-Countries. And yet these losses were but inconsiderable in respect of reputation and honour. If the gentleness of this great king had been accompanied with severity; if his goodness had been mixed with rigour; his facility with austerity, they had not so easily drawn from him every thing that they asked of him.' The opinion of this learned man seems a paradox at first sight, but if it be examined nearly, it will be found to be well-grounded.

[CC] He perverted the administration of his finances, and contracted immense debts. 'There was an ordinance of Francis I. confirmed by his successor, importing, that there should be four keys to the Exchequer-chest, whereof the king should have one, and the others should be in the hands of commissioners appointed by him; and the disbursements of the money should be made by order of the king, in presence of the treasurer and of the comptroller of the Exchequer. But king Henry II, by an edict some time after granted * discharges to the commissioners and officers of the Exchequer, that no body afterwards might call them to an account: nay, one of these commissioners had at one time, purely as a gift, an hundred thousand crowns, given him, if the rumour which went of it every where be true: which was then a very great sum (104). It is Bodin who makes this observation, and a little after adds (105), that Francis I. did not make so many largesses during a reign of thirty two years, as his successor did in two. Francis I. had scarce closed his eyes, but the Tillage, or money which is given for the renewing of commissions, which was then a prodigious sum, was given to a single person (106). See how this is expressed in the Latin translation. Nondum iusta Parenti fecerat (Henricus secundus) cum Hirado quædam Palatina Pecuniæ omni infinitam, quam officarii, accepta confirmatione, regibus initiatis fisco dependere, solent, uno absorbit & eodem haustu (107). This prince's prodigality was the cause doubtless of his laying new taxes on his subjects, forgetting the promises he had made, when he imposed them. Consider well these words of Bodin (108): 'When the Taillon was laid on (108) Id. ibid. the subjects in the year 1549, the king promised not pag. 898. 'to employ or appropriate it to any other use besides the paying the Gendarmery, without confounding this revenue with any other: which was also promised, when the tax for payment of fifty thousand foot was imposed in Francis the first's time, which was only to be raised in walled towns, and their suburbs, which did not suffer by the number of soldiers; and yet since it has been extended equally to cities, towns, and villages, great and small, in the year 1555, by which the poor countrymen are doubly oppressed; for they pay and are pillaged on all sides.' The bad management of this king, produced another disorder, which was the borrowing great sums at high interest: 'When king Henry had occasion for money, he borrowed at ten, twelve, nay sixteen, per cent. as he did in the year 1554, of the Caponi, the Albici, and their partners in Germany; and the interest was paid at the four fairs, or became part of the principal. The emperor did the like on his part; but it is true, he gave but ten or twelve per cent. at most; and the same year the king of England borrowed from the German merchants an hundred thousand crowns, at 12 per cent. And whereas Henry thought, by giving greater interest than the emperor, and the king of England, to command a greater supply, he began to sink his credit by it; for the wisest managers concluded, that at long run he would neither be able to pay principal nor interest; for as much as 16 per cent. came at least to 18, by means of the interest, which he could not pay (109).' Note, that he was not the inventor of this practice; it began in his father's time. 'This was also a project brought into France in the year MDXLIII by cardinal de Tournon. when he was in favour with Francis I, whom he persuaded, by the suggestion of some Italians, that there was no way of drawing money into France from all parts, and making a fund for the time to come, to frustrate its enemies, but by establishing a bank at Lyons, and taking in money from all hands, paying 8 per cent. But at bottom the cardinal wanted to secure a hundred thousand crowns, which he had in his coffers, and receive as much interest as he could for it. The letters-patent having passed the seals, and the Bank being opened in the manner above related, every one strove who should first get there from France, Germany, and Italy: so that Francis I, when he died, was indebted to the bank of Lyons five hundred thousand crowns, which he had in his coffers, and four times as much; and there was a settled peace with all the world (110).' Bodin (111) condemns that invention suggested to Francis I. He thinks that it ruins the foundation of the finances, and that it proved the origin of a thousand misfortunes. Let us cite him once more (112). And as to the treasury, says he, it was so ill managed, that in less than twelve years that Henry II reigned, he (113) owed more interest, than all his predecessors, forty years before, had raised for all their expenses.

I am persuaded these citations from Bodin, will not be disagreeable to such as desire to know the epochs of taxes, and the original of customs in general.

[DD] Henry II first made Polygamy a capital crime.]

This I find in Bodin, 'Imperatores, says he (114), perpetua lege πολυγαμίαν infamiae poena subiecta veterunt: nos vero legibus poena capitalis Henrici II principatu irrogari cepit. — The emperors, by a perpetual law, prohibited Polygamy, under the penalty of infamy: but in the reign of Henry II it was first made a capital crime by our laws.' The author of the Miscellanies of History and Learning was probably ignorant of this particular. For see how he expresses himself, 'Some parliaments in France, condemn to death those whose are convicted of Polygamy, because they suppose it to be a law of

I shall add a thing which I find in a letter of Bodin's. Pope Julius III summoned this prince to appear before GOD, to answer for the wrong he did to him by keeping possession of Miranda. The king answered that he would appear there, but that he was fully persuaded that the Pope would not appear (n).

HENRY III, king of France, son of Henry II and Catherine de Medicis, had obtained so much renown before he was king, and even before he was twenty years old, that the Poles thought him worthy of their crown; but they had soon reason to repent of that election. The manner in which he stole away from Cracow, is one of the most shameful actions in the world. The reason of that flight, was his desire of inheriting the crown of France after Charles IX. He indeed reigned after him, and in such a manner, that the Poles had no reason to regret the loss of him. It may be said of him, as it was of Galba, that he would have been thought worthy of a crown, if he had never wore one [A]. His life was so divided betwixt debaucheries and devotions, that a more strange mixture was never seen. He gave himself into the hands of his minions, with so little reserve, that all France was offended with it; more especially, because the excessive expences he was at for them [B], turned to the charge of the poor people. He incurred the hatred of the ladies, which was very prejudicial to him [C].

The

[A] It may be said of him, as it was of Galba, that he would have been thought worthy of a crown if he had never wore one. Every body is acquainted with the following saying of Tacitus. 'Major privato vilis' (Galba) dum privatus fuit, & omnium consensu capax Imperii, nisi imperasset (1). — Galba was thought more than a subject while he was one, and would have been thought worthy of the empire by all, if he had not reigned. Suetonius says the same in other words, 'Majore adeo & favore & auctoritate adeptus est quam gessit Imperium' (2). — He obtained the empire with more favour and authority, than he governed it. The same judgment has been made of the emperor Jovian (3); but the quite contrary was said of Marius (4). Our Henry III verified, to his cost, this judicious maxim, Magistratus virum prodest (5): he shewed by wearing a crown, that they were mistaken, who thought him worthy to wear it. The words of Cassiodorus cannot reasonably be applied to him. Hic est probata conscientie gratissimus fructus, ut quamvis summa potuerit adipisci; judicetur tamen ab omnibus plus mereri (6). Much less could it be said of him, magna cum præfesserat fama, qua major inventus est (7).

[B] The excessive expences he was at for his minions. (8) The principal employment, and greatest pleasure of the king, consisting in pleasing two favourites (9), he declared that he could not be content till he had made them as great as himself, and rendered them, as he said, so potent, that it should not be in the power, either of envy or fortune to destroy them. He resolved then, having no daughters to bestow on them, to marry them to his wife's sisters, Margaret, and Christienne, though they were already betrothed to two other heiresses. . . but in order to honour them with some title that might qualify them for such an high alliance as his, he resolved to make them both dukes and peers of France. . . In the mean time, the duke of Lorraine brought his nieces with such a train and magnificence, as if he had been to marry them to kings. As for Christienne, being as yet very young, she was only betrothed to the duke of Epemon; and yet she never was married to him, but chose rather to take the veil. As for Margaret she was betrothed at the Louvre, in the queen's chamber, and the nuptials were celebrated eight days after, in the church of St Germain de l'Auxerrois. It would be superfluous to describe the Masquerades, Balls, Tournaments, Feasts, and Music, and all the other pomps which luxury invented, for the wedding. In a word, it lasted near six weeks; and Paris, the Theatre of Wonders, had never seen any thing like it. The king, dressed in the same manner as his favourite, led the bride to church. . . after the marriage, he appointed seventeen entertainments, which were made in order by the princes and lords who were related to the lady: the least of them came to more than a hundred thousand livres: at each of which, the guests had changes of such rich and precious habits, that gold and silver cloth could make no figure there. There were suits which cost ten thousand crowns for the workmanship. In fine, the expence was so prodigious, that the king for his part only, spent no less than four millions of livres; besides, he promised to pay the husband, for his wife's fortune, four hundred thousand crowns in two years time: and when he was told, that these excessive profusions would ruin him, he answered, that after he had married his two children, he would be frugal. He meant Joyeuse and Epemon. The Swiss ambassadors coming to Paris to demand the money that was due to them, and the treasurers answering, that the king had none, and that they must have patience, they replied, according to the usual liberty of their nation, that it was not credible, that a prince, so wife and so prudent, should spend 1200000 crowns for his pleasure at the marriage of a gentleman, and not have much more in his coffers for the public occasions of his kingdom (10).

See in the same historian (11) the extravagant affection this prince expressed for Maugiron and Quelus, when they had fought a duel (12).

[C] He incurred the hatred of the ladies, which was very prejudicial to him. The ladies, to whom the minions told all, discovered to the duke of Guise, all the secrets of the cabinet, to revenge themselves of the king, whom they hated, for certain reasons which are not told (13). These are Mr Maimbourg's words, which shew plainly how much the ladies prejudiced the king; but the reasons of their hatred are intelligibly enough explained by many historians. See, in the margin, the words of Mezerai (14). The observation mentioned by the author of the News from the Republic of Letters, is a meer cavil. Some critics, says he (15), have found fault with Maimbourg for saying, That the ladies to whom the minions told all, &c. They say, that these words are highly disobliging to the fair sex, because they insinuate, that women conceive an aversion for men, who make no addresses to them. Now, say they, if they are chaste, what is it to them, if they are neglected? They ought sure to be very indifferent about it. If they are not so, it is a manifest sign they do not desire to be chaste. But I think myself obliged to take Mr Maimbourg's part, against such unreasonable critics: I say pag. 251, ad then, that he speaks only of the ladies that were in the intrigues of the duke of Guise (16); and it is not to be doubted, but that women of that character do violently hate, when they have such reasons for it as are here to be understood. Conclude as much as you please, that if they were virtuous, it would be indifferent to them. Say, if you will, that this conclusion is disobliging. Mr Maimbourg has taken precautions, in his preface, against such sort of subtilties: he declares, that he seeks for truth, and not for what may please, and that if any one finds fault with it, they must blame those

The duchess of Montpensier revenged herself terribly for something the king had said of her [D]. The duke of Guise, by this concurrence of circumstances, and by the troubles of religion, growing bolder than he would have been otherwise, to prepare his way to the throne, found that the weakest princes are sometimes capable of a vigorous resolution. He was massacred by order of Henry III. I have spoke elsewhere

(a) of the consequences of that affair; but I have not said, that without the assistance of the Protestants, this monarch would have been oppressed at Tours, where the League attacked him (b), some months after he had put to death the duke and cardinal de Guise. Being delivered from that danger, he laid siege to Paris, and had doubtless brought that seditious city to it's duty, had he not been assassinated by James Clement, a Dominican. He died the second of August, 1589, the day after he was wounded (c). I have said in another place (d) that he has been justly blamed for yielding some towns to the duke of Savoy, who had accompanied him as far as the bridge of Beauvoisin in September 1574 [E]. He had reason to repent of that cession; for it encouraged the son of that duke to form some enterprizes against France [F].

There scarce ever was a prince born under a more capricious planet than Henry III. His capricious fortune made him experience a fate, not unlike that of those children, who are first educated by a tender mother, and afterwards by a cruel step-mother. The glory of his youth was very shining, and procured him the kingdom of Poland in a very glorious and shining manner, but that dazzling light was quickly eclipsed: He abandoned that crown a little after, more ignominiously than he gained it gloriously at his election; for what can be seen more strange and shameful, than a monarch running away in the darkness of the night, and flying out of his own dominions, as swiftly as if he had been a criminal who had discovered a provost-marshal at his heels? Thus it was that Henry III abandoned Poland (e). If that escape could be excused, upon the interest he had to make haste to succeed to an inheritance much better than the sceptre he wore; we might still justly say, that he must be born under a very unfortunate constellation, and Dius iratus, since he found himself reduced to such extremities, who have formed the laws of history, who require us to tell things as they are, and not as they ought to be.

There is too much subtilty in this reflexion; it is natural for us to desire, that the talents should not fall into contempt. This, I say, is natural, though we desire not to make an ill use of those qualities. The railery is carried too far in the voyage of Messieurs la Chapelle and Bachaumont, upon the subject of the anger that is ascribed to the ladies of Montpellier, against the unfortunate Dauloucy.

(17) She was

[D] The duchess of Montpensier (17) revenged herself terribly for something he said of her. It was told the king, that the League designed him no less a mischief than the making him a monk, and that the duchess of Montpensier shewed the scissars which she had prepared to cut off his hair. The reason was, that he had offended this widow, by holding some discourse, which discovered some secret blemishes of her's; a more unpardonable affront to the fair sex, than that which is offered to their honour (18).

That affront was deeply rooted in that duchess's heart, if we judge of it by the active zeal she shewed to destroy Henry III. She brought a good part of the materials from the invention of her genteel wit, and the labour of her body to build the aforesaid league; so that after it had been well-formed, playing at cards one day at Primero (for she loved play), one saying to her, that she should shuffle the cards well, she answered before a great deal of company, I have shuffled them so well, that it is impossible to shuffle, or unshuffle, them better. This had been well, if her relations had not been killed, the loss of whom, without being dejected at it, she undertook to revenge. As soon as she heard the news in Paris, without shutting herself up in her chamber to lament and mourn for them, according to the fashion of other women, she came out of her palace, with her brother's children in her hands, and leading them through the city, she made her lamentation before the people, animating them with tears and cries, with her pitiful and moving discourse, which she made to all, to take up arms, to make a violent insurrection, and to insult the palace, and picture of the king, as we have seen, and I hope to relate in his life, to renounce their allegiance, and to enter into rebellion against him, which was quickly followed by his murder; from which we may know who are the men and women who advised it, and are guilty of it (19). It was she who prevailed most with James Clement to kill the king. She spared nothing to bring it about, not even what, as is said, they call the last favour (20).

[E] In September, 1574, the king arrived the fifth of September, 1574, at the bridge of Beauvoisin, and not on the twenty first of September, 1575, as is said by two or three historians (21), whom John Aymes de Chavigny censures, in the 224th page of the first face of his French Janus. Thus he calls his explication of Nostradamus.

[F] To form enterprizes against France. The author of the first Savoisienne (22) reports (23), that when Henry III returning from Poland passed by Savoy, he was asked as a recompence for a collation, the towns of Pignerol and Savilian, and that this prince, whose only fault was too much good-nature, granted it; that the duke of Savoy, son of him who received this noble present (24), took advantage of the confusions of France in 1588, for seeing king Henry III out of his capital city, he invaded the marquisate of Saluces; that after having sent an ambassador to the king, with promise to restore all into his hands, he degraded, all at once, the officers of his majesty, and established others by his ducal authority. . . . and at the same instant to display every where the trophies of his victory, he caused a proud medal to be struck, whereon was the figure of a centaur trampling under foot a crown reversed, with this device, Oportune. Which was to shew he knew how to take his opportunity (25). We see, in the second Savoisienne, that after the death of Henry III he made himself master of many places in Provence; which obliged Henry IV to seize Savoy, to bring him to reason. Observe, that in return for his medal (26), the king caused another to be struck, on which was a Hercules armed after the antique way, trampling a centaur under foot, over whom he lifts up his club with his right hand, and with his left a crown, which he seems to have taken up; and the device, which as a soul was to animate this body, was the word, Oportunitus; to shew that he knew better than he how to seize an opportunity, and more honourably; since he had employed force of arms instead of surprizes, which the other had practised with great ingratitude (27). This repaired the mischief, which the cession of Pignerol had occasioned; but the fault of Henry III was not thereby rendered the more excusable.

The author of a piece that reflects very much on the present duke of Savoy (28), has mentioned this affair, but not without some errors. Henry III, says he (29), being engaged in a war against a potent league, Charles Emanuel, grandfather (30) to his royal highness, acted much the same part he has done at present. He conceived great hopes, for his fortune, if he should lay hold on that opportunity of declaring against France, and in the year 1588 he actually joined his arms with as not to be able to succeed to the king, his brother, but upon those terms. This would always be a sign, that his fortune maliciously led him through perplexed and entangled ways. The world looked for him in himself, after his return to France, but could not find him. The duke of Anjou, who had acquired so great a reputation (f), was quite lost in the person of Henry III. There was nothing to be seen in him then but the humour of a man-hater [G]. Here follow some other caprices of this monarch's fortune. He had a brother who was a heavy burthen upon his shoulders: death delivered him from this burden; he was overjoyed at that deliverance, and this itself ought to be reckoned a misfortune; for what can be more odd, than to be reduced to rejoice at the death of an only brother? But however, this would be still a sort of advantage, if it was the source of many lasting advantages. But it did not prove so to Henry III; for he quickly found, that the duke of Alençon's death, whatever advantages attended it, was more prejudicial than useful to him [H], since it furnished a pretext for caballing, and fomented that dangerous faction, which gave such frequent mortifications to the king, and at last overwhelmed him. The joy he conceived upon having got rid of the duke of Guise, was of the same nature. It lasted but a little while; he immediately found, that this decisive blow, which he thought absolutely necessary

those of Henry the third's enemies, and having formed a powerful party, whereof he declared himself the head, he entered into Provence, and by stratagem seized on the towns of Marseilles and Arles, and grew so haughty upon his conquests, as to strike a medal to serve as an everlasting monument of his victories. He caused himself to be represented under the emblem of a centaur, &c. The author adds, that Henry IV carrying the war into Italy, in the year 1600, made himself master of almost all Savoy and Piedmont, and that he in his turn caused a medal to be struck, &c. This narration is not exact. The junction of the forces of Savoy, with the enemies of Henry III was not made in the year 1588, nor was it in that year, but in the year 1590, that he entered into Provence. He did not strike the medal of the centaur, after making himself master of Marseilles, but after the invasion of the marquise of Saluces. Henry IV did not carry the war into Italy in the year 1600, and he conquered nothing in Piedmont. The author perhaps is more judicious in his political reflexions than in his narrations. Henry IV, says he (31), after the conquest of Savoy and Piedmont, suffered himself to be wrought upon by the entreaties of Pope Clement VIII, who sought to reconcile the distressed duke with the king: though the opinion of all the politicians of that time was, that Henry IV ought to keep Savoy and Piedmont to chastise the rashness of that imprudent prince, and thereby to have a free passage to enter Italy whenever he thought fit. This was the advice of cardinal d'Osat, one of the greatest politicians of his age; but Henry IV on that occasion showed more generosity than policy, and restored all again to Charles Emanuel. What would cardinal d'Osat have said of the imprudence of Henry III in divesting himself of Pignerol, since he blames Henry IV for quitting Savoy at a time when he was a hundred times more capable of resisting his neighbours, than ever his predecessor was? France had been very unhappy, if she had not been possessed of Pignerol, when the duke of Savoy entered into the alliance with the house of Austria, England, and Holland in 1690. She was forced to part with it six years after, which is no small loss.

[G] There was nothing to be seen in him then, but the humour of a man-hater. At his return from Poland he was almost inaccessible, except to three or four, and would eat in private, contrary to the custom of our kings; but it was not liked, and remonstrances were made to him on that subject: wherefore being forced, as it were, by custom to eat in public, he ordered great rails to be set round his table, which are still in the hall of the Louvre at Paris, and the following verses were made on that occasion, and fixed up in several places of the Louvre.

Puis qu' Henry Roy des François
N'en sème que quatre ou trois,
Il faut que ces trois ou quatre,
Allent ses ennemis combattre.

Since Harry of France Loves only a few,
These few must advance,
His foes to subdue.

He ordered, that no body should enter into his chamber without a bonnet (32). I imagine, that the motive of that order, was, that he himself wore a little bonnet like a child's, that had a roll cut with slashes across, and upon it a plume of feathers before, with some fine crotchet of flowers, and a great perriwig, and he never uncovered his head, not even at church, because his head was shaved (33). There was a great deal of humour in all this. For the rest, this will make you understand the words I am going to transcribe. Even his turban sufficiently represented his infidelity, being always covered like a Turk, which he never pulled off to do honour to JESUS CHRIST (34). This is what the author of the book, intituled, The Martyrdom of the two Brothers, reproaches Henry III with.

[H] The duke of Alençon's death, whatever advantages attended it, was rather prejudicial than useful to him. I study not only to say nothing without proof, but every where, as much as I can, to bring the testimony of cotemporary writers; it is easy to imagine therefore that it is with pleasure that I here make use of the words of Stephen Pasquier (35). He (36) had still a thorn in his foot, which in the midst of this peace (37) seemed to stop the course of his satisfaction: for though in appearance he was in no ill understanding with his brother, the duke, yet he was a second king, and had a distinct court and favours, sometimes in the city of Tours, sometimes in other towns of his appenage; who differed in their notions so much from those of the king, that he never would suffer either himself, or any of his followers, to be invested with the order of the Holy Ghost. Besides, his appenage was so great, that it took up a good part of France. He had his chamber of accounts in Tours, his exchequer at Alençon, which judged, without appeal, of the causes of the duchy, both civil and criminal. Besides, this prince preferred to the bishops and abbies of his appenage whom he pleased to be nominated to the Pope, by the king, according to the Concordate: all these were grandeurs in some measure like those of the king, and might cause jealousies in his soul, but he prudently dissembled them. Now it happened, that, in the year 1583, the duke died, and by his death his appenage was united to the crown. They who governed the king, rejoiced exceedingly in their hearts; and he himself sufficiently expressed, how much he thought his grandeur was thereby increased, when he writ with his own hand, the regulations of it, ordering, that the chancellor, sitting in council, should be clothed with a gown, and long robe of crimson velvet, and the counsellors of state with purple satin, and that his ushers and valets de chambre should have velvet-doublets, and upon them a thick chain of gold hanging about their necks. Then a long set of rooms before he could be come to, and a long train of lords that were to walk before him, when he went to church. Indeed, that death at first sight promised him a long repose, and yet it was the consummation of his and France's misery; for if the duke had lived, all pretences had been cut off from the Leaguers. . . . Immediately after his death, in the year 1584, the princes of the League made no scruple of displaying the discontents they had been a hatching, covered with the cloak of cessary to his own repose and safety, plunged him into new troubles, and mortal disquiets [L]. It must be confessed, that he surpassed himself in the execution of the project of putting the duke of Guise to death [K]. He showed a great deal of prudence and resolution in that action, at least much more than on former occasions, wherein he behaved himself in such a manner, as made him despicable to the Pope [L]. One of the greatest odnesies of his destiny was, that he equally drew on himself the enmity of the Papists, and Huguenots. These two parties, that are opposite in all things both in temporals and spirituals, agreed in their aversion to this prince. This was a centre of unity to people, that in every thing else found a subject of division. Humanly speaking, the Huguenots had just reasons to hate him, for he persecuted them without measure; and he was looked upon as one of the great promoters of the Paris massacre, and he gloried

'the Catholic, Apostolic, Romish religion.' Note, that love-intrigues had sowed the seeds of discord betwixt these two brothers. They happened to be rivals in love: one of their hearts would dislodge the other, and not being able to bear partners in love, any more than in authority, they changed the affection of brothers into implacable hatred and spite (38). I leave you to consider, whether that twofold jealousy, one of love, the other of ambition, betwixt two brothers (39), the one a king, and the other presumptive heir to the crown, and who both had minds and inclinations ill enough disposed, was not capable of giving them a prodigious antipathy for one another (40).

[I] He found that the death of the duke of Guise plunged him into new troubles and mortal disquiets. Pasquier shall likewise here be my commentator. 'As soon as the duke of Guise was dead, says he (41), never was king so satisfied as ours, saying a loud, and clearly to every body, that he had no longer a companion, nor consequently a master; and the next day the death of the cardinal was the accomplishment of his wishes. In this ease and satisfaction of mind, he enjoyed himself some days, dispatching letters to all parts, to declare the reasons of what he had done, but he reaped little profit by them. Some eight or ten days after receiving no news from Paris, he began to bethink himself, and to abate something of that excessive joy. And afterwards hearing of that general revolt, he earnestly wished that what he had done were still to do . . . The king by degrees began to be displeased with every thing, even with himself. I can say it, and write it to you, as one that has been an eye witness of it. Diffidence more than ever took possession of his heart, as you shall presently hear.' Pasquier after these words gives four or five examples, that clearly express the unspeakable confusion of this prince. He had a mind to convey to the castle of Amboise, some persons whom he had ordered to be arrested after the death of the Guises, and he found no body that he durst trust but himself. I will tell you frankly, adds Pasquier, that the greatest part of us, who were at Blois, almost burst with indignation, to see the affairs of the king in so bad a posture, that he was forced to be master to his own prisoners. He had scarce gone when we received the news that the marshal d'Amont having abandoned the citadel and raised the siege of Orleans, upon the march of the Sieur de Mayenne, was retired with his troops to Baugency. Many of his wounded soldiers came to Blois. Then it was we all believed, that the conducting of these prisoners was a fine and studied pretence of the king, that so he might quit the town with less dishonour. And I can assure you that if the Sieur de Mayenne had fallen upon us, the fear was so great and general, that he would have found no resistance, and being once master of Blois, all the river Loire had been his own, especially as all the towns were wavering, and the king would have been wonderfully at a loss to find a place of retreat. GOD was pleased to rescue us from that misfortune (42). The author adds (43), that Longnac, who first induced the king to command that murderer, which had proved so unsuccessful, lost all his favour with him. Some historians relate, that this brave gentleman not thinking himself safe at court, asked the king for a place to which he might retire, in order to secure himself from the resentments of the league (44). This was to make the king sensible, in what a wretched condition his affairs were believed to be; the answer that is pretended he made to Longnac, is not unworthy of a great monarch. I mention it in another place (45).

[K] He surpassed himself in the execution of the project of putting the duke of Guise to death. His heart had failed him on the day of the barricades, he had given up the day to his rival, he had made his escape from Paris, and left the duke of Guise all the glory of a triumph. His heart returned to him again at Blois, and there he humbled his haughty enemy. We may apply the words of the Æneid to him:

Quondam etiam victis redit in præcordia virtus, Victoresque cadunt - - - (46).

And then we might see the truth of a sentence of Homer, I mean the remonstrance that Calchas made to Achilles, that a king who is irritated against his inferior, has the better of him sooner or later.

Κρίσσαν γὰρ βασιλεὺς ὅτε χέσεται ἀνδρὶ χέρνι, εἴτερ γὰρ τε χίλον γέ καὶ αὐτῆμας καταπέψῃ, ἄλλὰ γέ καὶ μετέπισθεν ἔχει κίτον ὄφρα τελίσσῃ ἐν στήθεσσιν ἑοῖσι.

Potentior enim Rex quando irascitur viro inferiori, Quamvis enim iram vel eodem die decoxerit, Tamen & postea retinet similitudinem donec perfecerit In præcordibus suis (47).

I have read, in several authors, the relation of that exploit of Henry III, but I have not seen any where the particulars are better connected and prosecuted, than in that which Mr Marcel hath inserted in the fourth tome (48) of his History of France. There one may see all the exactness of the measures that were taken to secure that great blow: the king therein discovered a great vigilance and resolution, and a soul so much master of itself, as carefully to observe the smallest things, that might be prejudicial (49). Consider well the encouragement he gave to the secretary of state, who was to acquaint the duke of Guise that the king would speak with him. 'Hereupon his majesty hearing the duke of Guise was in the council, said to Monsieur Revol, secretary of state; Revol, go and tell Monsieur de Guise, that he must come and speak with me in my old closet. The Sieur de Nambu having refused to admit him, he returned to the closet with a frightened countenance, he was a great man, but timorous; Good Lord, said the king, Revol, what ails you? what is the matter. How come you to be so pale? you will spoil all, rub your cheeks, Revol: there is no harm, Sir, said he, only Monsieur de Nambu would not open the door to me unless your majesty command him.

The king orders him from the door of his cabinet to let him come in again, and Monsieur de Guise also (50). I will on this occasion cite here, what I have read in the Journal des Savans. What passed at Blois, touching the proposal which was made to the States, not to suffer in France any other than the Catholic religion, shews sufficiently that Henry III, was more politic than the generality of the world imagine (51). [L] He had behaved in such a manner as made him despicable to the Pope. See the General Criticism on Maimbourg's History Calvinism; you will there find (52) two exclamations of Sixtus V. One, relating to the temerity he attributed to the duke of Guise, and the other the simplicity he ascribed to Henry III. He expressed himself on this subject very cavalierly. Some authors (53) relate, that considering one day the conduct this monarch, he said I have done all that I was able, to get out of the condition of a monk, and be doth all that he can to fall into it.

gloried in it (g). This, joined with his zeal for the most monkish devotions, ought to have purchased him the friendship of the ecclesiastics, and of the most vehement bigots of the Romish church; and yet he was the object of their hatred more than can be imagined. This is one instance of the whimsicalness of his fate; and here follows another. Whatever he had most ardently loved, at last turned to his ruin (b). What we have already said (i) concerning the disorders, which were occasioned by Henry the second's prodigality, agrees still better with the reign of Henry III, a prince infinitely more prodigal than his father. So that they saw under his reign more imposts, more pecuniary edicts, and more waste of the finances, than was ever before known in the kingdom. The mischief had still been greater, if the king had obtained leave to alienate the crown-lands. But the States-General would not consent to it [M]. Let us observe that Henry III, who, in regard to his favourites, was not jealous of his authority, nor aspired to independence, passionately desired to enlarge the royal power [N]. I will say something of his devotions [O]: and I will

[M] The States-General would not consent to alienate the domains of the crown. Besides what I have already said of this in the article BODIN (54), I shall set down here a passage of Mezeral (55). 'As to the point of alienation of the crown-lands . . . Emar (56) by order of the assembly, answered Believre, whom the king had sent there, that the common, and the fundamental, laws of the state absolutely forbid that alienation; that the crown-lands resembled the jointure of a wife, which can neither be sold nor appropriated to any other use by her husband; that they were still more sacred than those of the church, because they could not be alienated for any reason whatsoever, even with solemnity; that it was a thing unheard of, that recourse was ever had to that expedient, even in the greatest necessities of France, and when it was in greater danger than it was at that time; as in the reign of king John, for whose deliverance, so much money, so many towns, and provinces, were given; that, in a word, they were one of the strongest pillars that supported the crown, upon which portions, dowries, and appennages, were founded, and therefore that the king's demesne ought rather to be strengthened than weakened, and raised higher, rather than be lowered; that as for the rest, if the third state so earnestly remonstrated the consequences of that alienation, it was because whatever should be taken from the crown-lands, must be made good at their expence, and the whole loss would fall upon it alone, and not on the other two estates, who for that reason did more easily consent to it.' If you will see the limitations of the royal authority in that respect, read what follows. 'By the edict that was made in the year 1565, at Moulins, where all the princes and great lords were convened, with a great number of presidents and counsellors of sovereign courts, it was expressly enacted, that all the alienations made, or to be made, of the crown-lands, should be null, except in two cases, namely, for provision for the younger children of our kings, and for mortgages necessary to raise sufficient sums for the necessities of the war; and that in these two cases, letters-patents should be passed and published, in the courts of parliament, it being expressly forbid them to have any regard to such letters, for any other cause or time whatever, though it were but for a single year (57).'

[N] Henry III who, in regard to his favourites, aspired not to independence, passionately desired to enlarge the royal power. Here are two points: I prove the first, by an observation that was made upon the great interests of the duke of Epemon, and on a Fortune of gilt-silver which the city of Rouen presented him (58). This goddess strictly embraced him in her arms, and below were these Italian words, E per non lasciar ti. — And not to leave thee. A device taken from an equivocal name; to show, that that grandeur could never be destroyed, as indeed, the king having an excessive favour for him, had protested to him before, that he would make him so great in the midst of his friends, that he himself should not have the power to lessen him, tho' he should afterwards desire to do it. This passage we have since learned from the duke of Epemon, in a very elegant letter, which he wrote to the king in his disgrace (59). They who say that kings never love any body, and look upon that as a great fault, are in a double error; for most monarchs are subject to an excess of friendship, which causes more disorders than could flow from an indifferent and insensible heart. See, above, the comparison that Bodin has made betwixt the latter years of Francis the first's reign, and the reign of Henry II. See also the remark [B] of this article. It were perhaps a thing to be desired, that kings like the Stoics wife man, were without love and hatred. It is at least very certain, that the too kind, affectionate, beneficent and prodigal temper of our Henry, was the cause of infinite ills. Let us go on to the second point.

The States of the kingdom, in 1576, had resolved to name twelve deputies to assist in the king's council, when the papers which would be presented by the three estates to his majesty, should be examined there. That resolution was disagreeable to Henry III, because he feared these deputies of the States would hinder him from disposing of affairs to the advantage of his power; but when he was made sensible, that he would thereby gain a greater authority, he was glad that the States had taken such measures, and he was sorry that they changed their mind, and was very angry with Bodin, who had been the cause of that change (60). It will not be amiss to hear Thuanus himself: 'Cum Bodinus tertium ordinem, si ulterius pergerent, intercessurum diceret, facer ordo, ac mox nobilitas acquievit, ac commune suffragiorum votum fuit, ne ulli delegati, qui cum regis consiliariis de postulatis decernerent, ab Ordinibus eligerentur, contrarium cum initio placuisset, eaque re non mediocriter Rex animo commotus esset, ut supra ostendimus, postea mutaverat, à Lugdunensi Archiepiscopo, ut putatur, inductus, qui principi POTENTIAE SUAE AMPLIFICANDAE SUPRAMODUM CUPIDO, ex quo majestati regie decrementum metuebat, ex eo incrementum accessurum artificiose persuaserat (61). — Bodin having said, that the third estate, would oppose it, if they pushed that matter any further, the ecclesiastical estate, and soon after the nobility, desisted, and it was carried, that no deputies should be chosen by the States to deliberate with the king's council, concerning petitions, tho' they had formerly resolved on the contrary, and thereby had highly offended the king, as we have before related. But the king afterwards changed his sentiments concerning this matter, by means, as it was thought, of the archbishop of Lyons, who artfully persuaded his majesty, WHO WAS EXCEEDINGLY DESIROUS OF INCREASING THE ROYAL AUTHORITY, that, instead of lessening his power, as he apprehended, this would be the means of encreasing it.'

The archbishop of Lyons acted a very politic part on this occasion. [O] Something of his devotions.] I will make use of the words of du Verdier Vau-Privas. 'He performed several extraordinary devotions, going sometimes at ten a clock at night, to the Carthusian monastery, to hear mass. He instituted the fraternity of the White Penitents, of the Annunciation of our Lady in the Augustins at Paris, and went in procession like the rest, with his sack-cloth, and whip at his girdle. . . . He would needs likewise erect many other fraternities, as that of St Jerome, called the Blew Penitents, in the college of Marmoutier; that of the Crucifix of the Black Penitents, in the college of St Michael; that of the Grey Penitents of St Francis, at St Eloy. He brought the Feuillans, which are certain reformed monks of the order of Cîteaux, from the abbey of Feuilliance, near Tholouse, and lodged them in the suburb of St Honoré, not forget, that he was eloquent, a lover of the sciences; and that he took great delight in the conversation of learned men; but he was charged with doing this unseasonably as also with respect to the pains he took in studying the Latin tongue [P]. I have received more, and went often thither to perform his devotions; he had built a house near the Capuchins, where, on certain days, he went in like manner, to perform his spiritual exercises. Every one was porter, and performed the other offices in their turn, and he was called there, Brother Henry; and if any one asked for him, he must ask for Brother Henry, as if any courier came there, or any other matter happened whilst he was in that conclave. He erected another fraternity of Hieronimitans at Vicennes, and at St Mary de vie saine [of whole some life]. He caused a great and noble house to be built in the horse market, in a fantastical manner, with certain little cells, that he might go and pass some days there as a monk (62). He carried at his girdle a pair of beads containing ten Ave-maries (63).

This author has reason to say, that many have looked upon all these things as grimace (64), for the writers of the League, and others, have much traduced him upon that account. I will content myself with relating a passage, which I find in a libel of the Leaguers. The cells built by that hypocrite, served only for a cover to his lasciviousness, wickedness, ordures, and sodomies; John d'Esperson knows something of them, and cannot give me the lie in this matter. The wisest people have well said, that this was only to amuse fools, and cages designed for other sort of birds, and not a religious simplicity, which has always been the true motive for all the princes and honest men to sequester themselves, who were not (like that seeming hermit) touched at their hearts with a spirit of hypocrisy (65).

(65) Martyrdom of the two Brothers, fol. 5, Edit. 1589, in 8vo.

Du Verdier observes, that the preachers, and amongst others, Maurice Poncet, cried out against the fraternities and processions of the king. This Poncet seems to me to have been the most furious of them all. I will cite what Peter Matthieu has said of him, by which you will see, that these external acts of devotion were looked upon only as grimace, without any inward amendment. 'On Sunday the twenty seventh of March, 1583, the king imprisoned Poncet the friar, who preached in Lent at Notre-dame, for having preached the Saturday before too freely against this new fraternity (66), calling it the fraternity of hypocrites and atheists, and in proof of this (I repeat his very words) I have been informed from very good hands, that last night, which was the Friday of their procession, the spit was turning for the supper of those fat penitents, and that after having eaten good capons, they for their night collations, young virgins that were made ready for them. Ah? wretched hypocrites, do you mock God then under a mask, and carry a whip at your girdle, only for fashion's sake? it is not there, by God, that you ought to carry it; but it ought to be laid on your backs and shoulders, and you ought to be threshed very well with it; for there is not one of you but hath well deserved it. For which words the king, without desiring otherwise to speak to him, saying he was an old fool, ordered him to be conducted in his coach by the captain of the watch, into the abbey of S. Pere at Melun, without doing him any other harm, than the fear they put him in, that they would cast him into the river (67).'

[P] He was eloquent, . . . a lover of learning . . . but he was charged with applying to these unseasonably, and with respect to the pains he took in studying the Latin tongue.] Mezerai reports the substance of the speech which this prince made to the states of Blois, in the year 1576, and he adds (68): 'that fine oration pronounced by the mouth of a king, with an action that was truly majestic, and a wonderful grace, was received by all the auditory with a general applause; but not without some grief by the wiser part; who, admiring so many fine external qualities in that prince, lamented within themselves, that his education had not been answerable to his birth, and they could not praise the natural beauty of his genius, without delecting at the same time, those who had miserably corrupted it.' He gives also a summary of the speech which the same prince made at the opening of the states of Blois, in the year 1588, and he prepares his reader for it by these words (69). He made a fine speech to them in which he observed this temper, that he was very willing to assure them, that he had buried all past injuries in oblivion; but it was upon this condition, that, all factions being extinct, his authority should be restored to its full force; this he enlarged upon with so much art and politeness, that if the question had been only whether he was a good orator, he had doubtless carried his point. I will confirm this eulogy, with a letter written by one of the deputies (70) of the states of Blois, 'it was the finest and learnedest speech that was ever heard, not only from a king, but from one of the best orators in the world, and he had such grace, such assurance, such gravity and sweetness in pronouncing it, that he drew tears from the eyes of many persons, from which number I cannot exempt myself; for I found in my soul such a commotion, in hearing this prince speak, that my tears witnessed it, whether I would or no: he displayed with so much compassion, the miseries of this kingdom, set forth his sorrow for them with so much vivacity, compared the felicity, &c.

(71). It would be in vain to object to me, that his speeches were made for him, for that will not prejudice his title to the character of eloquent, considering the manner with which he spoke. They who fill the first places in parliaments; are deservedly esteemed sometimes good orators, tho' they cause the discourses, which they make at the opening of their audiences, to be composed by others; and how many excellent preachers are there that do not compose the sermons which they deliver; but not to insist upon this, let us recite a passage of Mezerai, which will shew that this monarch spoke very well off-hand (72). 'He rendered himself so eloquent by the natural disposition that he had for it, that if there could be any excess in so fine an accomplishment, we might have reason to say, that he had too much of it. And indeed he was wonderfully delighted in the great assemblies, and solemnities, where it was found, that his speech was always the finest, and that even the answers he made without premeditation to the deputies and ambassadors, were much better than the discourses they had prepared with great art and pains (73). I do not know, whether this great historian has ever insinuated, that this prince's speeches were made by any body else. I know indeed, that Thuanus relates that Morvillier was thought to be the author of that which the king pronounced in the states of Blois, in the year 1576 (74). But I am sure that if that prince did not compose those pieces himself, he at least contributed his examination, advice, and corrections; I am persuaded to believe so, from what I am going to say.

He had a great ambition to understand the French tongue perfectly, and to speak it politely and correctly. The pains he took in this, had all the success that could be expected from it. 'Noster Galliae Rex Henricus III, elegantiae sermonis sui studiosus (aliquot praesertim ante obitum annis, quo tempore plura regia quam multi credunt, habebat) haud infelici & inutili studio, fuit. In eo enim tandem excelluit, & ita quidem ut not minus castigatum quam ornatum esse cuperet (75). — Our king Henry III was exceedingly curious about the elegance of our language, (especially some years before his death, at which time he possessed more truly royal qualities than is commonly believed) and was very successful in that study. For he at last arrived to a great excellency in it, and aimed no less at accuracy, than elegance.' He could guess at an author by the stile of a book; by which he judged, that Henry Stephens was the author of a work that had appeared without any name to it (76), and he was not mistaken. He was heartily zealous for the interests of his language, and having commanded Henry Stephens to shew the advantages and excellencies of it, he pressed him so earnestly to compose such a treatise, that he was obliged to bring him a copy of it very quickly (77). I have said elsewhere (78), that he desired that learned man to make a parallel betwixt the Ciceronians of Italy, and the Ciceronians of France. I have said also (79) that he loved Bodin for the learned discourses he heard from him. These were many other learned persons, whose conversation he loved. Note, that in the year 1579, he gave three thousand livres to Henry Stephens, and a pension of 300 livres per annum (80).

(87) It was communicated to me by Mr Marais (of whom I have spoken in the end of the remark [2]) of the third duke of GUISE, an advocate of the parliament of Paris, to which he has added this note; In an instruction of Henry III to the Sieur de la Cayette going to Florence, I find that Mr de Schomberg is named counsellor of his majesty in his council of state, and marshal of his German soldiery.

It remains for me to prove, that it was the opinion of some that he employed that time in those things, which ought to have been employed in more urgent affairs. If ever any prince had reason to fear, it was then (81), nevertheless this new king, as if he had begun his reign in the tranquillity of a profound peace, instead of putting on his arms, fell to learning on one hand, grammar and the Latin tongue of Doron, (whom he afterwards made counsellor in the great council) and on the other hand, he held a kind of conference, and academy, with Pibrac, Ronlard, and other wits, on certain days, on which every one discoursed upon such subjects, as were before marked out. A noble and worthy exercise indeed, but not suitable to the affairs this prince had then upon his hands. These new lessons of grammar gave me occasion to vent, in a passion, these six Latin verses:

Gallia dum passim civilibus occidit armis,
Et cinere obruitur semisepulta suo,
Grammaticam exercet media Rex noster in aula, Dicere jamque potest vir generosus, Amo.
Declinare cupit, verè declinat & ille,
Rex his qui fuerat, sit modo Grammaticus. (82).

While France is all inflam'd by civil rage,
And her own sons in impious war engage,
Immur'd our monarch cons his grammar rules,
Declines and conjugates with bearded fools.
Decline he surely doth, who, from twice king,
Is now a school-boy grown a nameless thing.

Mr de Pibrac having told Pasquier one day (83), that he had heard, that Marillac (84) was the author of that epigram, added, that if he was sure of it, he would make him repent it; for it does not belong to a subject to play in that manner upon the manners and deportment of his prince (85). That would be well enough, replied Pasquier (86), in any one's mouth but your's, who ought to consider that if a king, that is exposed to the view of all his subjects, does not bridle his actions, it will be very difficult for him, to prevent the discontents of those, that most respect him: he added, that such verses proceeded not from one that was an enemy to his majesty, but rather from one who adored him, but at the same time was troubled to see him fall by that means into the contempt of all his people, and that we ought all to wish, as the case then stood, that that epigram had fallen into the hands of our king, to be a lesson to him not of Latin grammar, but of what he had to do.

[2] They had persuaded him to declare for his successor, the eldest son of the duke of Lorraine. Monsieur de Schomberg warded off that blow: I have a copy (87) of a memorial which he drew up on that subject, and which, in my opinion, deserves very well to be inserted at length.

Memoir of the Sieur de Schomberg.

Some time after the death of Messieurs de Guise, which happened at Blois, it was proposed by the cardinal de . . . on the part of his holiness, that if his majesty would declare the marquis du Pont, his nephew, heir of the crown, and get him acknowledged as such, with all the requisite solemnities; his holiness assured himself, that the king of Spain would give the Infanta in marriage to the said marquis, which would bring all the troubles of France to an end. To which the king being ready to consent, by the persuasion of some who were then about his majesty, Mr de Schomberg broke the design, by these arguments: that this would be to invert the order of France, abolish the fundamental laws, and leave to posterity a certain monument of its cowardice, and pusillanimity for which his majesty would be justly blamed by historians, and his servants and subjects branded with treachery and disloyalty, with which vice for his part he would not be tainted: that that war was betwixt the French against the French, who at first shew some heat, but afterwards of themselves return to reason: that his majesty should only be solicitous to live, and to gain time, and to be upon his guard against any resolute villain, who in these first furies might undertake something against his person, as a preservation against which, his majesty should command a waistcoat of mail to be made for him that he might ordinarily wear. A thing that was resolved upon but not executed. The Sieur Schomberg having made the king alter his opinion by the aforesaid remonstrance, his majesty commanded him, to tell him, by what means he thought that he might quell these commotions. To which the said Sieur Schomberg immediately gave obedience, and beseeched the king not to be guided any longer by the maxims that he had hitherto followed, and not to imagine that this affair could be accommodated by his usual connivance and lenity; that he must resolve to have recourse to arms and to make himself the strongest in the field; that for that purpose he should countermand Mr de Nevers, who was then before Garnache, and give a pledge to the king of Navarre to march with all his forces to his assistance, and that he should send into Germany, Italy, England, Denmark and to all other potentates, to let them know the justice of his cause, and the consequences of it, and desire their succours, and assistance to raise a great army of foreign troops. This proposal was violently opposed, and especially by Mr de Nevers, who went so far as to say that it was heretical; and that neither the Pope, nor any of the Catholic princes would approve of the king of Navarre's being so near his majesty. On the contrary, Mr de Schomberg steadfastly maintained that that war did not in any sort concern religion, but the state, and that his majesty could not so safely depend upon any person in the world, as the said king, as being himself interested in the preservation of the kingdom, to this he added many other strong reasons; which had so much weight, that from that time the treaty with the said king was set on foot at Blois, and was afterwards executed at Tours, where the first interview was held betwixt these two kings. It is therefore with great reason that the service, which the Sieur Schomberg did then to France in these two points, particularly to the house of Bourbon, was very much celebrated. The king likewise then advised, that the said Sieur de Schomberg should write to the president Jeanin; to keep the duke of Mayenne to his allegiance: but his majesty having heard of the departure of the said duke from Lyons, and his coming this way, the said letter was never sent, and it is still among my papers in Germany, full of excellent reasons and persuasions, which since have been assisting the reduction of the said duke of Mayenne.

[R] What the deputy of the League was ordered to represent to the Pope, after the king was assassinated by James Clement a Dominican. Those pieces cannot be too carefully preserved, which are authentic proofs of the fury most of the French were seized with, in the reign of Henry III, and some years after his death. Some people, will endeavour hereafter to darken the truth of these matters of fact: we must prevent their wicked attempts; for the farther men are from the age, these things were acted in, the easier it is for them to wrangle. Henry III had not been a hundred years dead, when an anonymous author was so bold as to publish a treatise (88), maintaining that James Clement did not kill that prince, which is to deny that it is day at noon. You will find some convincing circumstances against that monk in a writing, of which I have received a copy (89), which I here insert entire.

(88) Intituled, La Fatalité de St. Clou. It was printed in the year 1672. The Jesuit Maimbourg mentions and refutes it in few words, in the History of the League, l. h. iii, pag. m. 353.

(90) He had just before given an account of the murder of the Guises, and the revolutions that followed it.

It was then (90), most holy father, that the evil appeared most extreme, and that the prayers as well of the clergy, as of the people, continued with greater perseverance, and we must certainly believe, that they forced the divine majesty to commiseration, which would not leave so many good men, and so zealous for his holy cause, in a longer doubt of his goodness and mercy; but rather deliver them from their languishing, by so great and so wonderful an event, that the more it is considered, the more it raises our thoughts to the meditation and admiration of God's incomprehensible judgments. It is the death of the king that happened in so strange a manner, that the truth of the thing and the impossibility, that was objected against it, were long contending which should carry it. At last the news was confirmed by many concurrent advices, and tho' your holiness has had the particulars of it from other hands, I presume you will not be fatigued with the account which I shall give to your holiness of it. A monk of the order of St Dominic of the convent of Paris, named Brother James Clement, of twenty three or twenty four years of age, a native of the village of Sorbonne, in the diocese of Sens, and the last of 300 or 400 which are in the said convent, yet divinely elected, and chosen for so generous an exploit, which God has done by his hands, had often boasted (91) amongst his brethren, even after the rout of Senlis, that he saw the enemies affairs prospered, that the king should never die but by his hands, at which the rest took occasion to laugh at him, calling him, in derision, Captain Clement. But this did not make him depart from that opinion and inward motion. But, on the contrary, he confirmed himself in such a manner in the desire of executing it, that he became constant in that design, thinking only of the means, whereby he might accomplish it. In that enterprize he must resolve upon death, but what kind of death he could not guess, and he was willing to suffer the most cruel that could be invented for him, which is a constancy so admirable in a monk, that it is without example in this age. To bring the matter to an issue, he found the way to get very secretly the letters of some politicians, and concerted with them to inform the king of what was doing in the city to the advantage of his affairs. He received some words of credence from them, and obtained from the count de Brienne, prisoner in the castle of the Louvre, a passport that he might have the easier access into the enemies army. Now having all that was necessary for him, in order to go to the king, he left Paris the last day of July, to go to St Cloud, and took leave of all the other monks (92), exhorting them to put up their prayers for him, saying that he went for the service of God, to deliver the people from misery, without any hopes of returning; and he did not desire it, provided God should give him the grace not to fail in his design, of the event whereof they should hear in twenty four hours. The same day arriving at St Cloud he could not find means to get an audience of the king; he passed the night there which might have given him other counsel. The next day, being the first of August, he addressed himself to the Sieur de la Guesle, the king's attorney-general, in the court of the parliament of Paris, which he had relinquished; and acquainting him, that he was sent intrusted with letters from the king's good servants, and with some words of credence for things of great importance to the service of his majesty: he desired to be introduced by him that he might discharge his duty. The king having notice of it, commanded the monk should be brought in, and retiring into his closet, he there talked more than a quarter of an hour with him, and in the mean time, he gave him his letters one by one to the last; and the king asking him if that was all, the monk answered, I believe not, Sir, and that there must be some more behind; and putting his hand farther into his sleeve, he drew out the knife he had in it, striking the king the belly, who perceiving himself wounded, cried out, and seized the knife in the hand of the Dominican, holding it in the wound by which he hurt himself exceedingly, and with it gave the monk a blow in the face, who at the same instant received numberless stabs from those who ran in upon hearing the king cry out; and whilst he was thus massacred, it is said, that he spoke these words, I thank GOD I die so easy a death, for I did not expect to depart this life in such a manner, and to come off at such a cheap rate. His body was thrown into the open street, and was afterwards burnt, as it was reported to Mr de Mayenne. Thus the king died, the night after his wound, at two a clock in the morning. Your holiness may please to observe some of the most remarkable circumstances of that fact. It happened on the day on which the church celebrates the feast of St Peter in bonds, whom GOD miraculously delivered by his angel, from the hands of Herod, and from all the expectation of the Jews, to whom he was to have been given up; the Catholics may say, that on the same day GOD has delivered them from the hands of Heretics, and from the yoke of a prince, who designed in his heart to fill all Christendom with desolation. In what day, most holy father, could the monitory of your holiness against an impenitent king, and a despiser of the holy apostolical see, be better authorised with the power of GOD? when twenty four hours after the assassination of the duke of Guise, the said king, in cold blood, caused the cardinal, his brother, to be inhumanly massacred; it was observed, that the watch-word which he gave the murderer, was St Clement. Whilst they were committing that execrable crime, he was in his closet, making merry with his minions, and accomplices of the said murder; and GOD has permitted a monk, named Clement (93), to kill him in his closet, in the midst of a great army, which could not secure his detestable life. Impiety had so possessed him, after hypocrisy had made way for it, that he abhorred the preachers who had publicly reprov'd his vices, and for that reason he breathed nothing but ruin and revenge against them, which he protested commonly in his private discourses, wherein every one was allowed to give his opinion about the punishment that should be inflicted on them; but he has been prevented in his barbarous designs, by a poor monk of the order of the preaching friars, who has inflicted upon him the divine punishment that others had foretold him. These things, most holy father, are, in my opinion, of such consequences, as your holiness will judge worthy of consideration. Moreover it is notorious, that this is not the work of men: GOD has applied that great remedy to our miseries, by the ministry of your holiness. And it is to be hoped, that by your interposition he will effectually cure them; and to that end I shall make most humble requests and supplications to your holiness, as I am ordered to do both by the duke of Mayenne, and the aforesaid lords of the general council, whom I hope your holiness will so far please to honour as to accept of them.

This memoir, not only furnishes us with invincible proofs against those, who would deny James Clement to have committed the assassination, but also against all those who undertake to justify his brethren the Dominicans of Paris. Mr Varillas pretends to give the reasons of those wretched apologists (94), and says nothing to confute them. He displays at length all that is said in vindication of the Dominicans in general, and then he speaks thus (95): but one of them, who was Father Bernard Guyart, has printed a book to which he durst not put his name, wherein he offers to justify the order of St Dominic from the murder of Henry III. The word but, at the beginning of the period, prepares the reader for a particular apology for James Clement; no body can imagine, that Bernard Guyart designed any thing else, and yet Mr Varillas speaks only of a general justification of the order of St Dominic. Let the grammarians find fault with that historian, for placing so ill the particles that they call adverbatives; I leave that to them, and shall content myself with censuring him upon another point. The treatise intituled, La Fatalité de St Cloud, is doubt-

lets the same work, which, according to Mr Varillas, was published by Bernard Guyart: now the principal drift of that book, is to shew that James Clement did not kill Henry III. Mr Varillas is therefore very much in the wrong, not to represent that work under that idea, but under that of a general apology for the Dominicans. This fault appears to me more excusable, than that of omitting to say, that the book intitled La Fatalité de St Clou, ought not to hinder one from holding the general opinion. Mr Maimbourg has done his duty, in saying, that notwithstanding that book, we ought to believe that James Clement was guilty of the parricide, and that it is the best way, honestly to fall in with the public voice, whatever profession one may be of (96). What he adds, has not so much reason in it. Especially, says he, since the honour of the Dominicans does not suffer by it; for after all, faults are personal, and there is no man of good sense, who would lay the crime of a private person to the charge of an order so holy as that of St Dominic. This discourse has nothing of solidity; the crime of James Clement was not personal, but the whole convent of the Dominicans at Paris, were guilty of it. They knew his design (97), they did not discourage him, but approved of the execution of it. The prior of that convent was punished with death, being fully convicted by many witnesses of having made an eulogy of that assassin (98) in the pulpit: and since the city of Paris, and the preachers especially, bestowed a thousand benedictions and praises upon the monk who killed the king, and all the other cities of the kingdom, that were in the interest of the League, and even the Pope himself (99), extolled that infamous action; we may be assured, that the crime of James Clement, was the crime of the whole League, and of the court of Rome; for the authors, advisers, and approvers of an action, are reputed to be under the same predicament. This I will demonstrate in some other place (100).

[S] Whilst they leave the observations of Peter Victor Cayet unanswered.] Consider well his words (101): 'The Huguenots say, Death has carried this king from this world into the other, but (which is a notable circumstance) it happened in the very chamber where it is believed the resolution was taken for the furious massacre on St Bartholomew's day, in the year 1572. These words are to be found in the additions to the Inventaire de l'Histoire de France, made by Montliard. The book, called the History of the five Kings, printed at Geneva, assures us of the same thing, almost in the same words. And in the State of the Church, written by John Tassin a minister, are these words: It is observed, that, by the providence of GOD, this happened in the same chamber, in which, in the year 1572, that furious massacre on St Bartholomew's day was resolved upon. Those are notable circumstances, and reflexions on the providence of GOD, rashly, and I will dare to say, falsely published. For at the time of the Paris massacre, the place where the king was wounded, belonged to a citizen of Paris, named Chapelier and he possessed it above two years after, into which his majesty never entered, whilst he was duke of Anjou, nor a long time after his return from Poland. When the queen, his mother, bought it, it was after the death of king Charles, with intention to build there; but as she found that place was too strait, she gave it, in the year 1577, to the wife of the Sieur Jerom de Gondy, who pulled down the house, and new modelled it quite, having adorned it with grotto's and fountains, and put it in such a condition, that it has been since frequented by lords and princes; which it never was before: now the compiler of the aforesaid History of the five Kings, from whom Montliard and Tassin have taken what they have inserted in their books (for he wrote before them) has these words, It is said, that the consultation for the massacre was held in the same chamber, &c. Behold a hear-say, invented by the author of the aforesaid collection. This story of his own invention, was put into the Memoirs, and little Discourses printed at Geneva in the year 1569, concerning what happened at the massacre on St Bartholomew's day, where it is said, the thing was resolved upon at St Clou, and at the Tuilleries.

VOL. III.

Now we find some colour for that calumny, the author of the said Historical Collections of the said five Kings, from the king's being killed in Gondy's house, draws this conjecture, and cunningly slips in this word; it is said, that in the same chamber, &c. Montliard, who wrote after him, goes farther, and says, It is believed, &c. It is not now a meer hearsay; there are some that believe it: but Tassin the minister, who wrote after them all, is more confident, he assures us of it, and says, that it was a providence of GOD. What a lye is this? accordingly the attorney-general having made his complaint in court against Montliard, these words were struck out of his book, as were a great many others, and he himself was greatly vexed, excusing himself upon a hear-say; but his book being since reprinted at Geneva, all this was again inserted in it, and is believed amongst the people of that party (102). If the facts, which Cayet relates, about the house where Henry III, were assassinated, be true, there is no doubt but the Protestant authors whom he confutes, were much in the wrong, and that the mysterious circumstances they have taken pains to observe, are meer illusions, and the vain imaginations of credulous minds. But if they had been able to prove, that Cayet was mistaken, it had been a commendable thing in them, to reprint in the Geneva edition, what Montliard had been forced to suppress. It is certain, that according to order, and the method of an exact proceeding, the public ought to have been acquainted in the Geneva edition, why that passage was restored; that is to say, it ought to have been made out by strong proofs, that the council about the massacre, was held at St Clou, in the same chamber where the Dominican killed Henry III. My edition of the Inventaire of John de Serres, is of Rouen, 1612 (103), and contains the passage which the attorney-general caused to be suppressed. Mezerei supposes, that the reflexions of the Huguenots descended into a more mysterious enumeration of particulars. They wrote, saith he, (104) that the king was wounded at the same hour, and the same day, in the same place, and in the very chamber where he had concluded the Paris massacre. He says nothing against it, he quotes no body, and does not imitate Peter Cayet in anything. That mysterious observation is still more strongly urged in a book intitled, a Journal of the remarkable things, that happened in the reign of Henry III king of France and Poland, and which has been printed perhaps above twenty times in Holland, with three or four satirical pieces (105); the last edition, is that of 1699. The journal is more large in it, than in the edition of 1693. Now these words are found at the end of the additions (106). The farther we seek for observations and particularities, in so miraculous an accident (107), the more wonders we find in it, so that posterity that death will appear a wonder, full of innumerable wonders, amongst which this has been observed, as being most worthy of remark, and yet most true, that in the same place, the same house, the same day, and at the same hour, the king returning from his affairs, as he did when he was killed, the Paris massacre was concluded on, the late king (who then was called Monsieur) presided in the council, viz. in the town of St Clou, in Gondy's house, the first day of August 1572, in the same chamber, at the same hour, at eight of the clock in the morning, the breakfast, (which was three spits of partridge) being ready before for the conspirators of that cursed action. Note, That this addition was superfluous; for all that is considerable in it, may be seen in the same words, in the Journal of Henry III, printed in 1693 (108), and 1699, (109), and I believe it is also in the editions that went before.

If we could be sure, that this Journal, such as the Bookellers of Holland have published it, was the work of a Catholic, it would be certain, that the reflexions of the Protestants upon the circumstances of Henry the third's death, are not so strong as those of a writer of the other party. The three Protestant authors which Victor Cayet confutes, go beyond one another; the first was contented with an it is said; the second was not satisfied with an expression so weak, he said, it is believed; and the third expressed himself still more positively. This is the ordinary method in telling of news; the last relater is generally the most decisive, and fullest of circumstances. One would think that here is a sort of an auction, where people are to bid one higher than another, because the goods are adjudged to him that bids most. Be it how it will, the journalist of Henry III goes farther than the three Protestant bidders. He delivers the fact, not only as most worthy of remark, but also as most true. Father Anselme (110) ascribes that journal to Mr Servin; which agrees well enough with the initial letters which have been put in the editions of that book (111). But Mr Pellisson affirms (112), that Mr de l'Estoille, one of the forty members of the French academy, was the son of an Audienccr of Chancery at Paris, 'who had collected many memoirs of the affairs of his time, from which one of his friends, to whom he had lent them, composed the book, intituled a Journal of what happened in the reign of Henry III.' The question is, to know, whether they into whose hands the manuscript fell, before it was published, or after the first edition of it, have neither added to, cut off, nor altered any thing in it. However it be, those who depend upon that part of the journal, are obliged to answer the reasons of Peter Cayet.

HENRY IV, king of France, was one of the greatest princes mentioned in the history of these last ages, and we may say, that if the love of women had suffered him to display all his fine qualities [A] in their whole extant, he would have surpassed, or at least equalled, the heroes that are most admired. If the first time that he debauched the daughter or wife of his neighbour, he had been punished in the same manner as Peter Abelard was, he would have been capable of conquering all Europe [B], and might have [A] If the love of women had suffered him to display all his fine qualities. It cannot be said of him, as of some great commanders, who were much addicted to their pleasures (1), that he renounced them, when the exigency of his affairs required it; for he lost all the advantages of the victory of Contras to run after a mistress. Read what Mezerai says (2). 'The valour of the king of Navarre, signalized itself in that battle, more eminently, than his conduct in reaping the advantages of it; for so far was he from marching directly towards the foreign army, as the prince of Condé would have had him, promising, if he would give him troops, to go and possess himself of the passage of Saumur, that he suffered his victorious army to separate, being contented to take an oath from his officers, that they would be, on the twenty sixth of November, on the confines of Angoumois and Perigord, in order to march towards the Reisters. He only kept 500 horse, and taking the count de Soissons along with him, forced his way into Gascogne, whether the violent love he had for the beautiful countess de Guiche, drew him as it were by force (3).' One of the greatest affairs that Henry IV had ever upon his hands, was doubtless the siege of Amiens; and yet he took the fair Gabrielle along with him thither, and lodged her close by him; and would have kept her, during that difficult expedition, had he had his own devils: but he was quickly obliged to remove that scandal from his soldiers' eyes, not only because of their murmurs, that reached his ears, but also by reason of the reproaches of the marshal de Biron (4).

What I have said at the beginning of this remark, that there have been great commanders, who, though much addicted to their pleasures, knew how to quit them when there was occasion, is not unknown to those who know the characters of Alcibiades and Sylla. See what Sallust saith of the latter. 'Sulla . . . animo ingenti, cupidus voluptatum, sed gloriæ cupidior, otio luxurioso esse, tamen ab negotiis nunquam voluptas remota (5). — Sylla . . . bad a great soul, he loved his pleasures, but loved glory still more, his leisure hours were spent luxuriously, but his pleasures never interrupted his affairs.' See what is said of Alcibiades. 'Quum tempus potest, laboriosus, (Alcibiades) patiens, liberalis, splendidus non minus in vita, quam victu: affabilis, blandus, temporibus callidissime inserviens. Idem simul ac se remiserat, nec causa fuberat, quare animi laborem perferret, luxuriosus, dissolutus, libidinosus, intemperans reperiebatur, ut omnes admirarentur in uno homine tantam inesse dissimilitudinem, tamque diversam naturam (6). — Upon occasion he (Alcibiades) was laborious, patient, liberal, splendid both in his equipage and table: affable, courteous, and could, in the most artful manner, accommodate himself to all circumstances. But when once he had unbent his mind, and his affairs laid him under no obligation to fatigue, he was luxurious, dissolute, lewd, and intemperate; so that all men admired to see in the same person such different manners, and contrary characters.'

[B] If he had been punished in the same manner as Peter Abelard was, he would have been capable of conquering all Europe. On the contrary, you will say, he would have grown a sluggard and a coward; for the same spirits that inclined him to the love of women, made him valiant, and we have seen few great captains who have not been lascivious. I answer, that though it be certain, that many great generals have been of a very amorous complexion, yet it does not follow, that their courage and lust flowed from the same principle in their constitution. Each of those two qualities had its cause, and all that can be said is, that these two causes concurred in forming the constitutions of these men. But it is easy to prove, that there is no connexion between those two qualities. How many cowards are there, more timorous than hares (7), that have a prodigious vigour in the acts of Venus? Was there ever a man more brave and undaunted than the marshal de Gassion, who had a mortal hatred to women (8)? The count de Tilly, who lived chaste all his life-time (9), was one of the greatest commanders of the XVIIth century. Did not Mr de Turenne, though no debauchee, match those thunder-bolts of war, who lived at the same time with him, and whose lewdness made almost as much noise as their triumphs? And to give a still stronger proof, do not we know, that the brave Sigismund Bathori, prince of Transylvania, surnamed the Invincible (10), for his great exploits, was as great a poltroon in the wars of Venus, as he was brave in those of Mars, and that having confessed his impotence (11), his marriage with Mary Christina, daughter of Charles archduke of Grats, was declared null: Some eunuchs have been very brave generals of armies; for not to go so high as the famous Narles, who lived under the empire of Justin II, in the VIth century, do not we know, that one of the most valiant generals of Solymann, was an eunuch (12). He was not fortunate, I confess, in the expedition of Hungary, in the year 1556, and he died with vexation, for not having maintained his reputation, nor answered the public expectation (13): but for all that, he had a great soul, and his mortal chagrin was a proof of it. See Thuanus, who tells a pleasant humour of that eunuch, when a piece of ill news was brought him, it was the taking of Gran. A great matter indeed, answered he to the messenger, that is a small thing; behold here my great loss, shewing him the lower region of his belly. Ejus rei cum trepidus nuncius ad eum venisset, ipsa vultus conformatione magnum aliquod malum professus, purpuratus non sine circumstantium risu conformationi nuntii illudens, & Strigoni, quod nullo negotio recuperari posset, amissionem elevans; his verbis eum excepisse dicitur. Quam tu mihi cladem ingentem, fatue, quod tantum incommodum narras? ea demum mihi clades deploranda contigit, cum hinc (genitalium sedem ostentans) ea membra adempta sunt, quibus vir eram (§a) (14). Let us conclude from all this, that if Henry IV had been treated as Abelard was, he would have lost nothing, either of his courage, prudence, or wit. Origen, Photius, and Abelard, are a manifest proof, that the loss of the masculine organs doth not in the least prejudice the natural talents of the soul.

have eclipsed the glory of the Alexanders and the Cæsars. In vain it would be objected to me, that such a punishment would have taken away his courage [C]. It was his prodigious incontinence [D], that hindered him from raising himself to that pitch of grandeur that he might have done; but notwithstanding that powerful obstacle, he has justly deserved the surname which he bears (a). To convince us of this, we need only consider the astonishing difficulties he surmounted, before he was settled on the throne; and the flourishing condition to which he restored his kingdom, which he had found in the most dismal desolation that can be imagined. He inherited that crown

[C] It would be in vain to object to me, that such a punishment would have taken away his courage. You will find, in the preceding remark, the commentary, or proof, that this may require. However, I will add, by way of Appendix, the following observations. Was not Hannibal one of the greatest generals of antiquity, a chaste man? Constat Annibalem . . . pudicitiam tantam inter tot captivas habuisse, ut in Africa natum quivis negaret (15). — It is certain that Hannibal . . . behaved with so much chastity towards his female captives, that no body would have thought him an African. We do not find, that Scipio Africanus was of a very amorous constitution, and he gave a notable example of his chastity, during his expedition in Spain; for which he is extremely praised by historians (16). Drusus, the brother of the emperor Tiberius, and one of the greatest commanders among the ancients, was extremely reserved in respect to women (17). The bravery of the emperor Aurelian was incomparable, and yet attended with the greatest chastity. We should injure him, should we make the least comparison betwixt his bravery, and that of the lascivious Proculus, who set up for a tyrant; a letter of whom Flavius Vopiscus has preserved to us, which I shall only insert in Latin. Tacendum non est, quod & ipse gloriatur in quadam sua epistola, quam ipsam melius est ponere quam de ea plurimum dicere. Proculus Metiano affini S. D. Centum ex Sarmatia virgines cepi. Ex his una nocte decem involi: omnes tamen quod in me erat, mulieres intra dies xv. reddidi. Gloriatur (ut vides) rem ineptam & satis libidinosam; atque inter fortis se haberi credit si criminum densitate coalescat. Hic tamen quum etiam post honores militares se improbe & libidinoso, tamen fortiter ageret . . . in imperium vocitatus esset (18). You see by this, that he was owned to be a good soldier, but allow me to say that his valour came not near to that of Aurelian. What shall we say of Alexander, whose courage was extraordinary? More praises have been bestowed upon his chastity, than he deserved; yet it must be confessed, that by his constitution he had more indifference than inclination for the fair sex; and this is sufficient to confute those who imagine I know not what mechanical connexion betwixt lust and valour. To the modern examples already alledged (19), I add one of a brave man, who lived in the XVth century, and who gained the title of the fearless and blameless knight. It will be easily understood by this, that I mean Bayard. Love never was his master, but he showed that he was master of it on some dangerous occasions. See his life. What a catalogue might I not give, if I should reckon up all that have resembled Sardanapalus; men that were valiant in bed only, but cowards and poltroons every where else? Were Caligula, Nero, and Helioabalus, great warriors? Did not they with the most infamous excesses, plunge themselves into the leudest debaucheries? Was ever Domitian, who was the author of a new name (20) for these base exercises, wherein he signalized his strength, reckoned a good soldier, or a good commander? Those sparks that were called formerly Mignons de Couchette, did sometimes pretend to make a campaign, in order to avoid the contempt to which the suspicion of cowardice exposed them among the brave; but they acquitted themselves so ill, that we may apply to them with a great deal of reason, what Jupiter answered Venus, when she complained to him of the wound she had received in assisting her son Æneas in a battle. Do not you pretend to war, which is not your province; your business is love.

Helen gives Paris the like advice, as I have observed, in another place, where I confute Mezerai (22). That historian fancies, that the ladies love brave men, because they suppose them no less vigorous in the exercise of love, than in war. He does not judge rightly of their motives; glory or vanity are the great springs of their prepossession in behalf of the brave. Monluc observes, that women would rather chuse to be widows, than see their husbands return from the army in good health, but loaded with shame and dishonour. It is plain, that lust has no share in that, and since this is a new proof against Mezerai, I shall here insert Monluc's words. He speaks to the governors of a place, and shews the prejudice they will do themselves, if they do not defend it well. 'Not only your master, continues he (23), and princes and lords, will look upon you with an evil eye, but also women and children. Nay, to go farther, even your own wife, though she pretends to love you, will hate you, and esteem you less in her heart. For it is the nature of all women to hate mortally cowards and poltroons, though they be never so sprucely dressed. And they love the bold and courageous, though they be never so ugly and deformed. They share in your disgrace; and though they are in your arms a-bed, pretending to be pleased with your return; they had rather you had been strangled, or that a bullet had taken you off. For as we think, that the greatest shame of a man is to have a whore to his wife; so the women think, that their greatest shame is to have cowards for their husbands. See then how you will come off, Mr Governour, if you lose your fort, since you will be cursed in your own bed for it.'

[D] His prodigious incontinence. I may well call it so, after the stories d'Aubigné has published of him, especially after these words of a very grave historian. 'If it was the business of history to make apologies, it might justify him from the greatest part of these reproaches, but not however for his boundless passion for gaming . . . much less could it excuse him for his leudness with women, which was so public and universal, from his youth to his last days, that we can hardly give it the name of love and gallantry (24).' In what follows Mr de Perefex tells us something that is very strange. 'It were to be wished, for the honour of his memory, that gaming had been his only vice. But his continual weakness on the score of the fair sex was another, much more blamable in a Christian prince, in a man of his age, who was married, and whom God had so highly favoured, and who meditated so great enterprises in his mind. Sometimes he had desires that were transient, and which enslaved him but for a night; but when he met with beauties that struck him to the heart, he loved them even to extravagance, and in those transports, he appeared to be nothing less than Henry the Great. We are told, that Hercules took a distaff and spun, to please his fair Omphale; Henry did something meaner for his mistresses. He dressed himself one day in the habit of a peasant, and carried a burthen of straw upon his shoulders, to get access by that means to Madam Gabrielle; and it is said the marchioness of Verneuil has seen him more than once at her feet, suffering her disdain and insults (25). It must have been a cruel mortification to the good Huguenots, to see their Chief lead so scandalous a life, even in Rochelle. He debauched there the daughter of a gentleman of the long robe, and had a son by her. The church had often remonstrated his sin to him, which he confessed very ingenuously; but he could in a very remote degree of kindred [E]. We should probably have known, and admired his merit more if he had lived five or six years longer than he did; for he was just upon the point of entering upon the execution of a prodigious design (b), when he was assassinated in his coach the fourteenth of May, 1610, by Ravaillac. Some historians say, that this was foretold him the day before [F]; but those who have examined the matter to the bottom, have found it to be false. He was of so noble a disposition that it is not at all probable that he ever advised the duke of Alençon to make away with Catherine de Medicis [G]; yet some memoirs affirm it. He had the usual fate of great men, could not be persuaded to make a public acknowledgment of it, till a little before the battle of Coutras (26). You will find the circumstances of this, in the life of Mr du Pleissis Mornai (27).

[E] He inherited the crown in a very remote degree of kindred. It was doubtless an uncommon good fortune, that the crown of France devolved to him; there was never a more remote succession in any hereditary state than this: for there were betwixt ten and eleven degrees of distance betwixt Henry III and him, and when he was born, there were nine princes of the blood before him; namely, king Henry II, and his five sons; Antony, king of Navarre his father, and his two sons, who were elder brothers to our Henry. All these princes died to make way for him to the crown (28).

[F] Some historians say, that this was foretold him the day before. We will begin this remark with the words of Peter Matthieu (29). 'Hereupon la Brosse, a learned Physician and Mathematician, said to the duke of Vendôme, by way of conclusion to a long conversation, that if the king could avoid an accident wherewith he was threatened, he would live thirty years longer. No body is willing to tell kings any thing that may displease them: the duke of Vendôme thinking it more proper that la Brosse should be the messenger of his advice, besought the king to hear him: the king asked him what he would have? Upon that the duke of Vendôme was silent, his silence encreasing the king's desire to know it, he pressed him, the other excused himself; at last, the king's command drew from him what la Brosse had told him. You are a fool, says the king, you believe him? Sir, answered the duke of Vendôme, in these cases, credulity is a fault, but not fear? the safety of your majesty obliges every body, and me more than all the rest, to make light of nothing: I most humbly beseech you to be pleased to hear him. The king refused it, and forbade him to speak of it: I cannot, at least, says the duke, but tell the queen of it. The king replied to him twice, that if he mentioned it, he would never love him. And so la Brosse was sent away. I have this conversation word for word from the duke of Vendôme.' This is very positive; but here follows something that is no less so, which yet entirely overthrows this narrative of Peter Matthieu. 'So true it is, it is a philosopher who speaks (30), that most historians are credulous and liars, and that thereby they always confirm people in the belief of prognostications, when they report these stories without confuting them. But without going farther, why should not the ancients have done it, since we often see it practised in our own time? Has not one of our historians, speaking of the death of our Henry the Great, said, that being warned of it by a prince that is yet alive, (whom it is not necessary to name) the day before that unfortunate stroke was given, his majesty slighting the information, answered him, that la Brosse was an old fool of an astrologer, &c. I being desirous to learn this from the mouth of that prince himself † above thirty years ago, in the presence of a prince ‡ of great worth, he did me the honour to tell me, that it was false. And within these two days, only to be farther informed of it, and that I might publish nothing of that consequence without being very sure it, I had the honour to speak to him about it again in the presence of several persons of his family, and he confirmed the same thing to me, adding besides, that the historian † had confounded both the times and the things; and that la Brosse had indeed told him, after that fatal accident, that he had foreseen it by his majesty's horoscope, (as astrologers always do when things are come to pass) but that he had not given him notice of it the day before to acquaint his majesty with it. This however is written by a French author, who lived at the same time; who will not believe him then in after times? Will any one think, that a man appointed and paid for writing history, durst say a thing of this consequence, and even cite a prince then living who could witness it, if it were not true? And yet it is as I say. If any one doubts of it, he may inform himself about it, and I am not sorry that I have an occasion here to mention it, as well to undeceive posterity, as to shew, that there are a great many things of this nature written, which deserve no sort of credit. Observe, that Mr Petit doth not relate this altogether so faithfully as he should have done. He supposes that the historian makes the king give this answer, La Brosse is an old fool of an astrologer; but the historian doth not say so; for according to him, it was to the duke of Vendôme that the king said, You are a fool.

Let us produce a second witness, with the confutation of what he says. 'The evening of the same coronation, la Brosse, an excellent Physician and Mathematician, said to the duke of Vendôme, that if the king could avoid a dangerous accident, which threatened him, near at hand, he would live thirty years longer, and desired him to procure him an audience of his majesty: But the king understanding what he designed to talk to him about, would neither see nor hear la Brosse (31). The confutation of this is contained in the words of marshal Bassompierre (32). It is false that la Brosse desired to speak with the king; but if he had done it, the answer that he (33) has invented had been true, that he (34) would have scorned to speak with him, for he looked upon him as a fool. We find in a discourse upon the death of Henry IV, printed at the end of the Memoirs of the duke of Nevers, that the duke of Vendôme told several persons, that la Brosse did not speak to him about it.

[G] It is not at all probable that he ever advised the duke of Alençon to make away with Catherine de Medicis. Mr le Laboureur relates, that this queen, seeing Charles IX near his end, was afraid lest the duke of Alençon should be advised to pretend to the regency, and even to the crown, to the prejudice of his brother the king of Poland. She contrived upon this a pretended conspiracy, which might give her occasion to secure his person, as also that of the king of Navarre: She kept them under a good guard in the wood of Vincennes, till the king's death, tho' without declaring them prisoners; in the mean time, she spread abroad the report of that conspiracy, for which she caused the marshals of Montmorenci and Cossé to be arrested, and, in order to remove all occasions of doubting of it, she sacrificed to this state-intrigue, two favourites of the duke la Molle and Coconnaz. . . the duke of Alençon himself betrayed his cause, and his domestics, in the fear he was in; and he who kept up best to the character of a king oppressed, but incapable of doing any thing below his dignity, was Henry IV, then king of Navarre. Not but that he feared he was undone, and it was with that design, as I have learnt from some memoirs, that he was accused of having advised Monsieur to pretend to be sick, to oblige the queen to come and see him, and under pretence of having both something to say to her in private, to cause her retinue to withdraw, and then to strangle her. His reasons for it were, their own safety, the opportunity of the king's death, who was ready to expire, the credit that time would give to their friends, and that the same policy which made her renounce the laws of nature, to destroy her own son, and her son-in-law, dispensed them, upon a stronger motive than that of reigning, from abhorring an action, which would preserve to the state two princes that were necessary men, which was to be unfortunate in his family. The two wives whom he successively married, the latter, in the former's lifetime, gave him a thousand vexations [H]. He deserved it, since he had so little regard to the sacred laws of marriage. His second wife was one of those princesses against whom he had raised objections in examining, with Roni, what sort of a wife was proper for him (c). His notions about marriage are very curious [I], and there are few conversations more solid and more pleasant than that which he had upon that subject. It plainly appeared, that religion was only a false pretence of the League, and of the king of Spain; this, I say, plainly appeared, from the endeavours that were used to hinder the Pope from giving him absolution.

' necessary to it, by the death of a woman who disturbed the peace, and caused the ruin of it. He had neither the courage to do it, nor the discretion to conceal it some time after, which was the reason of the mortal and implacable hatred of Catherine de Medicis, against the king of Navarre; and therefore she did not scruple to have a hand in the conspiracy against her own son Henry III, and to embroil the state, when she saw that he had no children, that she might hinder Henry IV from succeeding him, and substitute, in his room, Henry duke of Lorraine her grand-son by her daughter (35). According to these memoirs, Henry IV designed to be one of the murderers of the queen-mother.'

[H] His two wives . . . gave him a thousand vexations. There is no need of proving this with relation to Margaret de Valois. I will therefore only alledge the proof relating to Mary de Medicis. The high esteem and affection the French had for him (36), prevented their being so much offended with his scandalous way of living; but the queen, his wife, was extremely vexed at it, which occasioned daily disputes betwixt them, and made her disdainful and ill humoured. The discontent and uneasiness of these domestic quarrels, no doubt retarded the execution of the great design he had formed for the good and perpetual repose of Christendom, and afterwards for the destruction of the Ottoman power (37).

[I] His notions about marriage are very curious. I have a very long passage to quote, which yet I am confident will seem short to curious readers; for it contains a kind of a criticism upon many princesses and a very solid reasoning of Henry IV, about the choice of a wife. Here follows what he said to Monsieur de Roni, his favourite (38). So that nothing more seems wanting to the accomplishment of this design, but to see whether I can get another wife so well qualified, that I may not be exposed to the greatest misfortune of this life, which is (in my opinion) to have an ugly, ill-humoured, and quarrelsome wife, instead of that ease, repose, and satisfaction, I should propose to my self in that condition: if a wife could be had according to one's wishes, that I might have no cause to repent of so hazardous a bargain, mine should be endowed, amongst other good qualities, which these seven principal ones; namely, beauty in her person, chastity in her life, complaisance in her humour, ingenuity of mind, fruitfulness of body, eminence of birth, and great estate in possession. But I believe, my friend, that this woman is dead, or rather she is not yet born, nor ready to be born, and therefore, let us consider a little, what maids or women, which we have heard of, would be fit for me, either within or without the kingdom. And so far as I have, in my opinion, thought of it more than you, I will tell you briefly, that I could content my self with the Infanta of Spain, as old and ugly as she is, provided I could marry with her the Low-Countries, tho' it should be upon condition of restoring to you the county of Bethune; neither would I refuse the princess Reibelle (39) of England, if, as they say, that the crown is justly hers, she was only declared presumptive heiress of the kingdom; but I must not expect either the one or the other, for the king of Spain and the queen of England are very far from having such a design. Sometimes I have heard mentioned some princesses of Germany, whose names I do not remember; but the women of that country would never agree with me; and I should believe, if I had married one of them, that I must always have a barrel of wine by my bed-side; besides, I have heard there was once a queen of France of that nation, who almost ruined the kingdom. So that all these considerations disgust me. Some have also spoke to me of one of the sisters of prince Maurice, but besides that they are all Huguenots, and that such a match might make me suspected at Rome, and amongst the zealous Catholics, that their mother was a nun, and something else, which I will tell you another time, makes me averse to it. The duke of Florence has a niece, who they say is pretty handsome; but he being of one of the least families of Christendom, that bears the name of a prince, it being but sixty or eighty years since his predecessors were ranked only amongst the most illustrious citizens of Florence, and being of the same race with Catherine the queen-mother, who has been the cause of so much misery to France, and still more to me in particular, I am apprehensive of such a match, least it should prove as prejudicial to me, my friends, and my kingdom. There are all the foreign women which I think I have heard of. As to those within the kingdom, my niece of Guise is one of those that would please me best, notwithstanding the report that some malicious people have spread, that she is a little wanton; for as to my own humour, besides that I believe it to be false, I had rather have a wife given to gallantry, than one that should prove ill-humoured; of which she is not suspected: On the contrary, she is of a very sweet and agreeable humour, and of a complaisant conversation, and likewise of a good family, handsome, tall, and likely to have fine children soon. I fear only the too great passion she expresses for her family, especially for her brothers, which might possess her with desires of raising them to my prejudice, and more still to that of my children, if ever the regency of the state should fall into her hands. There are also two daughters of the house of Mayne, the eldest of which, as swarthy as she is, would not displease me, being modest and well educated; but they are too young. There are also two in the family of Aumalle, and three in that of Longueville, which are not contemptible for their persons, but other reasons hinder me from thinking of them. So much for princesses. You have besides a daughter of the house of Luxemburg, one of the house Guiméné, and my cousin Catherine of Rohan; but she is a Huguenot, and the others do not please me; and then the daughter of my cousin the prince of Conchy, of the house of Lucé, who is a very fine young lady, and well bred, and who would please me best of any, if she was somewhat older. But tho' they should all please me, as far as I can know them, who can assure me, that I shall meet with the three principal qualities which I desire in a woman, and without which I would not marry; namely, that I shall have male children by them, that they shall be of a sweet and complaisant humour, and sufficiently qualified to help me in sedentary affairs, and to govern my kingdom and my children well, if I should happen to die before they come to age, sense, and judgment, to endeavour to imitate me: as this is like to happen, if I marry at so advanced age. But pray (answered you) may it please your majesty, what do you mean by so many affirmatives and negatives, from which I can conclude only, that you are desirous to be married, but that there are no women to be found upon earth that are fit for you? At this rate we should implore the assistance of heaven to make young again the queen of England, and raise from the dead Margaret of Flanders, Mademoiselle de Bourgogne, Jane la Loca, Anne of Bretagne, and Mary Stuart, all rich heiresses, that you might take your choice of them. For according to the humour that you have expressed, speaking of Clara Eugenia, you would likewise of those ladies who possessed so great estates: but laying aside all these impossibilities and vain imaginations, let us consider a little what is to be done, &c.

(d) In the article solution. I have related in another place (d) the pleasantries of d'Aubigné, about the strokes of a switch, which the proxies of that prince received, when he was absolved at Rome. I will say something of it again, in this place [K].

(e) Perefice, Hist. de Henri le Grand, pag. m. 15. Henry IV was born at Pau in Bern, the thirteenth of December, 1553 (e). Antony de Bourbon, his father, and Jane d'Albret, his mother, brought him to the court of France when he was five years old; but they stayed there but a few months, and returned to Bern (f).

(f) Ibid. pag. 20. Antony came again to court after the death of Henry II. He was declared lieutenant-general of the kingdom after Francis the second's death. He ordered the queen, his wife, and the prince, his son, to come to him. He died of a wound which he received at the siege of Roüen in the year 1562, and then his wife, whom he had used pretty harshly [L], returned to Bern, where she openly professed Calvinism (g).

(g) Ibid. pag. 22. She left her son at the court of France, under the conduct of a prudent tutor, named la Gaucherie. She sent for him to Pau in the year 1566, and put Florent Chrestien in the room of la Gaucherie deceased (h).

(h) Ibid. pag. 23. This new preceptor, a good Huguenot, brought up the prince in the Protestant religion: Jane d'Albret declared herself their protectress in the year 1569, and came with that intent to Rochelle with her son, whom she from that time devoted to the defence of this new religion. In that quality he was declared chief of the party, and his uncle the prince of Condé his lieutenant, with admiral Coligny (i).

(i) Ibid. pag. 24. He was in the army at the battle of Moncontour, and was eager to be in the action, but he was not suffered, for fear of hazarding his person (k).

(k) Ibid. pag. 25. He followed the army from that time to the peace which was concluded the eleventh of August, 1570, and then he returned to Bern. His marriage with princess Margaret, sister to Charles IX, was celebrated at Paris in August 1572. His mother arrived there some months before, to make preparations for the wedding, and died there as her son was on the road thither. He took upon him the title of king, when he received in Poictou the news of her death (l).

(l) Ibid. pag. 26. All the world knows, that the massacre on St Bartholomew's day, was committed a few days after the wedding of this new king; and that this prince seeing himself reduced to choose to die, or to go to mass, chose the latter. The answers that some authors ascribe to him, are only fancies of their own brain [M], and only testify their desire of employing

(40) Jeremie de Pours, Divine Melodie du Psalmiste, pag. 686. [K] I will again say something of the strokes of a switch. I will make use of the words of a Walloon minister (40). The psalm Miserere was sung at the reconciliation of Henry the Great, where du Perron and d'Ossat prostrated all along on their faces, representing the king of France, in the presence of the Pope, and the Consistory, received in the king's stead his penance decreed by the Holy See, which was to adjust to every verse, a stroke of a switch, over head, shoulders, and back, down to the feet, from the beginning of the Psalm to the end. Du Perron in his letters, fol. 172. shows the verbal process of the absolution of the king by Pope Clement VIII. . . . d'Ossat, his companion, in the royal penance, shows how gentle it was. In the instruction of the Inquisition, there was this hyperbolical expression (41), when the choristers sung miserere mei, the Pope at every verse, verberabat & percutiebat humeros procuratorum cuiuslibet ipsorum virga, quam in manibus tenebat. — Beat and smote the shoulders of the proxies, with a rod which he held in his hand. It was a ceremony we no more felt, than we could have felt a fly creeping upon our cloaths.

[L] Jane d'Albret whom her husband had used pretty harshly. The lure made use of to bring him off from the new religion, was the promise of the kingdom of Sardinia. He was so simple as to believe these promises; and he began by degrees to withdraw from the Protestants, and to vex the queen, all sorts of snares being laid for him, by which a man given, as he was, to women, might be surprised; so by little and little, forgetting every thing else, he had nothing in his head but Sardinia, and women, amongst which, a maid of honour to the queen began to have a great share of his affection. Mean time, the queen of Navarre, as a most wise and virtuous princess, endeavoured to reclaim him, enduring all that was possible, and remonstrating to him what he owed both to GOD and his people. But all was in vain, he was so bewitched. Which the queen seeing, she had only recourse to her prayers and tears, moving compassion in every one but the said king her husband. The queen-mother, during these transactions, endeavoured to persuade her to bear with the king her husband: To whom she gave this final answer; that if the kingdom and her son were in her hands, she would throw them both to the bottom of the sea, that they might be no impediment to her, rather than ever go to mass, which was the reason they troubled her no more upon that subject (42).

[M] The answers some authors ascribe to him, are only fancies of their own brain. During the massacre,

Charles IX sent for the king of Navarre, and the prince of Condé, into his closet, and declared to them, if they did not renounce their Heresy, they should be treated as the admiral. The king of Navarre extremely astonished at these words, pronounced with a menacing voice, and at the dreadful spectacle he had seen before his eyes, answered with great humility and trembling; that he begged of his majesty to leave them their life and conscience undisturbed, and that in all other things they were ready to obey him (43). Tho' I make use of these words of Mezerai, yet we may Hist. de France, Tom. III, pag. 257. be assured it is the same thing as if I had used the very words of a Calvinist historian; for d'Aubigné (44) relates the answer of the king of Navarre in the same manner: it runs thus in the Inventaire of John de Serres; Tom. II, livr. i. 'The king of Navarre beseeches his majesty, to remember his promise, and the consanguinity so lately contracted, and not to do him any violence on account of the religion, which he hath learned from his youth' (45). The author of the Historie of the Memorable Things, says no more than that: nor is the author of the Invent. de l'Hist. de France, commentary de Statu Religionis & Republicæ in regno Galliarum more prolix, as to the sense, tho' he uses more words (46); and note, that he expressly observes, that the answer was made with a trembling voice (47). Thus you see four Protestant writers, who agree with Mezerai; which shews, that his sincerity cannot be questioned. Which being so, ought we not to laugh at the historian, who lengthens out the answer we are mo & confuted, speaking of for three or four pages? 'Our Henry, says he (48), made an answer, which shewed from that time what the height of his courage, the depth of his sense, and the great sweetness of his clemency, should be. He beseeched his majesty to remember his word that he had given him, the nearness of their blood, and their new alliance, and not to offer any violence to the religion which he had sucked in from his childhood, with his nurse's milk. He said, that it was a great misfortune that so great a king, who had in his soul the seeds of all great virtues, should be so perniciously counselled to force his subjects by murders and massacres, to serve God according to his own fancy. That there was nothing that could subdue a courageous people, and particularly the French, but the lenity of their prince, whom they reverence as a God. That this was the method Flaminius took to make the Romans masters of all Greece: so that though he had the superior force in the city of Thebes, yet he used as much persuasion to gain the people, as an orator would ploying their reading. He was obliged against his will to stay some years at the court of France: He knew very well how to dissemble his chagrin, and he often drove it away, by the help of some gallantry, which his own constitution, and the corruption of the ladies made very easy to him. The lady de Sauves, married to one of the secretaries of state, was one of his chief mistresses (m). But he was not so taken up with love, as altogether to neglect political intrigues. He had a hand in those that were formed to take away the government from the queen-mother, and to expel the Guises from court (n). That queen discovering these practices (o), caused him, and the duke of Alençon to be arrested, set guards upon them, and ordered them to be examined, upon many beinous allegations (p) [N]. These two princes were set at liberty by Henry III, before whom Catherine de Medicis carried them as far as Pont Beauvoisin (q). The king of Navarre at last made his escape in the year 1576, and retired to Alençon (r). He sided again with the Huguenots, and again professed his first religion (s). The Rochellers received him into their town, and after he had staid with them some months, he went to take possession of his government of Guienne (t). From that time to the year 1589, his life was a mixture of battles, negotiations, and love-intrigues. His wife was a great impediment to him, and yet she proved sometimes useful to him [O]. There were frequent ruptures and pacifications betwixt him and the court of France; but at last Henry III confederated with him sincerely, and in good earnest, to resist the League, which was more furious than ever since the death of the duke of Guise and of the cardinal, his brother. The reconciliation and confederacy of these two kings, was concluded in April 1589. Their interview was at Tours, the thirtieth of the same month, attended with great demonstrations of mutual satisfaction. They joined their troops some time after, to lay siege to Paris. They besieged it in person, and were upon the point of subduing that great city, and chastising it as it deserved, when the king of France was killed by James Clement at the village of St Clou. The king of Navarre succeeded him the second of August, 1589, but it was not without very great difficulties, and without renouncing the Protestant religion, that he forced the Leaguers to acknowledge his title. The city of Paris persisted in it's revolt till the twenty second of March 1594. I mean the king did not make his entry into it till that day. He declared war against the Spaniards the following year, and had not much reason to be pleased with it. He lost much more than he got by it, but by good fortune, unknown to all his predecessors, he made a treaty of peace, wherein he indemnified himself for his losses [P]. This treaty would have done from his rostrum, and that he ought to know, that he commanded a people that could neither bear an entire liberty, nor a perfect slavery: and that the royal authority was not a sovereignty over slaves, but a government of fellow-citizens. That he had often heard that the Romans had commanded all nations, and made themselves lords of the world, to show that they were governed by reason, and did not give themselves up to revenge (49) . . . Your majesty knows, that one example of the Roman humanity was of greater effect to subdue the Persians, who were foreigners, than all their military power. What might not therefore your majesty's gentleness have done with respect to the Protestants your natural subjects? A great king, as you are, should not do all that he can do; but imitate the sun, who proceeds more gently, the higher he is raised (50) . . . They who have given you so ill advice, are more to blame than you; and deserve an equal punishment with those that poison the public fountains, causing as many to die as drink of them. I have omitted the greatest part of what this compiler of common places has put in the king of Navarre's mouth; but I shall take nothing from the reply which he falsely ascribes to Charles IX. These, said the king, are the fine things you have learned of Chrestien, your tutor. But I know a finer one than any of them, which is, that God has given the supreme command to the prince, the springs of which it is not lawful for a subject to meddle with: the glory of obedience is only his. Go and do as I command you upon pain of death. And though I am not bound to give any account of my actions, yet I am willing to let you know, that every great example seems to have something of injustice in it, which is compensated by the public good (51). Note, that he supposes, the king sent for the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé separately; the other historians relate that Charles IX sent for these two princes at the same time.

[N] The queen-mother ordered him and the duke of Alençon to be examined on many beinous allegations. (52) The chancellor went about to examine the king of Navarre; but though he was threatened, and a prisoner, he would not do so much injury to his dignity, as to answer him. However, to satisfy the queen-mother, he made a long discourse, addressing himself to her, in which he gave a deduction of many things concerning the present posture of affairs; but he accused no body at all, as the duke of Alençon had weakly done (53).

[O] His wife was a great impediment to him, and yet she proved sometimes useful. Catherine de Medicis had brought her to him in the year 1578 (54). He kept his little court then at Nerac (55). Neither the husband nor the wife were pleased with seeing one another. (56) Margaret, who was fond of the great splendor of the court of France, where she swam, it we may so speak, in a full current of intrigues, thought that living in Guienne was a banishment to her; and Henry knowing her humour, and her conduct, wished her rather at a distance, than at home. Nevertheless, being sensible that it was an evil that could not be avoided, he resolved to suffer her, and left her at perfect liberty . . . (57) and accommodating himself to the times, and the necessity of his affairs, he endeavoured to draw some advantages from her intrigues and interest. He obtained a considerable one by her means, at the conference that he and the deputies of the Huguenots had at Nerac with the queen-mother. For whilst she hoped to enchant them by the charms of the handsome young ladies she had with her, and by the eloquence of Pibrac; Margaret played the same artifices against her, gained the gentlemen of her mother's retinue, by the charms of her own women, and employed so dexterously her own, that she captivated the soul and the heart of poor Pibrac; so that he was altogether acted by her spirit, and did every thing contrary to the queen-mother's intention, who not suspecting that so wise a man could be capable of such a folly, was deceived in many articles, and insensibly led to grant much more to the Huguenots, than she had resolved to do.

[P] By a good fortune, unknown to his predecessors, he made a treaty of peace, wherein he indemnified himself for his losses. Bodin (58) observes, that for 100 years the Spaniards had made no treaty with France, without having the better of it. He had reason for what he said; Henry IV was the first king of France who gained treaty was concluded at Vervins, the second of May 1598. From that time, till his death, the kingdom was free from civil and foreign wars, excepting the expedition in the year 1600. It was undertaken against the duke of Savoy, and lasted but a little while, and was followed by an advantageous treaty (u), as it had been attended with glorious actions. If the valour and great courage of this king had not shewn themselves on a hundred occasions, the wonderful generosity he exercised towards his most mortal enemies, had been looked upon as a weakness, and an effect of fear; but since he could not be suspected of cowardice, there is great reason to believe, that he treated them so out of a noble and generous clemency. And it is certain, that even the most refined policy required it of him, his enemies not being to be reconciled to him any other way: nay, even he found that way defective, for he gained but a part of the Leaguers: a great many priests obstinately refused to pray for him [Q]. It is observed in Moreri's Dictionary, that more than fifty Historians, and five hundred Panegyrist, Poets, gained any thing by making peace with Spain. He recovered all the places he had lost in Picardy; and also Blavet, which the Spaniards were masters of. That peace did not escape the censure of the critics. Some blamed the king of Spain, and others, the king of France. I will cite Mr de Perfixe. 'Many among the French, who were not well acquainted with the miserable condition, the king of Spain and his affairs were in, could not apprehend how that prince could purchase peace so dear, as to give up six or seven good places, amongst others, Calais and Blavet, which might be called the keys of France. The Spaniards, on the contrary, who saw that their king was in a dying condition, his treasury exhausted, the Low-Countries tottering, Portugal, and his territories in Italy ready to revolt, the son that was to succeed him, a good prince indeed, but who loved a quiet life, were astonished that the French, who had so bravely retaken Amiens, and re-united all their forces after the treaty of the duke of Mercœur, had not made an irruption into the Low-Countries, because in all probability they would have conquered the whole country, or at least part of it. The king answered, that if he had desired peace, it was not because he was tired out with the inconveniences of war, but to afford Christendom a breathing-time; that he knew very well, that in the present conjuncture of affairs, he might have reaped great advantages; but that the hand of God frequently overturns princes, in the height of their prosperity, and that a wise man ought never, out of an opinion of some favourable event, to be averse to a good peace, nor trust too much to the appearance of a present good fortune, which may be changed by a thousand unforeseen accidents; it often happening, that a man overthrown, and wounded, has killed him, who would make him beg his life of him (59).' This answer of Henry IV does not agree with what is reported by others, that he told the duke of Epemnon, who was present at the signing of the treaty of peace, With this stroke of a pen, I have done more exploits than I could have done in a long time with the best swords of my kingdom (60). Indeed, there is great probability, that he promised himself no advantage by the continuation of the war, and I am sure, that those who were most disinterested, and capable of judging of things of this sort, were equally convinced of the weakness which Philip II shewed on that occasion, and of the prudence of Henry IV in accepting such a peace. The Spaniards were ashamed of their king's weakness. The prince, his son, passionately desired that so successful a war might be continued; and he put out of favour Don Christopher de Mora, who had represented in a council the most forcible arguments for a peace (61). The king of Spain was unmovable, desiring peace at any rate; he found no condition in the treaty of Vervins, capable of dissuading him from approving it, though his council judged the restitution of the towns so fortunately taken, and so hard to be re-taken, shameful and prejudicial. He urged that it might be sworn and executed (62). It is very probable, he would have had very different sentiments, had he been in the vigour of his age. But how can it be helped? It is one of the faults of old age, to make people timorous.

CREECH.

I have said elsewhere, that republics have an advantage which kingdoms want: the sovereign in a common-wealth is never too young, nor ever too old. He is not subject either to the infirmities of childhood, or those of old age. Kingdoms have not that good fortune; they experience one while the disorders of a minority, sometimes the heat of boiling blood, and at other times the slowness and heaviness of a declining age. A king is forced to complain more than once, that the number of his years take away the activity and resolution which he formerly enjoyed, and which a young prince, his enemy, possesses.

DRYDEN.

For the rest, we must not wonder that the critics found fault with the peace of Vervins, and that some blamed France, others Spain, and a third fort Spain and France together. It is the fate of those great negotiations; it was the fate of the treaty of the peace at Ryswic in the year 1697. Many people blamed the Allies for not having demanded better conditions; others blamed France for having given up so great an extent of country. The French repined at it, and the Parisians refused to make bon fires, till they were forced to it by repeated menaces. They would not have had the nation return to the condition of passed ages, in which it might be justly said, they knew to make war better than peace, and understood as well the art of restoring as of taking. They wished the popular discourses of the Flemings had proved false. They knew that abundance of ignorant people had said that there was no reason to be alarmed at the loss of some towns, but rather to rejoice at it, since they would be recovered again fortified, according to Vauban's method. Scholars expressed this in another manner: we lose towns built with brick, they shall be restored built with marble (65).

[Q] Abundance of priests obstinately resolved not to pray for him.] The king's attorney-general in the parliament of Toulouse having notice, that a great number of priests in saying mass, omitted the prayer for the king (66), and that it was suppressed in many printed Missals (67), complained of it in parliament. It was there ordered, that all priests should be obliged

Poets, or Orators, have mentioned this great monarch with commendation. It is certain, on the other hand, that a great many authors have spitefully stained his glory, and have made it their business to extenuate his good actions, and to set his faults in the strongest light. The duke of Sulli complains of them, and confutes their obloquies, and, among other things, maintains, that it is false, that this prince granted every thing to the importunities of his mistresses [R]. Nevertheless, I believe, that if he had not had faith-

(68) If twelve years after the king had abjured Huguenotism, and had given a good many tokens of his zeal for Popery, and many testimonies of his kindness to the Leaguers, there were still so many ecclesiastics, that mortally hated him; what could he have expected from a contrary conduct? the fury of the bigots and the obstinate, had been infinitely more terrible, if he had neglected the outward profession of religion, and acted like a prince full of resentment. One of his historians (69) gives us, as an Instance of admirable policy, what I am going to transcribe: that very night (70) he played at cards with the duchess of Montpensier, who was of the house of Guise, and the strongest leaguer that was in the party (71). Undoubtedly this displeased his ancient servants. He would have been less forward to have paid such an honour to a Huguenot lady; this is going beyond the parable of the gospel. Did they perhaps say, that duchess hath not yet laboured in your vine-yard, and she hath done all that was possible to ruin it; and yet she is better paid than we, who have born all the burden and heat of the day (72). In the parable it was thought enough to equal the recompence of those who had laboured but an hour, and had done no prejudices before, with that of those who had laboured all the day. There were doubtless a great many murmurs of this sort, which could not have been satisfied by this answer of the master of the family: is your eye evil, because I am good (73). This would have been but chafing the wound; Henry IV would rather have said for his vindication, that the necessity of the times required such a conduct (74). Res dura & regni novitas me talia cogunt Moliri (75).

Mr du Pleſſis Mornei, in a letter which he writ to Morlas in the year 1594, during the time that they who had followed the League, went off from it upon advantageous terms, uses these remarkable words: 'We do not envy your killing the fatted calf for the prodigal son; provided you say with a sincere heart to the obedient son, you know, my son, that all that I have is thine, provided you do not sacrifice the obedient son to give a better entertainment to the prodigal one. In short, I am glad of all that is done, if it be of some advantage. But I am afraid of such bargains, by which things are given away and nothing is got for them but words; words I say, spoken by men, who hitherto never kept their word (76).'

[R] Mr de Sulli complains of them, and . . . maintains that it is false . . . that he granted every thing to the importunity of his mistresses.] He speaks of some historiographers, who had distributed their praises and censures unjustly; for they found no blot in those that hired them, and hardly any thing good in Henry the Great, who gave them nothing. And (says he) (77) forasmuch as they cannot deny him some praises, amongst an infinite number that are every where publicly bestowed upon him by the consent of all nations, they maliciously forget the most necessary to be known, disguise others, and extenuating them all as much as possible, they have made use of a malice of another sort, full of imposture, which is to ascribe to him, impudently and falsely, desires, projects, designs, enterprizes, and resolutions about affairs of state, the most absurd, foolish, impertinent, and ridiculous that can be imagined. And, on this occasion, they give themselves airs, and talk as if they had been the king's greatest confidants; and had been admitted into all his most secret thoughts and designs, or kept intelligence with one of his most familiar servants, both for peace and war, who told them all.
V O L. III.

Then proceeding to speak of his private conversation, domestic life, and conduct in it, and, above all, of his recreations, diversions, sports, pleasures, pastimes, and gaities, tho' they were for the most part ordinary, common, and familiar to all men, nay, even to women, and always most general, universal, tolerated, lawful, and permitted to all kings, potentates, princes, and great lords, there being few to be found among the most wise, virtuous, debonaire, pious, and holy, who were not delighted with them, and which their people and subjects have not gladly suffered, when for such pleasures and pastimes there has been no injustice, rape, murder, violence, extortion, or pillage committed. Yet when they come to discourse of the gaities and mirth of this sweet and debonaire prince; they so exaggerate and misrepresent them, with so many lies and fallacious circumstances, and mischievous and pernicious consequences, ascribing to him so many vicious, shameful, infamous, nay execrable and scandalous passions, that to bear them speak, with so much boldness, impudence, and rashness, one would think, that they were searchers of the hearts and thoughts of men . . . or that they had been the king's confessors or great penitentiaries . . . Nay, they have been so bold, as to place in the number of his mistresses, a lady, whose qualities, eminence, virtue, and prudence, would have cautioned him, even though he had thought on her, not to take her for such a one; and consequently those impudent writers deserve to be severely punished for having talked at that rate. They say likewise, that the women had got such dominion over him, because vice was grown natural and habitual to him, by a long use, and great familiarity with wicked people, and that he was become so desperately fond of some of these beauties, that he had no other will but theirs, and that this weakness was the cause that all his most important affairs were managed by their mediation, and that they were refused nothing they could desire. They so frequently add so many other foolish and trifling things, that all these impostures being too long to be confuted in this present discourse, (which is otherways designed) we will refer those who are willing to see their calumnies exposed, to what shall be said of them in several places of these memoirs, from which it will appear by what means, and for what reasons, the king never intended to marry a lady of pleasure; that women disposed of no affairs, and that he had servants, who by his own command knew how to tell them their faults, even in his presence, and to refuse them such things as they judged unjust, or prejudicial to the state, the affairs and revenues of the king, or to his people; and they were obliged to bear it. I will confirm this by some words taken from a letter of Henry IV, in which we shall see the calumnies which were thrown upon him. 'Some blame me for being too fond of buildings and costly edifices. Others find fault with my hunting, with my dogs, and hawks; some censure me for cards, dice, and other sorts of games; others for loving the ladies; others for feasts, banquets, and dainties: others find fault with me for loving of comedies, balls, dances, and running at the ring, where (say they to reproach me) I am still seen with my grey beard, as jocund and vain for having made a handsome course, entered twice or thrice (as they merrily express it) and carried off the ring of a fine lady, as I could have been in my youth, nay, as the vainest man in my court. In all which discourses, I will not deny but there may be something true. But I say, at the same time, that whilst I exceed not bounds, this ought rather to be said in my commendation than as a fault; and I ought surely to be excused for using such diversions, as bring no damage or inconvenience to my people, by way of retribution, for the frequent bitterness I have tasted, and for those many disquietudes, vexations, and dangers, which I have run through from my childhood to fifty years of age . . . The scripture does not absolutely command us to be free from sin and failings. Forasmuch as such in-

ful servants to disappoint the rapaciousness of those harpies, and whose opposition he approved of, they had been more despotic over him. The instances wherein he had the power to disengage himself from the snares that were laid for him, by fine ladies [S], were not common, yet some there were. Those servants whose fidelity he had experienced, might give him their advices, without disgusting him; and it has never been said, that Villeroi fell into disgrace, for having said a thing, that was likely enough to displease him [T]. It cannot be denied but that prince had a vast generosity, which banished from his conduct abundance of artifices, which are but too common among those that govern. We shall see, upon this head, the judgment [U] he made of an artifice of one of the kings of France.

'mities are the inseparable attendants, of the impetuosity and eagerness of humane nature; but only not to be enslaved by them, and not to suffer them to get an empire over our wills. Which is what I have studied to do, not being able to do better. And you can witness in abundance of things, relating to my mistresses, (which have been the passions the world believes I am most subject to) whether I have not often maintained your opinions, against their fancies, even so far as to tell them, when they pretended to make noise, that I had rather lose ten such mistresses as they, than one such servant as you, who was necessary to me in honourable and useful affairs' (78).

[S] There have been instances wherein he had the power to disengage himself from the snares which were laid for him by fine ladies. Catherine de Medicis asking him at the conference of Saint Brix (79), What he would have? he answered, looking on the young ladies of her retinue: there is nothing there, Madam, that I am for, meaning, that he designed no longer to be caught by such sort of lures. He was not so prudent on other occasions: for some time after the Paris massacre (80), 'he suffered himself to be captivated by the charms of some young ladies of the court, whom it is said that queen made use of on purpose to amuse the princes and lords, and to discover all their thoughts (81).' Behold an abominable queen! every body knows what name is given to such a trade. Good God! what a school for young ladies of quality, whom they call maids of honour? observe that if this queen had desired to keep two or three hundred, she would have been supplied with them: so great was the corruption of that time; for it was well known what use she made of these maids of honour.

[T] Villeroi said a thing that was likely enough to displease him. There is none so ignorant, as not to know, that it is a very rude advice, and that toucheth to the quick, to tell a man he knows not how to keep his rank, and that he forgets the dignity of his character. And yet this was done by Villeroi to king Henry the Great. Naudé praises him for it. One of the best advices, says he (82), that ever Monsieur de Villeroi gave to Henry the Great, who had lived as a soldier during the wars, which happened at his coming to the crown, was, that a prince who is regardless of the reverence due to his majesty, permits it to be slighted and affronted. That the kings, his predecessors, in the greatest confusions, had always acted as kings, and that it was time that he should speak, write, and command, as a king.

(82) Naudé, Coups d'Etat, chap. I, pag. m. 22.

[U] We shall see the judgment he made of an artifice of one of the kings of France. He was a great observer of things, which concerned the preservation of the reputation of princes, in which he chose rather to recede from his right and power, than give the least occasion to doubt his sincerity, always blaming faithless and tricking princes, so far as not to spare his own predecessors, when the conversation fell upon any of their actions, wherein they failed of integrity in their promises and public faith, as he did one day, when the great affairs of king Philip de Valois, and his great courage, little seconded by his fortune, were the subject of discourse. He was great, said the king, but he had subtilties in his words, more becoming the wheelers of little children than such a king, which I do not at all approve. He had made a treaty with the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, and by it engaged not to make war with the empire: contrary to which, notwithstanding, he raised armies by sea and land, which he threw into the Low-Countries, under the conduct of the duke of Normandy, his eldest son, who was defeated by sea at Sluys, and having besieged Thion, the king, his father, was present at that siege as a soldier, fighting under his son, being nevertheless, one of his counsellors, thinking by that captious equivocation to escape the blame of breaking the treaty he had made as king of France, as if it was not the same thing to execute any enterprize, ones self, or by another (83). It is not long since a doctor, with whom I was walking, told me, that Henry IV, having heard a story of a fallacy of the king of Spain, cried out it must be confessed, that kings are great knaves: I asked him immediately, whether he had found that in any book; he answered me, it was one of the fine sayings of Henry the Great (84), in a collection that has been published of them, at the end of his history, composed by the bishop of Rhodéz (84), preceptor to Lewis XIV. I doubt it much, said I, for I have read that work of Mr Perefex from one end to the other, and there remains in my mind, no idea of what you tell me; and yet these are words so like to make an impression, that they are not easily forgot. I afterwards found it true, that it was not in the book of the bishop of Rhodéz, and I wrote so to the doctor. He sent me word, that after reflecting more maturely, he believed that exclamation of Henry IV was related in one of the English letters of Howel. I bring this here, only by way of advertisement, that we ought not to trust to bear-says, and that facts change very much in passing from one writer to another. What a vast difference is there betwixt the words of le Grain and those of Howel!

[(84) We have a collection of them printed, but in it are wanting two repartees, which this prince said while only fifteen years of age, and which have been preserved to us by his illustrious mother, Jane d'Albret queen of Navarre. Catherine de Medicis the queen mother, in concert with the cardinal of Lorraine, had sent the Sieur de la Motte-Fenelon, to the queen of Navarre, to dissuade her from joining her forces with those which the Reformed, were raising under the command of the prince of Condé, in the year 1568, at the beginning of the third civil war. One day la Motte-Fenelon addressed himself particularly to the prince of Navarre, and seemed to appear surprized, that he, who was so young, should interest himself in a quarrel, which properly concerned only his uncle, the prince of Condé and the Huguenots, who were engaged in a war against the king. I do so, answered the prince, because it being evident, that under pretence of rebellion, with which they falsely charge the prince, my uncle, and the Huguenots, our enemies intend no less than the entire destruction of the royal branch of Bourbon, we have a mind to dye altogether, to have the expences of mourning, which otherways we should be obliged to wear for one after another.

Upon another occasion, the same gentleman, addressing his discourse to the same prince of Navarre, deplored the miseries with which the flames of that war were about to devour the whole kingdom, as he expressed himself. Very well, answered the prince, these flames may be quenched by one bucket of water. How so, replied la Motte-Fenelon? by making the cardinal of Lorraine, the real, and principal incendiary of France, drink it till he burst, said the prince. The queen of Navarre relates this in a long and elegant manifesto, to be found pag. 234, and 235, of a Collection printed in 12mo. in 1570 intitled L'Histoire de nostre temps &c. REM. CRIT.]

HERACLEOTES.

HERACLEOTES (DIONYSIUS), so called because he was of Heraclea (a), a city of Pontus, studied under several masters, and at last he attached himself to the founder of the Stoics (b). He learnt of him to say, that pain is no evil; that nothing but vice deserves that name, as nothing but virtue deserves the name of good, and that all other things are indifferent. He was steady in that doctrine, as long as he was in good health; but happening to feel some violent pains, he altered his opinion [A], and renounced the sect of the Stoics; and, which is worse, he embraced that of the Cyrenaics, who placed the Summum Bonum in pleasure. He resorted, without shame, publicly to the stews, and was willing, that the pleasures he indulged himself in should be known to all the world (c). There are some that say, that he was a debauchee from his youth [B], and that remembering as he was going by a brothel-house, that he had left it the day before, without paying what was due to the women of pleasure, he put

[A] Happening to feel some violent pains, he altered his opinion. This change acquired him the title of ματαδόμενος (1), which we may translate deserter. Some say, that sore eyes made him change his opinion; others attribute it to the pains of the gravel. Cicero relates both these traditions (2). 'Nobis Heracleotes ille Dionysius flagitiose deliville videtur a Stoicis propter oculorum dolorem. Quis verò hoc didicisset à Zenone, non dolere quum doleret? Illud audierat nec tamen didicerat malum illud non esse quia turpe non esset, & esset ferendum viro: Hic si peripateticus fuisset, permanisset, credo in sententia, quoniam dolorem dicunt malum esse, de asperitate autem ejus fortiter ferenda præcipiunt eadem quæ Stoici (3). — This Dionysius Heracleotes appears to have deserted the Stoics infamously, on account of a pain in his eyes. For to whom did ever Zeno teach that what is painful is not painful? He had heard, but without understanding it, that pain is not an evil, because it is not shameful, and that a man ought to suffer it. If he had been a Peripatetic, I am of opinion, that he would have continued so, for they maintain that pain is an evil, but they teach, as the Stoics do, that a man ought to suffer it with courage.' I have let down more words than I needed to prove what I had said, and yet I do not think my labour lost; for, by the way, I discover to my reader, that the controversies of the Stoics and Peripatetics, upon the nature of pain, was but a dispute of words. They both agreed, that it ought to be born courageously: but the former denied that it ought to be called an evil, and the latter maintained it ought. A matter of consequence indeed to make such a stir about. We dispute at this day, both in divinity and philosophy, about things wherein the misunderstanding is no less visible. Here is a passage of Cicero, which I will set down entire, that we may have a full view of the way of reasoning of our Heracleotes. He presumed much upon the strength of philosophy; for he judged, that it being inferior to the force of pain, pain must needs be an evil. 'Homo sane levis Heracleotes Dionysius, cum à Zenone fortis esse didicisset, à dolore deductus est. Nam cum ex renibus laboraret, ipso in ejulatu clamitabat, falsa esse illa, quæ antea de dolore ipse sensisset. Quem cum Cleanthes condiscipulus rogaret quantum ratio eum de sententia deduxisset, respondit, Quia cum tantum operæ Philosophiæ dedissem, dolorem tamen ferre non possem satis esset argumenti malum esse dolorem! Plurimos autem annos in Philosophia consumpsi, nec ferre possum: malum est igitur dolor. Tum Cleanthes, cum pede terram percussisset, versum ex Epigonis ferunt dixisse:

(4) Cicero Tusc. II, cap. xxv.

Zenonem significabat, à quo illum degenerare dolebat. — Dionysius Heracleotes, being a man of no constancy, after he had been taught hardiness by Zeno, fell from it, being overcome by pain. For being afflicted with the gravel, in the anguish of his pain, he cried out, that his former opinion concerning pain was false. And, when his condisciple Cleanthes asked him, why he had changed his opinion, he answered, since I have studied Philosophy so long, yet am not able to suffer pain, that is a sufficient reason to believe that pain is an evil. Cleanthes upon this, after stamping with his foot on the ground, as the story goes, repeated this verse out of the Epigonia,

Audisne hæc Amphiaræ sub terram addite?

Amphiaræus, now thou art entomb'd in earth,
Dost thou bear this?

Meaning Zeno, from whom he lamented that Dionysius had degenerated.

[B] There are some who say that he was a debauchee from his youth. We have just now seen, that he philosophized many years upon the austere maxims of the Stoics; he himself affirms it, if we believe Cicero. What must we think then of the story we find in Athenæus? Shall we say that this author diverted himself with collecting all the scandalous stories, true or false, that he found in the most satirical writers? I leave the decision to my readers. I only insert the Greek of Athenæus, with Dalecampius's version, which should be rectified by Casaubon's notes. 'Ἦν δὲ ὁ Διονύσιος ἐπὶ ἐκ νέου, ὡς οἱσι Νικίας ὁ Νικαεὺς ἐν ταῖς διαδοχαῖς πρὸς τὰ Ἀποδίσια ἐκμαθὴς, καὶ πρὸς τὰς δημοσίας εἰσὶν παίδων ἀδελφῶν. καὶ ποτὶ παρευόμενος μετὰ τινὲν γυναικῶν, ὡς ἐγένετο κατὰ τὸ παιδισκίον εἰς ὃ τὴ προτέρα παρρηλυδὸς ἀπέλθ' ἡλκῆς, ἔχων τότε κατὰ τύχην, ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα πάλιν ὁρῶντων ἀπεδίδα. Fuit autem Dionysius ille, quod ait Nicæas Nicæensis libro de Successionibus, jam ab adolescentia, tam immani furiosaque libidine percitus, ut sine discrimine cum plebeis ancillis ac pedissequis coiret, & aliquando cum familiaribus inambulans, ubi ad ancillarum cedes venit, quas pridie ingressus aliquot obolos quos debebat non solverat, casu tunc forte in oculis habens, distenta manu coram omnibus numeravit (5). — Nicæas Nicæensis, in his book of Successions, says, that this Dionysius was from his youth so abandoned to his pleasures, that he lay promiscuously with all the wenches he could come at. And that one day walking with some of his friends, and passing by the house of some wenches, with whom he had lain the day before, and to whom he owed some pence, he having then some in his pocket, held out his hand, and publicly paid his debt. They who well remember the seventh book of Athenæus, will be easily determined on Cicero's side, and believe, that Dionysius did not desert the Stoics, till he was grown grey amongst them; for Athenæus gives him the name of old man, at the time of this desertion, and cites Timon the jester, who said, that this wise man had begun to devote himself to pleasures, when the season of them was over. But let us give the original, it is in the sixth chapter of the seventh book of Athenæus, pag. 281. Περὶ δὲ Διονυσίου τῷ Ἡρακλεάτῃ τι δὲ καὶ λέγουσι δὲ ἀντίκρυς ἀποδὲς τὴν τῆς ἀρετῆς χεῖρα ἀδύνα μνημοσάτω, καὶ μεταδόμενος καλέμενος ἔχων, καὶ τοὶ γυναικῶν ἀποδὲς τῶν τῆς σῶας λόγων, καὶ ἐπὶ τὸν Ἐπίκουρον μεταπαύσας περὶ οὗ ἀρχαίως ὁ Τίμων ἔφη, Ἦν δὲ ἔχων δύνειν, οὐν ἀρχεται ἡδύνασθαι.

Quid autem de Heracleote Dionysio attinet dicere? Aperte quidem & palam virtutis exuta veste, cum indumentum mutasse & alienum lumpsisse criminarentur, gaudebat, quamvis jam natu grandis à Stoicorum schola defecisset, & transivisset ad Epicurum. De illo non invenisse Timon scripsit:

put his hand in his pocket, and paid his debts regularly in the face of the world. There was a perplexing objection made to him [C] upon his admitting with all the Dogmatists, a rule for distinguishing of truth and falsehood. He composed several philosophical works, and also some poems (d). He brought Heraclides into a snare by one of his poems [D]. He lived to the age of eighty years, after which, choosing not to live any longer, he put an end to his life by refusing all nourishment (e). His lascivious desires accompanied him to an age, wherein nature could not satisfy them [E]. Mr Moreri is grossly mistaken [F].

Ille voluptati se tradit jam moriturus.

Tempus amandi, tempus habendæ conjugis est quod
Rebus ab his tandem moneat desistere tempus.

What shall we say of Dionysius Heracleotes? Who, having openly thrown off the robe of virtue, laughed at the title of Apostate, that was given him on that account, though he had in his old age deserted from the Stoics to the Epicurean sect. Timon pleasantly wrote concerning him: Heracleotes devotes the days of life to Venus. There is a season for love, a season for marriage, and a time when we should attempt neither.

I add, that Lucian observes, that Dionysius was a very sober man, when he quitted the Stoics (6). I dare not affirm, with Mr Menage (7), that he had been in Asia in Alexander's retinue, and had danced to the sound of flutes at this conqueror's nuptials. Athenæus indeed says this of one Dionysius Heracleotes but how many people of the same name doth he mention, without any mark of distinction?

[C] A perplexing objection was made to him. Antiochus was the man that made this objection; he had embraced a sect, which admitted no science, that is, no proposition certainly true, and afterwards he forsook that party, when he had for a long time maintained incomprehensibility, and written subtilly for that cause, 'Scriptis de his rebus acutissime, & idem hoc acris accusavit in senectute quam antea desensitaverat. Quamvis igitur fuerit acutus, ut fuit tamen inconstantia elevatur autoritas. Quis, inquam, etiam iste dies illuxerit, quæro, qui illi ostenderit eam quam multos annos esse negavisset veri & falsi notam (8)?' — He wrote very acutely on these subjects, and in his old age, impugned his former doctrine with more vehemency than he had before defended it. Therefore tho' he was a very acute writer, as certainly he was, yet his authority was lessened by his inconstancy. For I would ask him on what happy day it was that he luckily found, that criterion of truth and falsehood, which he had so long denied. Now whilst he was opposing certainty, he cruelly teased our Dionysius; you believed a long time, said he, that there was no other good but virtue; afterwards you maintained that virtue was a vain name, and that the supreme good consists in pleasure. You ought therefore to believe, that falsehood presents itself to our minds, and stamps itself there in the same character, to truth, and consequently, that the characteristic or mark of true and false, which you truit to in affirming or denying, is fallacious and delusive. All the force of this objection lay in this, that Dionysius had successively maintained two contradictory propositions. Antiochus felt the force of his own objection, when he changed his opinion; for he was beaten with the same weapons, that he had employed against Dionysius. Here follow Cicero's words (9): 'Quoque solebat uti' argumentum, cum ei placebat, nihil posse percipi, cum quereretur, Dionysius ille Heracleotes, utrum comprehendisset certa illa nota qua assentiri dicitur oportere, illudne, quod multos annos tenuisset, Zenonique magistro credidisset, honestum quodesset, id bonum solum esse; an quod postea desensitavisset, honesti inane nomen esse, voluptatem esse summum bonum: qui ex illius commutata sententia docere vellet, nihil ita signari in animis nostris à vero posse, quod non eodem modo possit à falso, is curavit, quod argumentum ex Dionysio ipse sumpisset, ex eo cæteri fumerent. — He used the following argument, while he was of opinion that we could not arrive at certainty of truth. Which of these two opinions, said he, did Dionysius Heracleotes discover by that criterion, to which you say we ought to submit, whether the first, which he long maintained, and which he had learned from his master Zeno, that nothing is good but what is virtuous; or that which he defended afterwards, that virtue is an empty sound, and that pleasure is the chief good: designing to show, from Dionysius's change of opinion, that truth makes no other impression on the mind, but what it may receive from falsehood. He took care that those who came after him, should draw the same argument, from his inconstancy, which he had drawn from that of Dionysius. This objection may perplex those modern Protestants, who maintain that the truths of the gospel enter not into the mind by the way of evidence, but by sense. What will they say, if we shew them Christians who change their religion, and, like our Dionysius, for a long time violently espouse the same opinions, which afterwards they reject with an equal zeal? Doth not the sense of falsehood, might one ask, imprint itself on the soul, with all the same characters as the sense of truth?

[D] He brought Heraclides into a snare by one of his poems. Having written a poem, called Παρθενοναίον, Parthenonæum, he published it, and ascribed it to Sophocles. Heraclides honestly took this work for a production of Sophocles, and cited it as such in one of his books. Then Dionysius discovered the trick to him, and Heraclides would not believe him; he maintained, that it was Sophocles's work; and even when Dionysius sent him his manuscript, he persisted in his opinion, and pretended, that chance might cause two poets to jump (10). So disagreeable it is to an author to acknowledge himself caught in that manner. Scaliger, being deceived the same way by Muretus, was not so obstinate, but he was very much vexed at it.

[E] His lascivious desires accompanied him to an age wherein nature could not satisfy them. Upon a great festival, which he celebrated as agreeably as he could, he sent for a courtesan, that nothing might be wanting to the pleasures of the day; but age had so subdued him, that his attempts were vain. He confessed his infirmity, making use of the words (11) which Homer puts in the mouth of one Penelope's galants, who not being able to bend Ulysses's bow, cried out, let another take it, I am not able to do it (12). Dionysius in like manner declared, that since his strength failed him, another should make use of the Courtesan. Φησὶ τὸν Διονύσιον τοῖς οἰκέταις συνορτοῦντα, ἐν τῇ τῶν Χθον ἑστῇ, καὶ μὴ δύναμενον διὰ γῆρας χρῆσθαι τῇ παρειλήθεσαν ἐταίρᾳ, ὑποσφύζαντα εἰπεῖν πρὸς τὰς συνδείκνυντας, ὅτι δύναμαι πάντως, λαβέτω δὲ καὶ ἄλλος. Tradit Dionysium cum domesticis, diebus festis congorum, ferias illas agentem, cum ob senectutem meretrice quam adduxerant uti non posset, ad convivias facie versa, dixisset. Arrigere neque, sumat alius (13). Antigonus Carysius related this in the life of our Dionysius Heracleotes.

[F] Mr Moreri is grossly mistaken. I. He says, that Dionysius of Heraclea having quitted the school of Zeno, followed the Cynics. He should have said Cyrenaics, whose sect was extremely different from that of the Cynics. We may judge of it, from the opposite characters, which were found in Arisippus and Diogenes. There is not at the bottom any great difference betwixt Diogenes Laërtius, who makes our Dionysius go over to the camp of the Cyrenaics, and Athenæus, who makes him go over to the sect of Epicurus; for tho' Epicurus gave a more virtuous explication of the word Pleasure, he agreed with the Cyrenaics, that the last end of man, the supreme good, the happiness of man, was pleasure. II. These words, he did not scruple . . . to do publicly, what might give him pleasure, are a consequence of his first error, and a new error. If Dionysius had embraced Cynicism, he would not have been ashamed to have lain with a woman in the middle of the streets; but as he only went over to the school of Arisippus, who was a pleasant debauchee, and a polite libertine, who knew the world admirably admirably well, and that the Cyrenaics, who gave nature all it desired, had not however adopted the impudence of the Cynics, it is wrong to pretend; that he had no more respect than Diogenes for the eyes of his neighbours. I confess he was willing to be seen to enter into the public stews, and to have it known that he had do with prostitutes (14), but every body knows, that this doth not signify that he knew women publicly, and in the sight of every body, as was the practice of the Cynics. III. Our Philosopher's deserting from the Stoics, could not be more confusedly represented than Moreri has done it. Dionysius, saith

HERACLIUS, Patriarch of Jerusalem, in the XIIth century, was the maker of his own fortune. He was born at Auvergne, without fortune or friends, and yet he was promoted to the archbishopric of Cæsarea, and afterwards to the patriarchate of Jerusalem. His good mein and address brought him into the strictest intimacy with the king's mother; so that the oppositions of the archbishop of Tyre, proved vain, though he grounded them upon prophecies [A]. In vain he protested against the election of Heraclius, in vain he appealed to the Pope, and even went to Rome, in order to get it declared void: he had not time to put an end to that affair. Heraclius caused him to be poisoned [B], and afterwards going to Rome, got his election confirmed by the Pope. He succeeded the Patriarch Almeric, who died in the year 1180. He led a very scandalous life with a merchant's wife of Napoli in Syria, whom he brought to Jerusalem after the death of her husband (a). You will see, below, some circumstances of it [C]. We must not distinguish him from the Patriarch Heraclius, mentioned in the History of the Crusades; and who expressed so much passion against Henry II king of England [D], when he found that that prince excused himself from going in person to the

(14) Citat. (3) and (4).

[A] Though he grounded them upon prophecies. He said, that the prophecies foretold, that as the cross was conquered by one Eraclius, it should be lost under another (1). I believe he would have spoke more agreeably to history, if he had said, that as the Infidels had taken the cross under one Heraclius, they should retake it under another Heraclius. I know the emperor or Heraclius recovered, by a treaty of peace, the cross which the Persians had carried off; but can this be called a conquering of the cross?

[B] The archbishop of Tyre had not time to put an end to that affair. Heraclius caused him to be poisoned. I have found this in a preface, that Bongarsius has placed before the Gesta Dei per Francos. He tells us, that William archbishop of Tyre, the same that has written the history of this times, remonstrated in vain to the canons of the Holy Sepulchre, against their nomination of Heraclius to the Patriarchate of Jerusalem. Healleged to them the above-mentioned prophecy; and that they might not think that he aspired to the vacant dignity, he conjured them neither to nominate Heraclius nor himself. Nevertheless, they were the two that were nominated. The king, according to the promises he had made to his mother, made choice of Heraclius, who immediately published his mandate, requiring obedience from the archbishops and bishops, depending on the Patriarchate of Jerusalem. None but the archbishop of Tyre refused to appear. He appealed to the Pope, and undertook to shew that Heraclius was not worthy of the Patriarchate. He immediately set out for Rome, and was very well received there, and put things on such a foot, that the deposition of Heraclius was looked upon as unavoidable; but the new Patriarch prevented the blow, by corrupting a Physician, who poisoned William. He afterwards made a voyage to Rome, and obtained all that he desired from the Pope. Bongarsius found this only in French authors.

[C] You will see, below, some circumstances of it. The history of the Conquest of Jerusalem, which I have cited, was published at Paris in the year 1679. The publisher had taken it from an old manuscript which Mr Cabart de Villermont had given him. These words are to be seen in it: The Patriarch kept her

(2) That is, the widow of the merchant of Napoli in Syria.

(2) openly, as if she had been his wife, only she did not live with him, and when the Patriarch went to the church, she was as magnificently dressed, as if she had been an empress or a queen; and when any body who did not know her, asked who that lady was; those that knew her, answered, that she was the Patriarch's wife. Her name was Pasque de Ri-

veri, and she had many children by the Patriarch. There goes a story, that this Patriarch being in council about important affairs, a madman having thrust into the room, ran to him and told him, my Lord Patriarch, get a good reward ready for me; for I bring you a piece of good news, your wife, Pasque de Riveri, is happily delivered of a fine girl.

Bongarsius relates in Latin, the same history, and more at large (3); for he says that the French author who reports it, observes, that that conduct of the Patriarch served as a model for others, and that the priests, the clerks, and the monks, were so addicted to lewdness and adultery, that there was scarce a chaste woman in Jerusalem, and that JESUS CHRIST seeing these impurities in a city, where he had shed his blood for the redemption of his people, would no more suffer them, than those of Sodom and Gomorrah; wherefore, he again so well purged it of that abominable filth, that of all those who lived there in the time of Heraclius, there were only two persons, who escaped captivity, when that city was taken by Saladin. The same Bongarsius quotes Marinus Sanutus, and Paulus Amilius, the first whereof says that the people called Heraclius's concubine Patriarchels (4); and the other assures us, that this Patriarch and his clergy led a disorderly life: Sacerdotes fuisse flagitiosos, sceleribusque obrutos: atque adeo ipsum Patriarcham neque caste neque integre vitam egisse (5).

[D] It was he who expressed so much passion against Henry II king of England. That prince, to expiate the crime he had committed by giving occasion to the assassins of St Thomas archbishop of Canterbury, to murder him in his own church, had accepted a penance from the Pope, by which he was obliged to bring in person in three years time a considerable succour to the Holy-Land. More than ten were lapsed after that term was expired, and yet he had not put himself in a capacity to accomplish his promise (6). This made Heraclius hope for a good success in his negotiation. He made a very pathetic discourse to this monarch after he had presented to him the keys of Jerusalem, and of the holy sepulchre (7). He was made to hope that he should be soon satisfied, but the king broke his word with him. Henry consulted his clergy, to know whether in the present posture of affairs, he was obliged to make good his promise, and to accomplish that part of the penance which the Pope had laid on him, and to which he had solemnly obliged himself (8). The Patriarch Heraclius was present at the assembly where this case of conscience was examined. All the bishops and abbots . . . concluded unanimously the succour of Jerusalem. He was the chief of the embassy, which the princes of the Holy-Land sent into the West to demand assistance, and had undertaken in Palestine to bring back with him, either the king of England, or one of the three princes his sons (b).

... that not only the king was not at present obliged to make a voyage into Palestine, but that he would do much better for the salvation of his soul to remain in his own dominions; because the promise he had made in accepting of the penance, from which he might and ought to have been dispensed with, could not prejudice that which is absolutely indispensable, and which he made at his coronation, to govern his subjects well, and to defend them from the insults of domestic and foreign enemies; which he could not do in his absence in the condition affairs were in. They all unanimously added, as also did the lords, that as to one of the king's sons, who was demanded in his stead, the assembly could determine nothing thereupon, since they were absent, and the resolution they were to take, depended solely upon them (9). The Patriarch, who was a man of a violent temper, was so provoked at that resolution, that he had like to have spoiled all by losing altogether the respect which he owed to the king, and treating him in a manner which cannot at all be excused, whatever attempt may be made to cover it with the name and false appearance of zeal (10). He answered the king, who offered 50 thousand marks of silver for that war (11). 'That they had no occasion for his money but for him; that they had more gold and silver than they desired, and that they did not come so far but to find out a man, who had need of money, to make an advantageous war against the Infidels, and not to look for money which wanted a man skilled in the art of using it well in that war. For the rest, added he, speaking in a very insolent manner, you have reigned hitherto with great glory; but know, that God, whose cause you have forsaken, will immediately forsake you. To be satisfied of it, you need only compare the benefits you have received from him with the enormous crimes with which you have repaid him by a most horrid ingratitude. You have violated the faith, which you owe to the king of France, your sovereign, and now you alledge the war, which you fear he will declare against you as a pretence for your refusal. You have caused the holy archbishop of Canterbury to be barbarously massacred, and you refuse at present to go to the defence of the Holy-Land, after having solemnly engaged in it upon the holy sacrament. And when he saw the king changing colour, reddened through indignation and anger, do not believe, continued he, trusting out his neck, that I am afraid of the effects of that fury, which the truth I speak, and you cannot bear, kindles in your soul. Behold my head here's treat me as you have done St. Thomas: I shall be as satisfied to die by your hands in England, as by those of the Saracens in Syria: and indeed you are little better than a Saracen (12). The king bore all he said patiently, and continued to treat the Patriarch very civilly, even to the conducting him in his own ship to Rouën, from whence he carried him to the frontier, to the end he might be witness of the conference he had there for three days with king Philip, on the subject of the holy war (13). Heracles went away without obtaining his desires, and even without the assistance that was offered him, which his passion made him foolishly slight against all the rules of prudence and good sense, and to the great prejudice of the affairs of his master: so much it is requisite that kings should not abandon their interests to the discretion of those who have hardly any, and who frequently by the violent passions that govern them are deprived of the little that they have.

(12) According to Maimbourg, pag. 64, the patriarch said things to the king, that were still more offensive, which, adds he, I will not repeat.

HERALDUS (DESIDERIUS) in French Herauld, advocate in the parliament of Paris, has given good proofs of his learning, in several books that he has published [A]. He disguised himself under the name of David Leidbrefferus, to write a political dissertation upon the independence of kings (a), some time after the death of Henry IV. He died in June 1649, and left some children [B]. Salmasius and he wrote against one another [C].

[A] He gave proofs of his learning in several books that he has published. His Adversaria appeared in the year 1599. It is a little book which he repented the publishing of, if we may believe the Scaligerana. His notes upon Tertullian's Apology, Minutius Felix, and Arnobius have been esteemed. He has also commented upon Martial's epigrams.

[B] And left some children. When Mr Daillé (1) speaks of the Proteflant writers who condemned the execution of Charles I king of England, he quotes Le Pacifique Royal en deuil, written by Mr Heraud. That author, the son of our Desiderius Heraldus, was minister in Normandy when he was called to the service of the Walloon church in London, in Charles the first's time, and he was so good a royalist, that he found himself obliged to return into France, to escape the fury of the republicans, who were displeased with his exhortations to submit themselves to their lawful prince. He returned into England after the restoration of the royal family, and again took possession of his former station in the Walloon church at London, and some time after he obtained a canonry of Canterbury, which he kept till his death. This is what has been lately told me by a person who had opportunities of being acquainted with his history. See also the last page of Mr Bochart's letter to Mr Morley.

An old and very learned advocate is dead here, called Monsieur Heraut (Desiderius Heraldus) who had a dispute with Salmasius, who had writ against him, Observationes ad Jus Atticum & Romanum about four years since. Monsieur Heraut, who was offended with that book, was writing an answer to it in folio; but death having surprized him, I think it must be sold, such as it is, and an end must be put to it where the author found his own. He seemed to be about seventy years of age... He had the reputation of a very learned man, as well in the civil law, as in polite learning, and he wrote very easily upon what subject he pleased (2). I learn from a letter of Sarravius (3), that after twenty seven years silence, Heraldus having examined his papers at the instance of his friends, was ready to publish his book de Autoritate rerum judicatorum. What he had prepared against Salmasius was printed in the year 1650, it is a folio, intitled, Questiones quotidianæ, & Observationes ad Jus Atticum ac Romanum. There are two books in the catalogue of the Bodleian library, ascribed to Hier. Herbarius, which certainly were misplaced by the Printers; they ought to have been a little higher under Desiderius Heraldus. These are the titles of them, De de Rerum judicatorum autoritate Libri II. at Paris, 1640. Observationum & Emendationum Liber unus, ibid.

* Apolline de tripode accepimus. Alter traditur Nilonatus Ægyptius, quem aiunt Phrygiæ literas conscripsisse. Tertius est ex Idæis Dactylis, cui inferias afferunt. Quartus Jovis est, & Alteræ Latone sororis quem Tyrii maxime colunt, cujus Carthaginem filiam ferunt. Quintus in India, qui Belus dicitur. Sextus hic ex Alcmena, quem Jupiter genuit; sed tertius Jupiter: quoniam, ut jam docebo, plures Joves etiam accepimus (1). — I would gladly know which of the Hercules's we worship, for the curious enquirers into secret history, give us account of several who have bore that name; the most ancient of all was the son of Jupiter, and of the most ancient of the Jupiters too, for we find likewise several Jupiters in the ancient Greek writers. It was this Hercules, the son of Jupiter and Lyctio, who strove with Apollo about a tripod, as history informs us. We are told of another Hercules, an Egyptian, the son of Nilus, who is said to have invented the Phrygian characters. A third we owe to the Idæi Dactyli, to whom infernal rites are paid. A fourth was the son of Jupiter and Asteria, sister to Latona, and is highly worshipped by the Tyrians, and, as they tell us, had a daughter named Carthago. A fifth of India, who is named Belus: and a sixth, the son of Alcmena by Jupiter, but a third Jupiter: because, as I shall prove, by and by, we have accounts of several Jupiters. According to this account the Egyptian Hercules will be only the third; but the Egyptians give him the first place (2). Diodorus Siculus (3) who mentions but three Hercules's, gives the Egyptian the birth-right, and confesses, that the conformity of name and inclinations has been the reason, that the actions of the others have been ascribed to the Theban Hercules, who was the youngest of them all. It is said that Varro has reckoned up forty four Hercules's.

[B] He had a prodigious strength . . . in the combats of . . . Venus. Some say (4) that in seven days he despoiled the fifty daughters of Thestius; others (5) will allow but one night for it, and add, that he impregnated them all with boys, and that two of them, the oldest and the youngest, brought him two sons a piece. According to some (6) the youngest would not at all consent to the loss of her virginity, and that as a punishment for her obstinacy he condemned her to keep it for her life, and ordered her to serve him as a priestess. This was the reason why the temple of Hercules at Thestis was served by a priestess who was obliged to remain a virgin as long as she lived (7). Pausanias could not persuade himself that Hercules could be so much enraged against the daughter of his good friend (8): he therefore looked upon the penalty, which Hercules had inflicted upon her as a very severe punishment. What he says of Thestius's friendship for Hercules, agrees very well with what we read in Diodorus Siculus (9), that Thestius (10) being desirous that his daughters might give him a posterity whereof Hercules should be the father, invited him to a noble feast, and entertained him magnificently, after which he sent him his fifty daughters one after another. Vigenere has pleasantly said, that it was the stoutest battle that Hercules was ever engaged in, in all his life (11). And yet the antients have not placed this in the catalogue of his labours. It has been observed that because he made war, sometimes in one country, and sometimes in another, being a great lover of the fair sex, he had dispersed women in several provinces of the world, that he might every where find some at his disposal. Lactantius was not in the wrong for laughing at the Pagans, who placed in the number of the gods a man who had left every where marks of his leudness: 'Hercules . . . nonne orbem terræ quem peragrasset ac purgasset narratur, stupris, libidinibus, adulteriis inquinavit? nec mirum, cum esset adulterio genitus Alcmenæ. Quid tandem potuit in eo esse divini, qui suis ipse vitiis mancipatus & mares, & fœminas, contra omnes leges infamia, dedecore, flagitio afficit (12)? — Did not Hercules (which they tell us travelled over the world, and purged it from monsters) pollute it with suboredoms, leudness, and adulteries? And no wonder, since he owed his birth to the adultery of Alcmena. What could there be in him that was divine, who being a slave to his lusts, contrary to all laws, entailed infamy, disgrace, and crimes, both on males and females.' Arnobius very agreeably ridicules the Pagans for making nine nights necessary to Jupiter to get one child, and allowing but one night to Hercules to get fifty maids with child. 'Quis illum (Jovem) in Alcmena novem noctibus fecit pervigilasse continuis? non vos? . . . Et sane adjungitis beneficia non parva: siquidem vobis Deus Hercules natus est, qui in rebus humanis patris sui transfret exuperaretque virtutes. Ille noctibus vix novem unam potuit prolem extundere, concinere, compingere: at Hercules sanctus Deus natus quinquaginta de Thestio nocte una perdocuit & nomen virginittatis exponere, & genitricum pondera sustinere (13). — Who told us that this Jupiter lay nine whole nights with Alcmena? Was it not you? And indeed you make him do something worthy of all this labour: for hence sprung your mighty Hercules, who far excelled his father in feats of this nature. He with much ado could hardly strike out one child in nine nights: but the good god Hercules in one night not only despoiled Thestius's fifty daughters, but made them all mothers.' Note that Thestius was amazed at that vigour of Hercules (14).

[C] He was also a great eater. He gloried in being able to eat more than others, and he was extremely vexed to find a man that could match him in that point. He disputed the prize of voracity with one Lepreus, and did not get the victory (15). They each of them sacrificed an ox, and if Hercules eat all his at one meal, his antagonist was no less expeditious and vigorous upon his victim. Lepreus should have stopped there, but he had the boldness to provoke Hercules to another sort of combat, to a duel, wherein he was killed. I shall speak more fully of this dispute at the end of this remark. Here is another story. Hercules travelling with his wife and his little son Hyllus, and seeing the little boy distressed with hunger, applied himself to a husband-man for some food for him; but obtaining nothing he unyoked one of the oxen from his plough, and sacrificed him to the gods and eat him (16). That canine appetite did not leave him even in heaven; hence it is that Callimachus exhorts Diana not to catch hares, but wild-boars and bulls, because Hercules had not lost the quality of a great eater amongst the gods which he had amongst men.

For tho' a god, his appetite's as strong,
As when Theodamas's plough he loos'd,
And at one meal the labouring ox devour'd.

Athenæus cites some verses of Epicharmus, which admirably express the voracity of this hero.

He cites some other poets to prove his position that Hercules was a very great eater, ὅτι ἦν καὶ ὁ Ἡρακλῆς ἐσθλὸς φάγας, and he forgets not the competition of Lepreus. Here follows what he says of it.

Lepreus challenged Hercules to a trial of gluttony, and was worsted. Εἰσδύεται δὲ ὁ Ἡρακλῆς καὶ Λεπρεὺς ἀεὶ πολυφαγίας ἐπὶ τῶν ἐκείνου περκαλεσάμενος, καὶ νενίκηκε. Inducitur Hercules de voracitate cum Lepreo certans qui eum provocaverat, in qua contentione Hercules victor evasit (19). — Hercules is introduced striving with Lepreus for the prize of gluttony, to which the latter had challenged him, and in which he was defeated by Hercules. Zeno-dorus says that Hercules had put in chains Lepreus the grandson of Neptune, after he had cleansed Augeas's stable; he set him at liberty when he had finished his labours, at which time he had three trials of skill with him. They plaid at quoits, they strove who should pump water best, and who could eat up an ox soonest, in all which Hercules had the victory. At last Lepreus, being drunk, challenged Hercules a-fresh, and was killed by him. Others say they did not dispute who should eat most, but who should drink most, and that Hercules had the better of Lepreus (20). Others pretend that the dispute was, both who should eat up an ox soonest, and who should drink most (21). I will mention some other facts in the note [H].

*A massy cup, the prize, was carry'd big
By two fair youths; this Hercules of old
Was wont, with ease, to carry in one hand,
And at one draught to empty, when returning From his fell labours, or the bloody field.*

It appears by the history of Alexander, that in feasts, where there was extraordinary drinking, they drank round in a great cup, which was called the cup of Hercules. It was reserved for the last, as we may infer from Alexander's not having yet drank it, when he fell sick at table (23) at an entertainment where he had already drank a great deal. Others say, he did drink it, and that it was his fatal cup. Alexandrum . . . intemperantia bibendi atque ille Herculeanus & fatalis scyphus condidit (24). Diodorus Siculus tells us, that Alexander having already drunk much, to conclude, drank off Hercules's cup, and immediately fell into a swoon (25). To reconcile these differences, I believe, we must suppose this prince was struck as he was drinking this cup, and before he had made an end of it. This historian observes this cup of Hercules was very large. But what can be alleged more decisive hereupon than the words of Macrobius? 'Scyphus Herculis poculum est ita ut Liberi patris cantharus: Herculeum vero fiores veteres non sine causa cum poculo fecerant & nonnunquam casabundum & ebrum, non solum quod is heros bibax fuisse perhibetur, sed etiam quod antiqua Historia est Herculeum poculo tanquam navigio ventis immensa maria transisse. taceam quæ vulgo nota sunt, illud non obscurum argumentum est, quod Ehippus in Bufride inducit 'Herculem sic loquentem, &c (26). — The icy-phus is the cup of Hercules, as the cantharus is that of Bacchus: It was not without cause, that the ancient sculptors represented Hercules with a cup in his hand, in a tottering condition, and drunk, not only because this hero is said to have been a lover of wine; but likewise because ancient history informs us, that Hercules made long navigations in a cup instead of a ship. I shall relate a few things concerning both these from the antiquities of the Greeks. As to the first, that Hercules was a lover of wine, not to mention what is commonly known, we have no obscure proof of it in Ehippus, who in his Bufris introduces Hercules speaking thus, &c.' Athenæus seems to point out to us the capacity of this cup, for he says (27), that that which was the cause of Alexander's death, contained two gallons. The poet Stesichorus can teach us a very notable particular. He says that Pholus drank a health to Hercules in a pitcher that held forty eight gallons. Centaurorum & Lapitharum convivium describens (Stesichorus) ait Pholum (quem propterea hospitalem Alcide nuncupat Lacanus) implevisse Herculi craterem trium lagenarum capacem, quem prior ipse obbibisset: amplum autem fuisse oportuit, qui urnam, hoc est, quatuor & viginti sextarios caperet (28). He drank it off first, and was immediately pledged by Hercules.

With three lagenæ, and at one huge draught

Athenæus explains in a very probable manner, why the poets have feigned Hercules to have crossed the seas in a drinking-bowl. That fiction, says he (30), is in all likelihood founded upon the delight this hero took in drinking in great glasses; for he was a notable drinker: 'Ὅτι δὲ εἰς ἦν ὁ Ἡρακλῆς τῶν πλεόντων πινόντων περιπόμην. [E] They cursed him during the sacrifices which the Lindians offered to him.] I have told above, that Hercules eat an ox that he took from a countryman; but I add here, that as he was eating it, the countryman poured out a thousand curses against him, which was only a diversion to Hercules: so that when an altar was built to him he chose this countryman for his priest, and commanded him to repeat the same curses as often as they should offer sacrifices; for, said he, I never eat with a better stomach. Lactantius tells the story at large: 'Apud Lindum, quod est oppidum

Cujus rei hæc ratio redditur, si tamen ulla esse ratio in rebus vanissimis potest. Hercules, cum eo delatus esset, famemque pateretur, aratorem quandam aspexit operantem, ab eoque petere cepit, ut sibi unum bovem venderet. Ille negavit fieri posse, quia spes sua omnis colendæ terræ duobus illis juvenis niteretur. Hercules solita violentia usus, quia unum accipere non potuit, utrumque fustulit. At ille infelix, cum boves suos mactari videret, injuriam suam maledictis ultus est, quod homini eleganti & urbano gratissimum fuit. great achievements which are ascribed to him [F]. There is a very particular circumstance related concerning his voracious way of eating; for it is pretended that he moved his ears (b): that phenomenon is very rare [G]. I believe it is a mistake to say, that he would devorat, illum sibi amarissime conviciantem, cum risu, & cachinnis audiebat. Sed postquam Herculi divinos honores ob admirationem virtutis deferri placuit, à civibus ei ara posita est, quam de facto βούζων, id est bovis jugum nominavit: ad quam duo juncti boves immolarentur, sicut illi, quos abstulerat aratori, eumque ipsum sibi constituit Sacerdotem, ac præcepit, ut iisdem maledictis semper in celebrandis sacrificiis uteretur, quod negaret, se unquam epulatum esse jucundius (32). — At Lindus, a town in the island of Rhodes, Hercules is worshipped with rites very different from those used in other places. For the sacrifice is performed not with praises, but with curses and execrations, and it is thought to be profaned, if a good word should even ignorantly escape from any who assist at the solemnity. For this they give the following reason, if there can be any reason for such foolish observances. Hercules, say they, passing that way, was hungry, and seeing a peasant at plough, desired him to sell him an ox. He answered, that he could not do so, having no other means of ploughing his land but by these two oxen. Hercules, making use of his usual violence, since he would not give him one, took them both from him. The poor man, seeing his cattle slain, revenged himself by execrations, which were very pleasing to this polite and elegant traveller. For while he was making ready this entertainment for his companions, and devouring these stolen cattle, he jeered and laughed at the misfortunate owner, who bitterly cursed him. But when afterwards it was thought fit, in admiration of his virtue, to decree divine honours to him, the inhabitants of that city erected an altar to him, which he actually called the yoke of oxen: at which they were to offer two oxen yoked, as these were which he took from the peasant, whom he appointed his priest, and ordered, that he should make use of the same execrations in celebrating the sacrifices, affirming that he had never eat with more pleasure.

[F] Some have denied that he performed those great achievements which are ascribed to him. Megacles in Athenæus censures the poets that came after Homer and Hesiod, for saying that Hercules commanded armies and took towns, when it is certain that he was a man who led a very voluptuous life, having many lawful wives, and getting children clandestinely upon a great many young women (33), addicted likewise to eating and drinking; so that after his example, they who made libations to him, left nothing in the glass, they drank it all up. Other proofs are brought (34) of his effeminacy, and it is pretended that Stesichorus was the first that armed him with a club, a bow, and a lion's skin. We find in Erasmus a passage that violently shakes that tradition of Hercules's effeminacy. It is in the explication of the proverb. Take heed of a man with a black breech (35). Erasmus tells us, that a mother gave this advice to her two boys, who were unlucky rogues. They had a mind to attack Hercules sleeping under a tree, but he awaked and tied them to his club (36), and laid them over his shoulders with their heads downwards. That posture discovered to them, that Hercules's back was very hairy, and that the hairs were very black and thick, which made them remember the advice of their mother, and made them fall a laughing. Hercules understanding what they laughed at, gave them their liberty. The words of Erasmus, which I am to cite, are these:

(32) Μη τῷ μελαμπύγῳ περιττόν. In Melampygon incidit. It is the forty third proverb of the first century of the second Chilian in Erasmus. (33) See Moreri at the word Achæmon. (34) Melampygon Græcis significat eum qui nigro sit potest: quo quidem cognomento notatus est Hercules quod eam corporis partem, non Lydorum more vulgari, neque candidam (quemadmodum effeminati solent) sed nigris pilis hirsutam ac sylvosam haberet. Nam Græci quemadmodum molles & imbelles, frædolose delicias, πυγάρους καὶ λευκοπύγους appellabant: itidem à diversis fortibus ac strenuis, μελαμπύγους vocare consueverunt, ut author est Lycophronis interpres. — Melampygon, among the Greeks, signifies one who has a black breech. This surname was given to Hercules, because that part of his body was rough with black hair and shaggy, and not shaved after the manner of the Lydians, or white (as those effeminate people are). For as the Greeks called the effeminate, and weak, and those who were enervated by luxury, white breeched; so, on the contrary, they usually called the brave and strong black breeched, as the interpreter of Lycophron assures us. See Suidas, in the article μελαμπύγῳ τῷ οἷς, in Melampygon incidit. See also Apostolius, Zenobius, & Diogenianus, in their Collections of Proverbs.

[G] That phenomenon is very rare. The journal A Collection of the Academiæ Naturæ curiosorum (37) speaks of a maid who moved her ears. The author of the News from the Republic of Letters, giving an extract of this journal, observed (38), that there was not reason to doubt of this particular, 'after what the abbot de Marolles attests of the philosopher Crassius, in the thirty second page of his Memoirs. He had a great resemblance, says he, to those pictures of the Cynic philosophers, which are to be found in the cabinets of the curious, being slovenly like them, with a long and bushy beard, and hair ill combed. He had one thing very particular, and which I never observed in any one else, which was, that he could move his ears backwards and forwards when he would, without touching them. Peter Messie relates, in the twenty fourth chapter of his first part, that St Austin saw (39) a man, who not only moved his ears as he pleased, but also his hair, without any motion of his hands or head. Give me leave to join to this some passages relating to this. I begin with a pretty long one of Casaubon (40). 'Istud planè communi hominum naturæ contrarium est, quibus [solis (41) ex omnibus animantibus (nisi forte simias excipias)] dedit aureis in ὁλοποιεῖται τῷ ΘΕΟΤΙ σοφία moveri suapte sponte nescias. [Nam quod scribit Martialis, Cinnae cuidam natum filium auribus: longis Quæ se moventur, ut solent asellorum, poetica sine dubio licentia est, non rei veritas.] Narrat tamen Eustathius sacerdotem fuisse quendam aureis motantem. Accepimus etiam à viris fide dignis, vias manifeste aures movere viro cuidam eruditissimo (42), cum per Allobrogum fines transiens, vivicomburii periculum sibi à magistratu imminere intellexisset: quod diceretur nefandis criminis reus Tolosa in Italiam fugere. — This is quite contrary to the common nature of men, to whom alone of all animals (unless you should except apes) God has given ears which have no self motion. (For what Martial writes of the son of one Cinna, who had long ears, which moved like those of asses, is undoubtedly rather a poetical invention than a true story). However Eustathius tells us of a certain priest who moved his ears. I have been informed likewise by men worthy of credit, that the ears of a certain learned man were plainly seen to move, when, passing through the confines of Savoy, he understood that he was in hazard of being burnt alive by the magistrates, upon a report that he was then flying from Toulouse into Italy, on account of his having been guilty of a heinous sin. Since Casaubon doth not doubt of the truth of Eustathius's report, nor of what was told him of the learned man that escaped from Toulouse, why doth he doubt of the story of Cinna's child, in the thirty ninth epigram of the sixth book of Martial? He would have less doubted of it, if he had taken notice of what St Austin says in the twenty fourth chapter of the fourteenth book, De Civitate Dei: sunt qui & aures moveant vel singulas vel ambas simul. — There are some people who move their ears, either singly, or both together; but also of what Vesalius attests. That great anatomist affirms (43) that he saw at Padua two men, whose ears moved. He elsewhere explains the cause of this motion. 'Interdum, says he (44), quibusdam raris fibris carnalis membrana quam carnosa vocamus supra aures augeatur, & modice auri proximam cutem, & ipsam quæ aures motu agit arbitrio. — Sometimes by means of certain delicate fibres, the fleshy membrane, which we call the carnosia, is enlarged above the ears, and gives a gentle arbitrary motion to the skin next to the ear, and even to the ear itself. Du Laurent affirms, that he has seen people that caused their ears to move (45). Valverdu saw the same thing in a Spaniard at Rome (46). Procopius compares Justinian to an ass, not only because of his dulness and stupidity, but also with respect to his moveable ears, which occasioned his being called in a full theatre δεινός γαῖδρος.

would be drawn in that posture, in one of his most famous pictures [H]. It is not true that his club was in a chapel at Rome [I], and that it kept away the dogs and flies.

γὰρ δὲ αὖτε, (which is to say, word for word, Mr Als) 'by those of the green faction, or the Praefini, which he was an enemy to.' I have read these words in la Mothe le Vayer, page 134 of the third Tome in 12mo. He cites the 36th page of Procopius's Secret History.

[H] I believe it is a mistake, to say that he would be drawn in that posture, in one of his most famous pictures. Coltar says so in his Dialogues. Let us set down the latter part of what he says there concerning Hercules. 'In the Anthologia a peasant praises very much Mercury's moderation, who is contented with milk and fruits, and he complains of Hercules, who would have abundance of oxen and sheep sacrificed to him. And being told, but this god preserves your flocks and herds so well. What is the difference, replied he, whether my flocks be eaten by the wolves, or by their keeper.'

(47) Entretien de Voiture de Coltar, pag. 32.

Here is Voiture's answer to Coltar. It is true, that Hercules gladly eat sheep, and in great quantities. The Argonauts, when they sailed to Colchos, left him in an island. Many pleasant reasons are given for it. Some say, that he broke all the oars in rowing: others say, that he was too heavy; some say, the Argonauts were afraid, he would carry away all the glory; and others, that it was because he eat too much. I remember I have read in a Greek poet, (that is to say Greek and Latin) that he moved his ears in eating, &c (48). Coltar answering his friend, tells him (49), that Hercules eat like a devil, and that, according to Athenæus, he had an ox for every meal. He cites Philostratus, in his picture of Theodamas. We there find these words, according to Vigenere's version, pag. 906 of the first tome. You have perhaps found it in Pindar, where, at Corenus's house, he eat an ox so entire, that he scarce left the bones behind him. Coltar cites also Lactantius, in the twenty first chapter of the Christian Institution (50), it is to acquaint his friend with the ceremony of the maledictions the Lindians used in sacrificing to Hercules. He tells him, that in that case Hercules was of the humour of Fortune, who is never honoured so much, as when she is reviled, and accused for all the changes and disorders that happen in the world, cum convitiis colitur, it is a saying of Pliny (51). He adds, that 'this Beef-eater (for so he was surnamed βουφάγος and βοθόινος), was in such reputation for gluttony, that the ancients consecrated a bird to him, called the Glutton: it is that which the French call la Foulque, the Latins Gavia, or Furca, and the Greeks ἀεγυς. It may be said of him, continues he, what Martial said of Tuca, that he was not contented to be a glutton, but would have it known and talked off.

(53) Οἷος δ' ἐν νύκτιον φαντάζετο πολλὰ μὲν φοιτῶν Περσέος δὲ ἐνὶ δρόμῳ. Qualem noctu sæpe videndum se obiectabat dormienti Parrhasio, talem hinc videre licet. Athen. lib. vi, pag. 344.

Non est Tuca satis, quod es gulosus, et dici cupis, Et cupis videri (52).

Once upon a time he appeared to the Painter Parrhasius, in the same state he was in, when his ears moved, and would be painted in that same posture, in which Theodamas had seen him. He quotes for that apparition, the twelfth book of Athenæus, and he observes, that in the thirty fifth book, and tenth chapter, of Pliny, one Dæmon, an Athenian Painter, brags that he drew this picture. It cannot be denied, that Athenæus reports, that Parrhasius boasted to have painted Hercules in the town of Lindus, just as he saw him in his sleep: he carried his boast so far, as to put this in the inscription of his picture (53), but it doth not follow from thence, that he gave Hercules that mobility of ears mentioned by Coltar. It is a strange boldness to affirm, first that Athenæus says, that Hercules appeared to Parrhasius, in the same condition he was in when his ears moved. Secondly, that Theodamas had seen Hercules in that same posture, but these two faults are inconsiderable, in comparison of the blunder I am going to observe. These are the words of Pliny. 'Pinxit Dæmon Athenienium, argumento quoque ingenio. Volebat namque varium, iracundum, injustum, inconstantem; eundem exorabilem, clementem, misericordem, excelsum, gloriosum, humilem, ferocem, fugacemque; & omnia pariter offendere. Idem pinxit Thesea . . . & in una tabula, quæ est Rhodi, Melæagrum, Herculem, Persea (54). — He painted the people of Athens, and the design of his piece was very ingenious. For he intended to represent them at once sickle, passionate, unjust, inconstant; exorable, merciful, gentle, proud, humble, fierce, and cowardly. He painted like wise Thebes . . . and in one piece, which is at Rhodes, Melæager, Hercules, and Perseus.' Pliny there reckons up the works of Parrhasius; the word Dæmon signifies the people of Athens, whose contrary passions Parrhasius had ingeniously represented. But here you see Coltar metamorphoses that picture of Parrhasius into a Painter, and pretends, that this chimerical Painter ascribed to himself the picture of Hercules, where that hero moved his ears. This is a new blunder; for in supposing that Dæmon was a Painter, no other picture could be ascribed to him, but that of Rhodes, wherein Melæager, Hercules, and Perseus, were painted, and which Pliny manifestly distinguishes from the Hercules at Lindus, which was drawn according to the Painter's dreams; & Herculem qui est Lindi talem à se pictum, qualem sæpe in quiete vidisset (55). But if we make the pretended Dæmon the author of the Hercules at Lindus, we must likewise ascribe to him almost all Parrhasius's paintings.

[I] It is not true that his club was in a chapel at Rome. A famous Protestant divine has spoke thus (56): You will frequently hear in our temples, Atheism and error assaulted and destroyed; these pests are driven thence by the odour of the word of GOD, which is purely preached there, as in old time at Rome, Hercules's club kept the dogs and flies from the chapel where it was. He cites the second chapter of Solinus, where there is nothing of this; but here follows what he says in the first chapter. 'Hoc sacellum Herculi in boario foro est, in quo argumenta & convivii & majestatis ipsius remanent. Nam divinitus illud neque canibus neque muscis ingressus est. Etenim cum viscificationem sacrificolis daret, Myiagræ deum dicitur impetratus, clavam vero in aditu reliquisse, cujus olfactum refrigerent canes: id usque nunc durat. — This little temple of Hercules is situate in the Forum Boarium, and there still remain in it proofs both of the sacrifice, and of the majesty of the god. By his divine Power, neither flies nor dogs enter into it. For when he gave the bowels to the priests, he is reported to have prayed to the god Myiagræ, and to have left his club at the door, the smell of which made the dogs run from it, and its influence continues to this day.' It is plain, that Solinus doth not affirm, that Hercules's club was still there, he only says, that Hercules left it in the entrance of the place, where he gave the priests an entertainment after a sacrifice, and that the smell of the club kept off the dogs. This was the club's effect; as to the flies, it was not that club that drove them away, but the prayers that Hercules made to the god Myiagræ. What was observed on that occasion, namely, that dogs and flies kept at a distance from this place, continued to succeeding ages. This is what Solinus says; but it was not necessary that the club should be preserved in the chapel, nor doth Solinus say it. If the Protestant divine had given us a true matter of fact, that club might be reckoned in the number of Talismans, and be compared to the fly which is engraven, as is said, upon the door of the shambles of Toledo, and which hinders the flies from entering in. To this purpose, I will relate a thing which I have read in a modern author (57), which is, that, at Misitra, the dogs do not enter into the mosques of the Turks, nor into the churches of the Christians. The Turks explain this by a miracle as to themselves, and by a natural reason as to the Greeks. Let us hear Mr Guillet.

(56) Sam. des Marets, Eschatalogue des Maximes du Clergé Romaines Provinces Unies, pag. 59.

(57) Guillet, Les célestes an-cienne & nouvelle. pag. 232, Dutch Edit.

The Turks speak of the discretion of these dogs, as of a miracle. These creatures sometimes slip into private houses, when they find the doors open; but the mosques need not be shut at all, the dogs never go into them. The Turks take occasion to make a wonder of it, and call that a miraculous respect, which is only an imitation of the young dogs, who have always seen the old ones keep off from the entrance of the mosques, where, in all likelihood formerly the Turks

Does that do not go into churches.

It is still less true that he set up columns at Cape Finisterre [K], and placed there a looking-glass of a wonderful Virtue [L]. Some say, that he lived but fifty years, and that he burnt himself at that age, because he was no longer able to bend his bow [M]. He was the last child that Jupiter had by mortal women [N]. It is said, that he was three days in the belly of a whale [O], and that he came out safe and sound, having lost nothing

‘Turks had soundly beat them, to make them lose the habit of running thither. Neither are dogs to be seen in the Grecian churches. The Turks do not wonder at that; but give a reason for it, which I find probable enough. I have said before, that when the Greek schismatics enter into their churches, they make so low a bow, that by the inclination of their bodies, they bring their hands to the ground. The Turks say, that the dogs, seeing them put their hands so low, imagine, it is to take up stones, to throw at their heads, and that the fear of that drives them from the churches.’

To return to Hercules's club, a great miracle has been told of it, namely, that being fixed in the ground it took root, and shot up into a tree. Περὶς τὴν τῶ ἀγάλματι τὸ ῥοπαλὸν θείναι φασιν Ἡρακλῆα. καὶ ὅτι γὰρ κοτὶναι τὴν μὲν (ὅτι πρὸς τὴν ἐνθου τῇ γῇ, καὶ ἀνεβλάστησεν αὐτῆς. Et clavum ab Hercule dedicatam perhibent, factam ex oleastro. Quod adjuvanti miraculum, haud scio an cuiquam fide dignum videri possit, eam clavum radicibus altis regerminasse (58). I add, that it was the Troezenians, who told this story. They had the image of Mercury Polygius, to whom Hercules had dedicated his club. Every body knows it was made of olive-wood. Pausanias says, that the tree was still shewn, from which it was taken. Hercules found it near the marsh of Saronis (59). Here is an article for any one that will undertake the collection of historical parallels, relating to certain stories of the Pagans and Christians; for we are told by travellers, that at the gate of the old fortrefs of Smyrna, there is a great wild cherry-tree, which the Greeks of the country say was the staff of St Polycarp, the first bishop of Smyrna, which a moment after it was planted in the earth, sent out branches (60).

[K] Nor that he erected columns at Cape Finisterre. The fable concerning the foundation of Corunna, which I shall speak of in the following remark, has persuaded some learned men, that Hercules erected columns in that place. Paul Jovius has fallen into that error: for which he has been thus censured by Ludovicus Nonnius. ‘Ab hac fabula persuasi nonnulli, credidere arcem Herculis fuisse, & alteras columnas ab illo hic fixas, non secus ac circa Gades, dictamque urbem hanc Corunna tamquam columnam: quod egregiam etymon apud Paulum Jovium, virum aliàs gravem & doctum, tantum valuit, ut ab imperito aliquo Hispanie antiquitatis persuasus, huic opinioni etiam subscriberet, cum in vita Gonsalvi Ferdinandi d'Aguilar, agens de adventu Regis Philippi I. in Hispaniam, ita scriberet: Nec diu Philippi amicorum suorum studia, votaque frustratus, ut sua regna ex arditro administranda susciperet, in Cantabriam Oceanum decedens, pervenit in portum, qui vocatur ad Columnas, fortasse quod ibi quoque alteræ Herculis columnæ, sicuti Gadibus, positæ fuerunt, quum eo externo litore terræ Hispanicæ finis. Sed opinio hæc infirmiori tibicine fulta, quam ut rationibus convelli mereatur (61). — This fable has made some people believe that it was a fortress built by Hercules, and that he erected pillars here, as well as near Cadiz, and that, the town was called Corunna, as it were Columna; this notable etymology weighed so much with Paulus Jovius, otherwise a learned and judicious man, that, on the authority of some person ignorant of the antiquities of Spain, he has gone into it. For he writes as follows in the life of Gonsalvo Ferdinando d'Aguilar, speaking of the arrival of Philip I. into Spain. Neither did Philip long frustrate the desires and wishes of his friends, that he might take upon himself the administration of his dominions. Having arrived in the bay of Biscay, he landed in the port of Columna, so called, probably, because certain pillars of Hercules were placed here as well as at Cadiz, this being the utmost point of Spain. But this opinion is so very ill founded, that it do not deserve a confutation.

[L] Nor that he placed there a looking-glass of a wonderful virtue. Ludovicus Nonnius having laid, that Flavius Brigantium of the ancients, is the present Corunna, adds, that the inhabitants attribute the foundation of it to Hercules, and that they say he built a tower in it, in which he set a mirror, which brought the most distant ships in view (62). The original of this fable is almost as ridiculous as the fable itself. ‘In tam ridiculam opinionem vocum ignorantia & antiquitatis imperitia ita lapsi sunt, nam cum turris illa specula dicatur, speculum illud mirandum sine opifice ullo confinxere (63). — They fell in to this ridiculous opinion, through their ignorance of language and antiquity, for this tower being called Specula in Latin, they without any artist formed this wonderful mirror or Speculum.

[M] He burnt himself because he was no longer able to bend his bow. Ως αὐτὸν ἀνέλκε μὴ δύνασθαι τὸ δεικνὺν ἐντέλναι τὸ βέλος πᾶντων κοτῶν γινόμενος. Ut igne vitam sibi abstulerit, quod arcum suum intendere non posset annos jam natus quinquaginta (64). — That he burnt himself to death, because being fifty years of age he could not bend his bow. Some who mispend their time in seeking out allegories, imagine, that in covered words here is signified, that Hercules no longer found himself capable of contenting a woman, and upon consideration of that grievous change, fell into so deep a melancholy, that he would live no longer. He would at this rate have been more impatient than Milo the wrestler (65), who seeing in his old age the weakness of his arms, which had been so strong and vigorous in his youth, was contented to lament this change with tears. If we give the article of Penelope, we will speak of these allegory-seekers; for they explain in the same manner, the nemo meo melius arcum tendebat Ulyssæ. — None could bend his bow like my Ulyssæ.

[N] He was the last child that Jupiter had by mortal women. Diodorus Siculus makes that observation to raise the glory of Hercules. He supposes, that Jupiter renounced all commerce with women, because he would not have his last productions inferior to his foregoing (66). He feared then, that the children he should get after Hercules, would not come up to him. Pliny the younger has said something (67) which puts me in mind of this thought. It turns upon Nerva's dying a little after he had adopted Trajan. I have read in Lactantius, a strong railery upon the greatest of the gods at last ceasing to beget children. ‘Cum vero dicantur aliqui (Dii) ex aliquibus nati, consequens est, ut semper nascantur, siquidem aliquando sunt nati; vel si aliquando nasci desierunt, scire nos convenit, cur, aut quando desierint. Non illepe Seneca in libris moralibus Philosophiz. QUID ergo est (inquit) quare apud Poetas salacissimus Jupiter desierit liberos tollere? Utrum sexagenarius factus est, & illi lex Papia fibulam imposuit? an imprevit jus trium liberorum? An tandem illi venit in mentem,

‘Et timet, ne quis sibi faciat quod ipse Saturno (68)? — Since some gods are said to be born of other gods, it follows, that they should continue to be born if they were once so, or if at any time they gave over, being born, it is fit that we should know why, or when, they did so. Seneca, in his moral writing, says very pleasantly: For what reason, pray, do the poets pretend that Jupiter, who was so great a lover of the sex, has now ceased from begetting children? Is it that being now past sixty, the lex papia has put a stop to his game? or has he got the privileges arising from being father to three children? or does he at last remember the proverb,

Expect that what you have done to others, should be done to you.

‘And is afraid lest some of his own sons should serve him as he served his father Saturn.’

[O] It is said that he was three days in the belly of a whale. I will make use of the words of the commentator nothing but his hair. After his death he was adopted by Juno; but it is said, that he refused to be associated in the college of the twelve great gods [P]. We must say something of the Gallic Hercules [2].

commentator upon Philostratus, to express that adventure, and the occasion of it. 'The gods having on a time conspired together to poison their sovereign Jupiter, as he came to discover the plot by Themis, he prevented them, and punished them, some in one manner, and some in another. As for Neptune and Apollo, he sent them in his rage to serve the masons, who were building the walls of Ilion; where being hired by Laomedon, after the work was finished, he indeed recompensed Apollo with abundance of sacrifices and offerings, but he made no account of satisfying Neptune. Whereupon the enraged god sent a horrible great whale, which disgorging great floods of sea-water upon the country, drowned it all; and Laomedon was obliged, by the oracle's advice, in order to deliver himself from this calamity, to expose his daughter Hesione, adorned with royal robes, as a prey to be devoured by this monster. Hercules, passing by chance that way, moved with compassion, offered the father to deliver her, if he would give him the horses that came of an immortal race, which he had received of Jupiter, for Ganymede who was ravished and carried away by him to heaven, to serve him as cup-bearer. The terms being agreed upon, Hercules, armed cap-a-pee, threw himself headlong into the throat of this monster; and descending from thence into his belly, remained enclosed there three days, hacking and hewing till he had quite destroyed it. Laomedon afterwards not fulfilling his agreement, Hercules returned to Troy with six ships, filled with soldiers, and sacked it; put Laomedon to death, carried Hesione captive, and made a present of her to Telamon, the father of Ajax, for being the first that scaled the wall (69). Vigener quotes no body. To supply that defect I will set down a passage of Tzetzes, which Mr Drelin-court has communicated to me (70). Τριςπερὸν γὰρ τὸν Ἡρακλέα καλεῖ διὰ τὸ ἐν τῷ κύτει τρεῖς ἡμέρας εἶναι ὡς ἑσπέρας καλεῖ Λυκόφρων διὰ τὸ ἀπὸ τῶν καὶ σκοτεινῶν εἶναι τὴν γαστέρα τῷ θυμῷ (71). The scholiast upon Homer (72) relates most of the things that I have cited from the commentator of Philostratus, and tells us this story was to be found in Hellanicus. Hercules did not come out the same way he went in; he came out through the breach, I mean through the belly of the whale, I have not been able to verify whether Natalis Comes has faithfully related what he cites from Andronicus of Tenedos concerning the loss of Hercules's hair (73): 'Ubi vero cetus accessisset hians in ejus os Hercules irruit, ubi cum per triduum fuisset, ceto disrupto exiit omnibus amissis capillis capitis, ut scriptum reliquit Andronicus Tenedius in navigatione Propontidis (74). — When the whale approached with open mouth, Hercules rushed into it, where, after continuing three days, upon the bursting of the whale, he came out having lost all his hair, as we are told by Andronicus of Tenedos, in his voyage to the Propontis.' Lycophron plainly intimates, that it was the heat of the whale's belly, which made Hercules's hair fall off:

Ἐμῶν δὲ δαιτὸς ἡπάτων φλοιδέμενος,
Τινδῶ λείβτος ἀργόμοις ἐπ' ἑσχαρμῆς,
Σμύνηςας ἐσάλαζε κωδείας πείδω.

[P] He was adopted by Juno, but it is said that he refused to be associated into the college of the twelve great gods. Juno, who had persecuted him so much while alive, found herself much disposed to love him when he was dead. Which verifies these verses of Horace:

— — — Diram qui contudit Hydram, Notaque fatali portenta labore subegit,
Comperit invidiam supremo sine domari (76).

(76) Horat. Epist. i, lib. ii.

He that kill'd Hydra, he design'd by fate,
To quell the monsters rais'd by Juno's hate,

Tho' he, the mighty he, had always try'd,
Found envy vanquish'd only when he dy'd.

Here follows what we are told by Diodorus Siculus. After Hercules was placed in the number of the gods, he was adopted by Juno, who loved him afterwards as a good mother. The ceremony of the adoption was this: Juno went to bed, and to imitate a true child-birth, she placed Hercules in such a manner, that he fell to the ground from under her petticoats. The Barbarians still observed that ceremony in their adoptions in Diodorus Siculus's time. Hercules was afterwards married to Hebe; but he refused the honour which Jupiter would have done him, of associating him in the college of the twelve great gods, and he justified his refusal by this reason, that there being no place vacant in that college, he ought not to be admitted into it, and that it would be very unreasonable to degrade any other God to make room for him (77). Juno had for a long time begun to act as a mother with respect to Hercules, but it was without knowing him. The matter of fact was this. Alcmena fearing the jealousy of this goddess, durst not own herself the mother of Hercules, but exposed him in the middle of a field, as soon as he was born. Minerva and Juno passed that way soon after, and Minerva beheld the infant with admiration, and advised Juno to give him suck, Juno did it; but the infant pressed her nipple so strongly, as gave her an intolerable pain, so that she left him there. Hereupon Minerva took him, and carried him to Alcmena, as to a nurse, to which she would recommend him (78). Here one might make a parallel betwixt Moses and Hercules.

[2] We must say something of the Gallic Hercules. A modern author (79) has imitated the Greeks, whilst he refused them. He has transferred to this Hercules almost all the actions of the others, and has left nothing to the Grecian but moral conquests, that is to say, triumphs over his passions. According to him, the Gallic Hercules built in Gaul, the city Alexia (80), he was attacked by Albion, king of Great Britain, and by Bergiona, both of them sons of Neptune. He defeated them in Provence, by the succours he received from his father Jupiter, who seeing the army of his son unprovided with arrows, discharged upon his enemies a shower of stones, which overwhelmed them (81). In quo (lapideo campo) Herculem contra Albionem & Bergiona Neptuni liberos dimicantem cum tela deficiente, ab invocato Jove adjutum imbre lapidum ferunt, credas pluisse, adeo multum passim, & late jacent (82). — In this story field, we are told, that Hercules, being engaged against Albion and Bergion, two sons of Neptune, after having spent all his arrows, invoked Jupiter, who sent him a shower of stones to his assistance, and indeed you would believe that it had rained stones there, they lie so thick and widely spread. He was the first of the Gauls, who penetrated into Italy thro' the Alps (83). He rendered Ombria habitable, having formed the river Arno out of it's marshes. He conducted some colonies of Gauls beyond the Pyrenees, where Gerion king of Spain was conquered. . . . He died in that expedition into Spain, and was honoured there with a stately temple, dedicated to him by the Tyrians, in the city of Gades, where his bones still remained in Pomponius Mela's time, who assures us of it (84). His accoutrements were, a quiver upon his back, a club in his right hand, a bow in his left, having the face of an old man, bald, wrinkled, swarthy, but venerable, drawing a croud of people after him, that were fastened with little chains of gold and silver hanging from his tongue, and though the chains were extremely small, none of these captives endeavoured to break them, but all, on the contrary, expressed by their looks, that they would be sorry to be delivered from so sweet a vassalage, as being less conquered by the force of arms of this Gallic Hercules, than by his eloquence, this is the description Lucian hath left us of him (85). This description agrees but ill with what Mr Menage has read somewhere, which is, that our old Gauls had a great veneration for Hercules, because he was GREAT and STRONG, and having declared upon their turning Christians, that

One of the most famous Athenian orators observes, that writers were extremely fond of celebrating the combats and courage of Hercules, but made no mention of his other qualities, which might yet have afforded them a very noble theme. He says that that part of Hercules's greatness which they had so much neglected, would require an excellent orator, and that if he had thought of treating of it in his youth, he would have shewn that that hero excelled other men, in prudence, knowledge, and justice, still more than in strength of body. Old age, adds he, will not permit me to undertake his panegyric in that light: I find myself too weak to handle a subject so important, and so copious (c). The reflexion of this orator may give us an occasion of reflecting upon the bad taste of mankind [R]. What this great Rhetorician has said of this hero's know-

REM. CRIT.]

Mr Audiger applies the best he can to his hypothesis a story of Diodorus Siculus. Viz. that a daughter of the king of the Celtæ, proud of her extraordinary stature, and great beauty, despised all who sought her in marriage; but when she had seen Hercules, she was seized with a strong desire to have to do with him by her father's consent. Her passion was gratified. Hercules got a son by her, named Galates (87). The historian doth not tell her name; but others say, her name was Galatea (88). This story is told otherwise in the Erotica of Parthenius. There we find that Hercules, as he drove Gerion's oxen from Erythia, went through Gaul, and came to Bretannus, the father of Celtina, who fell so deeply in love with this hero, that having stole Gerion's oxen from him, he would not restore them but upon condition of his lying with her. Hercules as well to recover his oxen, as on the account of Celtina's beauty, agreed to it, and got her with child of a boy called Celtus, from whom the Celtæ took their name. Herodotus (89) tells us that Hercules being in Scythia lay on the ground on his lion's skin and fell asleep. When he awaked he could not see his mares; he sought them every where; and when he came to the country of Hylæa, he entered into a cave where he found a damsel who had a human shape from her head to her waist, but downwards she had the form of a serpent. He asked her whether she had seen his mares? yes, said she, I have them in my custody, but I will not restore them unless you lie with me. He was glad to regain them at that price, but when the sport was ended she delayed as long as possible the restitution of the mares, for she vehemently wished to begin it again. At last not not being able to retain a man any longer, who was desirous to be gone with his mares, she said to him I have kept them for you, and you have rewarded me for it; for you have gotten me with child of three boys. Την δὲ γυναικα ἐαυτὴν ἔχων, καὶ ἐκ ἀποδόσειν ἐκείνην αὖτις οἱ μὴ δύναται, τὸν δὲ Ἡρακλέα μὴ δύναται ἐπὶ τῷ μισθῷ τέττα. κείνην τε δὴ ὑπερβαλόντα τὴν ἀπόδοσιν τὸν Ἰππῶν, βαλόντων ὡς πλείστον χρόνον συνείναι τῷ Ἡρακλέῃ. Mr Audiger pretends (91) that the Celtic Jupiter, the most ancient of the Jupiters, was the father of our Gallic Hercules, and that all the great divinities of Greece, were first known in Gaul (92). This is a very strange pretension, but not so chimerical as that of the learned Rudbeck (93).

[R] A remark of Isocrates may make us reflect on the bad taste of mankind.] The prudence, philo-

phy, and justice of Hercules were qualities infinitely more valuable than the strength of his arms: and yet the orators and poets praised him only for the actions he performed by that strength; and they suffered the perfections of his mind to fall into oblivion. Καὶ τῇ φρονήσει καὶ τῇ φιλοσοφίᾳ καὶ τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ, πλεον διεγεγονότα παρὰ τῶν προγεγενημένων. ἢ τῇ πόρῃ τῇ τῷ σώματι. Et prudentia, & literis, & justitia plus antecelluisse (Herculem) superiorum temporum hominibus omnibus quam robore corporis (94). They did so as well because they themselves were more affected with what is shining, than with what is solid, as because they were persuaded that their auditors and readers would much more applaud stories of battles, than a description of virtues which are exercised in times of peace. Horace has very well observed this in supposing that the shades lent a favourable ear to the poems of Sappho and Alceus, but were more delighted with the latter, because they treated only of war, revolutions of state, banishments, &c. (95).

CREECH.

Besides, it must be observed that tyrants overcome and monsters subdued, and, in a word, times of confusion and slaughter, are subjects more proper to shew the wit and eloquence of a writer, than is the conduct of an uniform life led according to the rules of virtue. A historian who has no great events to describe, falls asleep over his work, and makes his readers yawn; but a civil-war, two or three conspiracies, as many battles, the same leaders sometimes humbled, sometimes exalted, sharpen his pen, warm his imagination, and always keep his readers in breath. I really believe that if he were commanded to write a history of a quiet reign, and all of a piece, he would complain of his fate much in the same manner with Caligula, who complained that in his reign there did not happen any great misfortunes. Queri etiam palam de conditione temporum, suorum solebat: quod nullis calamitatibus publici insignirentur. Augusti principatum clade Variana: Tiberii, ruina spectaculorum apud Fidenas, memorabilem factum: sui oblivionem imminere prosperitate rerum. Atque identidem exercituum cædes, famem, pestilentiam, incendia, hiatus aliquem terræ optabat (97). He used openly to lament the condition of the times in which he lived, because they were not distinguished by any public calamities. Saying that the reign of Augustus would still be remembered, on account of the defeat of Varius; and that of Tiberius, by the fall of the theatre at Fidenæ; but that he was in hazard of falling into oblivion, because of the prosperity of the times. He would often express his wishes for the cutting off of armies, for famine, burning of cities, and earthquakes. Delolations, and public calamities, are an advantage to an historian, and give lustre to his writings. He pities, if he be a good man, the illustrious Vestal who was buried alive; he abhors the tyrant who, to make his reign more remarkable, oppressed her (98); but yet it is a favourable topic, and very advantageous to his pen, and an ornament to his book. His work is a vessel that never fails better than ledge, may be confirmed from antiquity, which has owned a most intimate relation between the Muses and Hercules (d). Hence he was surnamed Musagetes, that is, the companion and conductor of the Muses, and on this account these nine goddesses were put under his protection in the temple which Fulvius Nobilior caused to be built to him [S]. The thought which Posidonius made use of to ridicule a passage of Æschylus's tragedies was not just; Strabo, who censured him, did not know wherein the real fault of it lay [T]. It concerns a certain shower of stones, which fell in favour of Hercules when he was fighting the Ligurians.

than in a storm; a tempest is his best gale: a calm is as disagreeable to it as to a real ship: and when an historian can begin like Tacitus with 'Opus agredior optimum casibus, atrox præliis, discors seditionibus, ipsa etiam pace sævum. Quatuor Principes ferro interempti. Tria bella civilia, plura externa, ac plerumque permixta (99). — I begin a work fruitful in great events, horrid with wars, divided by seditions, and terrible even in peace. Four princes slain: three civil wars, more foreign, and for the most part both joined together; he prepossesses his readers in his favour, and knows very well he has found an advantageous subject. But after all, it is a mark of a depraved taste to prefer an account of warlike actions before that of an equitable conduct; and to admire a man more for the strength of his arms and for his boldness, than for his virtue, that makes him master of his passions, and moves him to establish good laws amongst his neighbours. This virtue, tho' it shines less than the other, has much more of true grandeur in it; there is more reality in the qualities of Hercules, which writers have passed over in silence, than in those which they have so pompously magnified. But what shall we say, they followed the taste of the public. Note, that young people are much more delighted with romantic than real histories, and that after age has ripened and rectified our judgment, we would rather read a Thuanus and a Mezerai, than a Calprene or a Scuderi. But few people lose the taste of their childhood with respect to the description of a peacable reign, and to the history of one full of troubles and great events.

[S] The Muses were put under his protection in the temple. This temple was built by Fulvius Nobilior, who conquered the Ætolians in the year of Rome 565. He was then consul. The principal of their cities was called Ambracia; he made himself master of it, and finding the statues of the nine Muses there, he carried them to Rome, and consecrated them in the temple which he built to Hercules, and put them under that god's protection. I believe we should not have known these circumstances, had not an orator, who lived five or six ages after, made mention of them. His words deserve to be cited. 'Ædem Herculis Musarum in circo Flaminio Fulvius ille Nobilior ex pecunia Censoria fecit, non id modo secutus, quod ipse litteris & summa Poëtae amicitia duceretur, sed quod in Græcia cum esset imperator, acceperat Herculem Musagetem esse, id est comitem ducemque Musarum, idemque primus novem signæ, hoc est omnium Camænarum, ex Ambracienſi oppido translata, sub tutela fortissimi numinis consecravit, ut res est, quia mutuis operibus & præmiis juvari ornarique deberent: Musarum quies defensione Herculis & virtus Herculis voce Musarum

(100). — Fulvius Nobilior built a temple to Hercules and the Muses, in the Circus Flaminian, out of the money arising from the office of censor, this he did not only because he was a friend to letters and to the Muses, but because he had learnt, while he was general in Greece; that Hercules was named Musagetes, or the companion and leader of the Muses. It was he likewise, who first put the statues of the nine Muses, which he brought from the city of Ambracia, under the protection of this powerful deity. And very properly too, because they ought to assist and adorn one another with mutual service and rewards. The Muses should owe their repose to the valour of Hercules, and the valour of Hercules should be celebrated by the voice of the Muses. This orator has reason to say that great warriors and the Muses stand in need of one another; it belongs to the former to procure repose and security of the Muses, and to the latter to immortalize the noble actions of heroes by their songs. One might, according to the notion of the same orator, apply to our Hercules what has been said, that they who do noble actions worthy to be celebrated by the poets, are lovers of verse (101). Observe that Statius supposes that Hercules understood music well.

Alcides, tenſoque modos imitabitur arcu (102).

Arise Calliope and tune the lyre,
Alcides to the air divine ſhall raiſe,
His voice ſublime, and, with his twanging bow, ſhall join in conſort.

Others observe that he understood Astrology: Gabriel Naudé gives this for certain, but he makes use of it somewhat ignorantly, by his leave. It is in that part of his Coups d'Etat where he speaks of some persons who have used fraud to arrive at the honour of deification: what Hercules did, says he (103), was more ingenious; for being well versed in Astrology, witness the fables of his life which make him carry the heavens together with Atlas, he chose exactly the hour and time of the appearance of a great comet, to put himself upon the burning pile in which he was to finish his days, to the end that this new fire from heaven might be present as a witness, and make it believed of him, what the Romans afterwards would have the world to believe of their emperors, by means of an eagle which flew up from the midst of the flames, as it were to carry the soul of the deceased into the arms of Jupiter. Here is an author who supposes that the appearance of comets can be foreseen by Astrology. He is mistaken; his commentator has censured him for it (104).

Note, that the temple which Fulvius Nobilior caused to be built to Hercules, was almost ruined in the time of Augustus, but Lucius Martius Philippus (105) caused it to be rebuilt, and joined a portico to it. See Ovid at the end of his sixth book of Faſti and Marſial Epigram 51 book 5.

[T] Strabo, who censured a thought of Posidonius, did not know wherein the real fault of it lay. Æschylus supposes (106), that Hercules was admonished, that being to fight the Ligurians he should be destitute of arrows, fate having so ordained it, and in a place where he could not get a single stone; but that in that extremity he should be pitied by Jupiter, who by means of a cloud filled with stones would furnish him with arms with which he should beat the Ligurians. How much better had it been, said Posidonius, for Jupiter to have darted these stones upon the Ligurians and destroyed them, than to have reduced Hercules to such an indigence, ἢ τοσούτων δόλον ποιῆσαι λίθον τὸν Ἡρακλῆα. Quam ad tot lapidum indigentiam redigere Herculem (107). Strabo has answered this censure, and said two things, one is, that was need of abundance of stones, since the business was to beat a great number of enemies, so that in that respect the thought of the poet Æschylus was more probable than that of his censor. Τὸ μὲν ἐν τοσούτων ἀναγκαῖον ἦν, εἴπερ καὶ πρὸς ὄχλον παμπληθῆ. Ἐς τὰ ταῦτα γὰρ πειθανώτερος ὁ μυθογράφος τῷ ἀναγκαιότητι τὸν μῦθον. At verò tot lapidibus opus erat contra tantam multitudinem, ut hac quidem in parte fabulæ auctor probabiliora dixerit, quam fabulæ reprehensor (108). Secondly, he adds, that the poet having expressly said it was a thing ordered by fate, should have stopped the mouth of all critics; for if one should attempt to dispute upon predestination and providence, many things would be found both in the moral and physical world, which might give occasion to say, that they might have been better ordered in another manner; for example, it had been better to pour rain upon Ægypt than to moisten it with the waters of Æthiopia; it had been better if Paris had been ship-wrecked in going to Lacedæmon, than to suffer him to carry away Helen, and to punish him for it afterwards to the great damage of the

HERLICIUS (DAVID), a Philosopher, Physician, and Astrologer, was born at Zeitz in Misnia the twenty eighth of December 1557. He stood in need of the assistance of his mother's relations to subsist at school; his father not being in a condition to advance what was necessary. He learned to make verses and to sing, and he gained something by that means on several occasions, when his necessities pressed hard upon him [A]. He staid but a short while in the university of Wittemberg, because Peucer, whose lectures he principally desired to hear, was imprisoned. Not being able therefore to improve under so learned a professor, he went to Leipzig, and studied there with very good success. He went afterwards to Rostoc, where the professors permitted him to give private lectures. He acquitted himself so well in them, that the duke of Mecklenburg made him sub-principal of the college of Gustraw. He continued in that station two years, and spent all the time he had to spare in the practice of Physic, and in calculating nativities (a). He spent the two following years at Prenslow (b), where he taught Natural Philosophy, and afterwards, in the year 1583, he accepted a like employ at Anclam, where he also practised Physic. He published the following year an Almanack, which was highly applauded [B]. From that time he made one every year for the space of fifty two years. He was called in the year 1585 to teach Mathematics in the university of Gripfswald, and he continued in that employment thirteen years, and published several books. He took his doctor of Physic's degree with great solemnity in that university in the year 1597, and a year after he accepted of the post of professor of Natural Philosophy at Stargard, a town of Pomerania, from whence he removed to Lubec in the year 1606, to exercise the same profession. He practised Physic there with great reputation (c), and yet, by I know not what fickleness of temper, he left that town in the year 1614, and retired to Stargard, where he spent the rest of his days. He died the fifteenth of August 1636. He had suffered a very grievous loss the year before, his house and all his papers being burnt in the fire that reduced Stargard to ashes the seventh of

I believe that Strabo acted more subtly than sincerely. There is no probability that Posidonius founded his raillery upon Hercules's wanting so many stones; yet because his words were capable of that sense, Strabo took advantage of it. But still he has not observed the true fault of the criticism; he should have answered Posidonius, that if Jupiter had intended only, and in general, to kill the Ligurians in the head, he had better have caused the shower of stones to fall upon their heads, than about Hercules; but designing that Hercules should be the author of the defeat of these people, it was requisite that he stones should fall near him and not upon his enemies. The critic went upon a notion which is an inexhaustible source of paralogisms. He did not consider that destiny includes all at once both the end and the means.

[A] He gained something by that means on several occasions, when his necessities pressed hard upon him.] This is what his friend Eichstadius ingeniously confesses. 'Sponte, says he (1), ad Poësin & Musicam exercendam se dedit, à quo utroque studio etiam posita in Academiis, quoties aliquā inopia laborabat, fructus non penitendos percepit, eoque sibi viros bonos & homines doctos patronos atque amicos conciliavit; sicut & habuit duos alios fratres Stralsundi in Pomerania & Musica Instrumentali & Vocali (quorum unus Cantorem Scholæ, alter Musicum organicum in templo Nicolaitano inibi egit) celebres atque excellentes. — He applied himself to poetry and music, from both which studies he afterwards, even in the universities, reaped no small advantages, when he was straitened in his circumstances; and he also thereby procured the friendship and protection of several good and learned men. He had two brothers in Stralsund, in Pomerania, who were famous for their skill, in vocal and instrumental music, one of which was a singing master, and the other was organist to St Nicholas's church there.'

[B] He published . . . an Almanack which was highly applauded.] See the words of Eichstadius (2): 'Anno 1584. primum suum Calendarium & prognosticon de mutationibus auræ & tempestatum in hoc physcatu publicavit, quod magno hominum applausu statim exceptum fuit. — In the year 1584 he first published his Calendar and prognostication of the changes of the wind and weather, which was received great applause.' This good success encouraged him to go on, and he had the satisfaction to observe that his Almanacks were translated into several languages, and that he on their account was looked upon as the ornament of Pomerania. Which work of his became so famous, that it was not only sought after by the Germans in their own language, but translated by foreigners into the Latin, Bohemian, Polish, Danish, and even Swedish languages, and being carried every where, our HERLICIUS was on account of this useful yearful performance considered as the honour and ornament of Pomerania. He loved this sort of labour so much, that one of the reasons why he quitted Lubbeck, was the hopes of having so much leisure at Stargard, as was necessary to finish a great work, where in Astrology was to have a considerable share (4). ‘ vendum & expoliendum opus illud magnum, quod de triplici Kalendario Ecclesiastico, Astronomico, & Astrologico conscribere inceperat, sed ante annum (6), prohi dolor, in communi Civitatis Stargardensis flamma una conflagravit, se frui posse sperabat — Being tired with a multiplicity of affairs, and with the cares and crowds that attended him there, and in order to find some repose, wherein he might at more leisure serve his GOD, his muse, and his friends, he again, in 1614, left Lubec, and all affairs being settled, went with his whole family to Stargard, in Pomerania, where he hoped to enjoy more leisure to finish and correct a great work which he had begun, intitled a Triple Calendar, Ecclesiastical, Astronomical, and Astrological; but alas! not a year after, it was consumed in that fire which laid the town of Stargard in ashes.’ See the following remark.

[C] Had it not been for that conflagration, the public could have seen an infinite number of his astrological observations.] To shew this man's application to the minutest particulars of astrology, I will here insert an instance which I find in his life. ‘ Interea suas observationes Astrologicas publici juris facere decreverat; sæpe enim ad me scripsit, quod ultra mille & ducenta collegerit Themata, quæ suo tertio operi Calendariographico & Astrologico inferere, siquæ veritatem aliquot Aphorismorum Astrologicorum probare nitetur: e. g. Quod Planetæ benefici, Jupiter, & Venus conjuncti, imprimis in octava domo longam vitam & annos (ultra 70) diuturnos polliceantur. Item quod Fomabant, insignis stella asterismi Aquarii, in octava domo celestem & gloriosum post mortem faciat. Item, quod Cauda Draconis in prima domo Cæli vel altero oculo carentem vel gibbosum fore minetur. Ut complures alios taceam. At hæc cum reliqua sua instructissima bibliotheca (cujus similem vix privatus alius tota nostra in Pomerania quoad Mathematicos, Historicos, & Medicos libros possedit) in communi Stargardiensi excidio flammis conflagravit (7). — In the mean while he had resolved to publish his astrological observations; for he frequently wrote to me, that he had collected above twelve hundred nativities, which he designed to insert in his third Calendar and astrologic work, intending thereby to prove the truth of several astrologic aphorisms. Such as, that the benign planets, Jupiter and Venus, in conjunction, especially in the eighth house, foretel a long life (of more than seventy years). Secondly, That Fomahant, a famous star in the constellation Aquarius, in the eighth house, makes a person famous, and celebrated after his death. Thirdly, that the Dragon's Tail, in the first house of heaven, threatens that a person shall want one eye or be crook backed. Not to mention many others. But all these, with his large library (which hardly had it's equal in Pomerania for mathematical, historical, and physical books) were burnt in the general conflagration of the town of Stargard.’

(9) Et quia in sua ingravescente ætate parcere oculis, & ad plures annos eorum usum referre volebat, haud raro à me petiit, ut sibi ad calculum geniturarum perficiendum & aliquod breve judicium de his ferendum subvenirem, cui lubens annui.

[D] He had got money by calculating nativities.] The Bohemians and Polanders were his best customers. ‘ Diversæ sæpe nationes ad eum confluxerant, & ob multa experimenta nominisq; celebritatem judicium de suis genituris ab eo poscebant Germani & exteri, præsertim Bohemi & Poloni, quorum liberalitatem præ reliquis predicabat (8). — People of different nations flocked to him, both Germans, and foreigners, because of his many experiments, and great fame, and asked his opinion concerning their nativities, and above all the Bohemians and Poles, whose liberality he used to extol above all others.’ And being one of those who take care of themselves, he was very careful of his eyes, that they might be of service to him in his old age; for which reason he had recourse to the assistance of his friend Eichstadius, who was likewise a lover of Astrology: He gave him nativities to calculate, and desired his judgment on them (9).

[E] He took great care that the uncertainty of his art should not be too much exposed.] He would never work for those who could not tell the hour of their nativity, choosing rather to be without their money, than to expose his credit (10). What he wrote to Eichstadius shows that he was sincere, and looked upon Astrology as a venerable science, the honour whereof he ought to preserve, tho' he were a looser by it. He could not endure that any one should ask him of what colour horses and cloaths must be of to bring good luck. He saw plainly, that he run a risk of being deceived in questions of that nature. He was angry with several Astrologers, who not using the like discretion, exposed judicial Astrology to contempt and censure; and, at bottom, he would gladly have been so rich as not to be necessitated to gain a livelihood by this low profession. ‘ Sobriè quoque hanc artem tractari volebat: hinc aliquando in suis literis ita ad me perscripsit: Utinam amicis fortuna me intueretur oculis, ut sine Astrologicis gerris senectuti meæ (quæ mihi cæcitatem minatur) prospicere possem, nunquam γὰρ ὧσα calculo inquirerem. Interim quando multi plura inquirunt, & scire desiderant, quàm Astra fert, aut patitur, aut habet, aut explicat, malo juxta conscientiam agere, quàm sanctam Uraniam nostram deturpare & velut stuprare, eique nigrum solem vel atrem notam aspergere: quum alias tot superstitionibus Chaldaicis nostra Ars cæteat, quas multi ex nostratibus adhuc mordicus tenent. Multi ex me scire laborant, qui colores vestimentorum & equorum fortunati sibi sint futuri? Hac & alia monstra quæstionum sæpè albis dentibus rideo, sæpè etiam detestor. Amo enim virginitatem nostræ Artis nec patiar eam ita nefario stupro pollui, ne Mifastologi hocce abusus in contemptum Astronomiæ nobis objicere possint (11).’ It is hard to imagine how a man, who had so much business in Physic (12), and who never had any children should fear to want necessities in his old age, unless he calculated nativities. This might give credit to those scandalous stories that went of him, and make one believe that he was too expensive in his amours.

[F] The prediction which he published against the Turks had not it's accomplishment.] Mr Thomafius made an oration at Leipzig the fifteenth of August 1665, by way of thanksgiving for the peace concluded betwixt the emperor and the the Ottoman Porte. That peace had very much disgusted the Millenarians, because they had foretold that the downfall of the Turkish empire was near. They founded their predictions upon some texts of Scripture, and upon many prefaces which they interpreted according to their fancy (13). This is their way, they renew it every day. Thomafius is amazed that after so many false prophecies, which have been vended concerning this pretended approaching downfall of the Turks, people are not more cautious in prophesying. It seems that the more people have been deceived, the less one ought for the future to fear being so, since, after all, the word of God, which cannot lie, has promised us the overthrow that potent monarchy. It is this therefore that emboldens the new prophets. The orator doth not stop at this reason; he thinks that the desire these gentlemen have of enjoying the golden age upon earth seduces them. ‘ Sed fortasse curiositati huic nihil potentiorum stimulum admovent, quàm nescio cujus aurei seculi per mille duraturi annos persuasio, ubi profligatis ab omni latere hostibus Deo dilecta cohors in otio sit suavissimo victura. Trahimur omnes beatæ his in terris vitæ cupiditate. Itaque si qua nobis eam fama polliceatur, ei sententissimas aures adjungimus inque omnes articulos temporis, qui favore huic affectui videntur, enixè vigilamus (14).’ After this he represents to his auditory, that there has not been any considerable war in the XVIIth century against the enemies of the true church, but predictions have been propagated, promising an utter ruin of the Pope or the Turk, or of both together. The glory of this defeat was promised to Frederic king of Bohemia, afterwards to Gustavus Adolphus, and then to Charles Gustavus. ‘ Tantæ victoriæ lauream erant qui superioris Germanici belli tempore Friderico Palatino, erant qui Gustavo Adolpho Suecorum Regi, erant qui Carolo Gustavo destinarent, cum is Poloniam complishment [F]. He was twice married, and was very unfortunate in his first wife [G]. It was perhaps his own fault; for he was accused of being one of those lechers, who go abroad to seek mistresses. His friend makes but an ill apology for him on this score [H].

ante hos novem annos infestaret (15). Afterwards he speaks of our David Herlicius, who promised about the end of the XVth century, that the Turk should be soon destroyed. 'Plenus talium in primis est, Davidis Herlicii, in aliis fortasse prædictionibus, quam in hæc felicioris Astrologi, libellus, quem sub finem ævi superioris, miserè Pannoniam vexante Turcâ, vulgavit. Ibi Daniele, Apocalypsin, dictum Eliæ, prælagia Johannis Hilteni, Antonii Torquati Ferrarientis, Turcarum ipsorum, cursus siderum, conjunctiones planetarum, quasi in exercitum unum conscribi video, quo in animis hominum ultimo prælio cum Turcâ decidatur (16). — But above all, a book of David Herlicius, (an Astrologer who was perhaps more successful in some of his other predictions than in this) which he published about the end of the last century, when Hungary was miserably ravaged by the Turks, is full of such predictions. There we find Daniel, the Apocalypse, the promise of Elias, the prophecies of John Hilten, Antonius Torquatus of Ferrara, of the Turks themselves, the courses of the stars, the conjunctions of the planets, all drawn together, as it were into one army, to fight this final battle against the Turks in the minds of men.'

[G] He was very unfortunate in his first wife. God knows why, faith the historian. 'Anno 1593, honestissimam virginem Reginam Hungers primarii civis Primislavensis filiam in matrimonium accepit, cum qua tamen non adeo concorditer (causam novit Deus) vixit, & sine fructu matrimonii per 17 annos (17). — In the year 1593, he married Regina Hungers, daughter to one of the chief citizens of Preslaw, and lived with her, tho' not so amicably, as were to have been wished, (for what reason GOD knows) seventeen years, without having any children by her.'

(17) Eichstadius, ubi supra, pag. 76.

Seventeen years to people ill-matched is a pretty long term. We seldom find in the writers of the lives of famous men the ingenuity which we see here. Since I have been employed in this work, I have run over a great many elegies, and lives of learned men; but I have scarce ever read there that they lived ill with their wives: we are generally assured that the sweetest agreement imaginable has been the benediction of their hymen. The neighbourhood frequently know the contrary. I remember a story which deserves some attention. A learned Roman (18), who died in the year 1640, had kept his wife in so severe a captivity as not to suffer any body to see her, or her to see any body (19). He suffered not so much as the parson of the parish to enter his house at Easter, to take an account of the persons in his family, and to sprinkle holy-water, as is the custom at Rome. He said that the Pope going that way gave his benediction to the house, and that it was enough; and if the parson was importunate the gentleman threatened to cudgel him (20). One day demanding a dispensation for his wife from keeping Lent, the priest answered he would not grant it, unless he saw with his own eyes the condition of the sick person; the husband replied aloud that the disease lay in her matrix: do you want, added he, to see the seat of the distemper? Niccius Erythræus was present at this discourse. 'Atque ipsemet adfui, cum in sacario S. Spiritus in Saxia Parocho, neganti, non aliter se uxori ejus potestatem facturum velle, carnibus in quadragesima, nisi suis ipse oculis, quo morbo affecta esset, aspexisset, palam multis audientibus, dixit, Uxori meæ morbus in matrice inhæret, placet ne morbi locum aspicere?' It is easy to judge whether a man of this humour could live forty five years with his wife, without any sort of dispute. And yet this is asserted in his epitaph placed in the 275th page of the Bibliotheca Romana of Prosper Mandosio. 'Sed quod raro contingit cum Claudia Sebastiani Tiburtina uxore sine querela conjunctissime vixit annis XLV. — But what very seldom happens, he lived forty five years with Claudia Sebastiani of Tivoli, his wife, in the strictest amity, without the least misunderstanding.' Neither epitaphs nor elegies are to be trusted to.

[H] His friend makes but an indifferent apology for him on this score. Some, says he, maintain, that Herlicius loved young women, and his stars would have it so; but if any one would conclude from hence, that the troubles of his first marriage rose from this, I answer in his justification that he had no child by either of his wives, and that he was used to say that he sowed in barren ground; and consequently he desired only to be loved by young women, and not to enjoy them. 'Ferunt nonnulli cum, quum ætas ferret, non abhoruisse à puellarum amoribus, id quod in genesi ejus conjunctio Veneris cum Marte præ se ferre videtur. Quod si quis hinc eum fortè salacem, & hinc multas turbas in priore matrimonio ortas esse dixerit, ille sciat, D. HERLICIUM ex utraque sua conjuge nullos liberos vel Herlicium suscepisse, sed illorum exortem fuisse, atque in sterili agro (ut dicere solebat) laborasse, & proinde animo juvenularum mutuo potius, quam coitu captum esse (21).' To confirm this apology Cardan is alleged, who has proved himself lascivious by the multitude of his children (22). Never was a more wretched apology; for, in the first place, Herlicius did not boast of any continence or moderation; he only complained that he had cultivated a barren soil. He had there fore laboured, and he confessed it. What conclusion will you draw after this, from his having never had any children? Will you hence conclude, that if he endeavoured to get the love of young women, it was only for the pleasure of being loved by them, without any farther pretensions? But there are no engines strong enough to draw that conclusion. In the second place a barren wedlock is no proof of a lesser incontinence; on the contrary, Physicians say, that too great a lasciviousness is one of the obstacles to conception; and that the reason why there are unfruitful marriages the first year, is the two frequent commerce of the new married couple; so that before the first fires are over, nature being interrupted and diverted cannot take her measures right. Read Aristotle cited by Montagne (23). 'It is requisite, faith Aristotle, to approach a wife prudently and severely, least the too irritating pleasure should carry her beyond the rules of reason. What he says for continence, Physicians say for health; that an ardent, voluptuous, and too frequent pleasure, adulterates the seed, and hinders conception. On the other hand they say, that as to a languishing congress, such as this is naturally, the use of it must be rare, and with considerable intervals in order to furnish it with a just and fertile heat.'

Laurence Joubert, a famous Physician, employs one of the chapters (24) of his vulgar errors to oppugn those, who think by frequent embraces to have children, and those who think to have fewer by a contrary method. The ignorant vulgar, says he (25), mistake two contrary ways, totally contradicting their intentions; some being very desirous of children, think to obtain them by the frequency of their embraces; and others by much abstaining from their wives, think to avoid the increase of their family. The first imagine that if they fail at one time, they shall succeed at another: but it happens quite otherwise; for what might have been effected by the first enjoyment may be destroyed by a second. And which is more, these frequent returns, without the invitation of nature, give not the seed time to elaborate and perfect itself, and therefore it is not fecund and prolific, but rather as insignificant as water.

It is a true saying that it is better not to have one's cause pleaded than to commit it to a bad advocate. Eichstadius deserves to be compared to him whom the Prætor Scipio recommended to one that was at law. Ille Siculus cui Prætor Scipio patronum causæ datat hospitem suum, hominem nobilem, sed admodum stultum: Quælo, inquit, Prætor, adversario meo da istum patronum, deinde mihi neminem dederis (26). — The Prætor Scipio having assigned a guest of his, who was a man of quality indeed, but of very mean parts, to be advocate to a Sicilian, in a cause which he was prosecuting: I beg, said the Sicilian, that you will give that advocate to my adversary, and then I shall have occasion for none.

He published a good many books [1]. I forgot to say that he was a good Lutheran.

[1] He published a good many books. Most of them orations, or tracts of Philosophy and Physics: the Sieur (27) Memorie Medicor. Decad. i, pag. 87. are in High-Dutch: the Latin are either poems or Witte gives a catalogue of them (27).

HERMANT (GODFREY) one of the most famous writers of the XVIIth century, was born at Beauvais the seventh of February 1617. He gave in his childhood proofs of a very lively wit and happy memory, qualities which he preserved to the day of his death. He learned the Latin and Greek tongues with a wonderful ease, and at an age at which others can hardly read and write. He was but twelve years old when Augustine Potier, bishop and count of Beauvais, sent him to Paris to study Rhetoric under the Jesuits. After he had finished his course of philosophy in the college of Navarre, and of Divinity in the Sorbonne, this good prelate, who loved him, called him back to Beauvais to teach the Classics and Rhetoric. He sent him again to Paris in the year 1640, to be tutor to Mr d'Occerre, his nephew. That employ did not hinder him from teaching Philosophy in the college of Beauvais, in order to be admitted into the house of Sorbonne. He was made bachelor in 1641, and canon of the cathedral church of Beauvais in 1642. Hitherto his merit was known only to his friends, but the Jesuits having presented a request to the king in the year 1643, to be incorporated into the university of Paris, Mr Hermant was made choice of to write against it, and he composed three or four pieces which got him great reputation. Mr le Camus, bishop of Bellai, congratulated him upon it, in a manner that deserves to be related [A]. He represented to him the resentment of the Jesuits against him; but as Mr Hermant was no ambitious man, he did not give them an opportunity to employ their great interest to his prejudice. He was made prior of the Sorbonne in 1644, a licentiate and rector in 1646. It was in the second year of his rectorship that there happened one of these fortuitous conjunctures, which hinders some people from seeing the vanity of judicial Astrology [B], and from absolutely condemning

[A] Mr le Camus congratulated him upon it in a manner that deserves to be related. Mr Hermant wrote four pieces on that occasion. I. Observations upon the Request of the Jesuits. II. The first Apology for the University. III. Academical truths. IV. The second Apology, which is a reply to the answer which the Jesuits published. He did not prefix his name to these pieces. Mr le Camus, bishop of Bellai, having discovered Mr Hermant to be the author of those pieces, made him a visit at Albiac-House, where he lodged, and, embracing him, said, that he blessed God for having not only given him so much sense and learning at so early an age, but also a heart and courage not to fear the hatred and vengeance of so terrible a society as that he wrote against. Yet all the evil that the Jesuits could do him whilst he lived, did only consist in their not loving him, nor speaking of him with esteem, though he had been their disciple. His modesty sheltered him from their most formidable resentment, and they could not oppose him in his pretensions to the first dignities of the church which they dispose of, because he was so far from seeking them, that he sincerely slighted them, and even refused them when he was pressed to accept of them (1). The want of ambition often proves the best sanctuary.

[B] While he was rector, there one of those fortuitous conjunctures, which hinders some people from seeing the vanity of judicial Astrology. Here are the words of a Memoir which has been imparted to us (2). Marcellus, professor of Rhetoric in the college of Lisieux, had composed in Latin an elogy on mareschal de Gassion, who was killed with a musket-shot at the siege of Lens, and he was ready to deliver it in public, when an old doctor, who made it his chief business to read all the papers that were posted up, being surprized to find that which gave notice of Marcellus's oration at two of the clock, ran to complain of it to Mr Hermant, and represented to him, that it ought not to suffer, that, in a Catholic university, a man should deliver a funeral oration in praise of a person who died in the Protestant religion, and desired him to call a convocation to determine the matter. Mr Hermant not being able to refuse this to him, it was resolved by a majority of votes, that Marcellus should be immediately forbid to deliver the panegyric on Mr de Gassion; and the Astrologers triumphed upon it, observing to every body that in the Almanack of the famous Larrivey, amongst the predictions of that same month, there was written in great characters, LATIN PERDU, Latin lost. That we may the better understand the circumstances of this prohibition I shall set down a passage of du Boulay (3). Mr Marcel, professor of Rhetoric in Lisieux's college, having advertised that he was to pronounce the funeral oration of mareschal de Gassion, the rector forbade him, because the said Gassion died a Huguenot; whereupon Mr James Desperiers, principal of the said college, going with the said Marcel to complain to the chancellor of France, they were ordered to submit to the rector's sentence. The act taken from the registers of the German nation testifies it, 22 December (an. 1647.) Ampl. D. Rector habitus Comitibus ex consilio D. D. Decanorum & 4. Procuratorum prohibuit D. Guillelmum Marcel, eloquentiae Professore in Collegio Lexovæo declamare laudes & præconia demortui Marescalli nomine Gassion, quod prolixo programme publico notum fecerat omnibus Studiosis; sed quia res erat pessimi exempli & contra Religionem laudare hominem in hæresi mortuum, noluit Academia acquiescere instantissimis precibus D. Marcelli neque D. Desperiers Gymnasiarchæ Lexovæi, qui provocarunt ad D. Seguier Franciæ Cancellarium, qui eos auditos ad Ampl. D. Rectorem hujus rei Judicem remisit. Et sic silentium illis impositum est. — December 22. 1647. The rector in convocation, with advice of the Deans, and of the four Procurators, prohibited Mr William Marcel, professor of Eloquence in the college of Lisieux, to pronounce any panegyric on the late mareschal de Gassion, as he had advertised that he intended to do; but it being of very bad example, and contrary to religion, to praise a person who died a Heretic, the university rejected the earnest suit of Mr Marcel, and of Mr Desperiers, head of the said college of Lisieux, and they having thereupon applied to Mr Seguier, chancellor of France, he, after hearing them, referred the matter to the rector as the proper judge in this case. And by that means they were put to silence.

How many reflexions might be made upon that spirit of policy, or false devotion, which makes the church of Rome deny to Heretics the praises that are due to them? But, setting reflexions aside, I shall confine myself some facts, and shall begin with a passage in the News from the Republic of Letters, taken from the extract of a book of Daniel Francus de Populorum Indicibus Librorum prohibitorum & expurgandorum. He recites the instructions that are given to the inquisitors, wherein we see amongst other things an order to expunge without exception all praises given to Heretics. These are things, which we must see with our own eyes, in order to believe them, it being otherwise impossible to imagine that religion could give such a turn to our minds. Bellarmine

'condemning it.' I will give an exact catalogue of the works which he published [C], and I will say something of his difference with Father Maimbourg [D]. He died a sudden death at Paris in the street the eleventh of July 1690, as we shall see in his epitaph. I will insert it entire, tho' it was not put upon his tomb [E], his enemies having had malice

'was so persuaded, that it is part of the character of an orthodox never to praise a Heretic, that the author censures him for having positively said *, that it was never known that the Catholics have praised the doctrine or the life of Heretics. However, he shews by the commendations which Cochleus, Aeneas Sylvius, Poggius Florentinus, the Jesuit Clavius, Mr de l'Aubespine, bishop of Orleans, and Caramuel, have given to Heretics, that Bellarmine's touchstone is not very certain. However, by this we discover the spirit of the Inquisition. It is something very singular; for the gentlemen of the Inquisition will have the prefaces of books, epistles dedicatory, and, in general, whatever doth any honour to persons out of the Roman communion, without excepting princes, to be expunged. Hence the Expurgatory Index's order, that if any historian has said, such a day Christopher the illustrious duke of Wirtemberg was born, Præclarus Dux Wirtembergensis, that the word illustrious, præclarus, shall be struck out, which yet is of so little consequence, that it is given in Latin to the meanest school-boy. They order also that all the capital letters put before proper names, to signify that a Heretic is called Doctor, Master, a famous divine, vir clarissimus, vir reverendus, be immediately expunged. The Jesuit Serrarius affirms in his Minervæ, that the praises of a Heretic in the book of a Catholic writer, are an abomination to God, like those abominable offerings mentioned in the twenty third chapter of Deuteronomy and eighteenth verse (4). I have read in a Paris Gazette, that, in 1633, the master of the sacred palace published at Rome 'a prohibition against the keeping of any prose, poetry, image, figure, or medal, made in memory of Gustavus Adolphus king of Sweden (5). Mr Sallo, giving an extract of a book of Father Bona, hath the following reflexion: 'This author, says he (6), is the first that hath given the catalogue of the authors whom he cites with his judgment upon each in particular (7). There are in this criticism things that are very curious. For the rest, we need not think it strange that this good Father speaks so ill of heterodox authors in this criticism, even in things where faith is not concerned, because he wrote at Rome, where it is a crime to like a Heretic's book.' Let us add to this the following words of Balzac (8). 'Madam de Saumaise requested me, by Monsieur Conrart, that I would give her some lines to be engraved on her husband's tomb. But I took care not to promise her any thing, being in a condition wherein I could not perform it, and afflicted with a distemper which deprives me of rest, and leaves no room for poetic thoughts. Besides, interments and whatever concerns funeral obsequies belonging to religion, I thought that the epitaph of a Huguenot could not be composed by a Catholic. I say an epitaph like this; which must be placed in a church; which must be written in a Christian style; and in which it would be difficult not to give to understand by some word favourably explained, that the deceased was passed from this life to a better. But you know, my lord, that these terms are criminal in our church, and that they have been condemned at Rome, in the writings of the greatest men of our age.'

Note, that this maxim of Rome is not always observed; for if you consult James Laurent, in the second and sixth chapters of his Prodiga Jesuitarum liberalitas, you will there find praises bestowed by Catholic authors on the virtue and learning of the heterodox. See the margin (9).

[C] I will give an exact catalogue of the works which he published. I call it so without any scruple, because I take it from a Memoir which has been communicated to us. He published in 1644 an apology for Mr Arnaud, his friend, against a libel of F. Noüet, intitled, Judicious Remarks upon the book concerning the frequent communion. He wrote, in 1651, under the name of St Julian, against the visions of Labadie an apostate Jesuit; and, under that of Hieronymus ab Angelo Forti, three Latin letters to Mr de Saintebeuve, against Mr des Marets, minister of Groningen, who had taken some advantage of a Catechism concerning grace, printed by order of a pious bishop. He published the life of St Chrysostome in 1644, that of St Athanasius in 1671, the Ascetics of St Basil in 1673, the life of St Basil and of St Gregory Nazianzen in 1674. He printed some spiritual dialogues upon St Matthew in 1690. Since his death his spiritual dialogues upon St Mark, and a little Treatise of Silence have been printed. A person of quality having begged of him the extracts he had made of the councils, he trusted them to a faithful amanuensis, who kept a copy of them, and published them at Lille in 1693, with this title, Clavis Disciplinae Ecclesiasticae, seu Index universalis totius juris Ecclesiastici. They are disgraced by some additions very unworthy of Mr Hermant, and which might prejudice his memory if the public was not told that they are none of his, especially the collection of letters falsely attributed to our first Popes. God grant we may one day see his ecclesiastical and secular history of Beauvais and Beauvaisis, and that it may not be lost in the hands of those who have seized upon it, to the prejudice of one of his friends, to whom the trusted it, and by his will appointed him to take care of the impression (10).

[D] I will say something of his difference with Father Maimbourg. This Jesuit, having in his history of Arianism transcribed all that was curious and fine in the life of St Athanasius, thought he had nothing to do but to cry down the author of it by an ill-natured preface, to disguise his plagiarism, fancying that no body would ever imagine he had vouchsafed to take any thing from a book which he treated with so much contempt. He blames Mr Hermant. I. For having inserted the passages of authors. II. For having put some illustrations at the end of his work upon the most difficult points. III. For having said that it is difficult to know any thing more about the order of the sitting of the council of Nice, except that simplicity, modesty and civility regulated it, and that the probabilities that are urged to the contrary upon this subject, are not solid reasons nor strong decisions. Mr Hermant printing the life of St Basil and St Gregory Nazianzen in 1674, after having justified himself in the preface against the three complaints of Father Maimbourg, ends his reply thus: 'But I am perhaps already blamed for having been so long in refuting an accusation which has no solid foundation; and in truth I might have intirely neglected it. For it is certain that an author draws upon himself the indignation of all equitable judges, when having profited by the labours of other men, and enriched and decked himself with their spoils, he makes them no other return for it but reproaches. This excuses me from answering in particular, a man who has thought fit to deal with me in this manner, and it suffices me that there is nothing more universally acknowledged by all the world, than this maxim of the canonists, which, in the first place, orders that restitution be made to those that have been robbed, spoliatus ante omnia restituendus. I ought to make a better use of my time, than to examine his faults, which are perhaps more numerous than he imagines. What he has censured in my history of St Athanasius, subsists by the invincible force of truth, and I need not bring new proofs for it, &c (11).'

[E] I will here insert his epitaph, though it was not put upon his tomb. Let us make use of the very words of the above quoted Memoir (12). 'A canon, who was his relation, had made him an epitaph, and the chapter approved of it; but some false brother having given notice of it to the Jesuits, they caused it to be suppressed by an order from court, at the same time that in the sight of all Paris, and to the scandal of the church, a chapel was profaned by Lully's Mausoleum. . . The epitaph designed for him was this:

Here lies expecting the resurrection, Godfrey Hermant born at Beauvais, famous for his learning, but more so for his piety, some time rector of the university of Paris and it's strenuous defender. Doctor and Fellow of the Sorbonne, and canon of this church, a lover of the holy discipline, if ever any man was so. Of an elevated genius, prodigious learning, and admirable eloquence. Tho' he deserved greater honours, he with a singular modesty refused those that were offered to him. To the learned he gave his Lives of the holy Fathers. To the pious, his Sacred Exerciſations on Matthew and Mark. To his citizens, his History of this city and diocese. To all men himself, in word, conversation, and charity. And to the poor all his possessions. He was snatched away by a sudden, tho' not an unexpected, death, being seized with a violent bleeding in the streets of Paris, of which he died there, in the year of our Lord 1690, 11. July, in the LXXIII year of his age. He was buried near the rails of this chapel, as he had desired, being of St Ambrose's opinion, that a priest was worthy rest where he had usually offered.

HERMIAS, a philosopher of Alexandria, in the Vth century, studied with Proclus under Syrianus. He had two sons, Ammonius and Heliodorus, who were of his profession, the first whereof became much more famous than the latter. Hermias was a very virtuous man, good-natured and sincere. He was as laborious as possible, but of a mean genius, and he could not invent the strong proofs which are necessary in philosophizing. He had an admirable memory, and recited to a miracle the lectures of his professor, and what he had read in books: his chief talent lay in this; for when he undertook to solve the objections and doubts of a disputant, he quickly exposed his weak side. His morals were wonderful [A]. It is said, that he did not approve the use of diminutive and fondling words, which mothers and nurses use to children, and that he severely reprimanded his wife (a) upon that account (b)

[A] His morals were wonderful.] We may judge of them by the maxims upon which he went in his bargains. He maintained, that we ought not to take advantage of the seller's ignorance, but acquaint him with the just price of the merchandize, if he is ignorant of it. They who did otherwise, were, according to him, guilty of a very great injustice. They did not rob like highway-men, and at the peril of their lives, but they defrauded the law, and corrupted justice. He did not approve the axiom, Volenti non fit injuria. He pretended that besides the injuries which are done by violence, there is another sort, which people may be guilty of without forcing the will of those we injure. He practised this fine theory; for one day perceiving that a man who was selling him a book did not put it at the just price, he acquainted him with it, and paid him more than he asked: he did the same thing on many other occasions, and as often as there was opportunity (1). Καὶ ὅτε ἀπαῖξεν τὴν δικαιοσύνην ταύτην, ἥς τοῖς ἄλλοις ἐδίδετο ἐπιτρέφειν, ἀλλὰ καὶ πολλὰκις, ὁσάκις συνέβαιεν ἀφιστῆναι τὸν πωπράσκοντα τὸ δίκαιον τίμημα ἐπεδείκνυτο. Nec semel hanc justitiam, cujus nullam alii rationem habent, verum etiam sæpius quoties venditorem debitum pretium ignorare contigisset offendit (2). Is there any thing more worthy of a philosopher? Christians who do so, are very rare.

HEROLD (BASIL JOHN) was born at Hochstet (a) upon the Danube, in Suabia, in the year 1511. He applied himself diligently to learning, and went, in the year 1539, to Basil, where he studied at the same time Divinity and History. He married there, and was appointed minister of a village of that canton; but as the Bookfellers found him fit for their service, they caused him to return to Basil in the year 1546. His application in preparing work for them, was incredible, and it was in acknowledgment of his long labours, that the magistrates of Basil made him a burgher in the year 1556. From that time he took the name of Basil: he was alive in the year 1566 (b). I will give the titles of most of his books [A]. Lezana, the annalist of the Carmelites, has committed a gross

[A] I will give the titles of most of his books.] I have spoke elsewhere (1) of his Philopseudes, five declamatio pro Des. Erasmo Rot. contra dialogum famulum anonymi cujusdam medici. That piece was printed at Basil in the year 1541 (2). His six books Belli sacri historica continuata, were printed with Gulielmus Tyrius, in folio, in the year 1560. They begin at the year 1185, and end at 1521. His Leges antiquæ Germanorum were printed at Basil in 1557, as also his Princeps juvenu-

tis, five panegyricus Ferdinando Archiduci Austriae dictatus, cum historiola Turcici belli anno 1556 gestæ. He translated many books into the German tongue, whose titles you will see in the Epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca. His Pannoniæ Chronologia is commonly joined with the decads of Bonfinius. a gross blunder speaking of this author [B]. König has made two writers of John Herold, and Basil John Herold. They are one and the same man. There was, in the XVth century, a Dominican, named JOHN HEROLDUS, a German. He was an eminent Divine, and a very good preacher. He composed several books, which have been published in diverse places. An edition of his works was published at Mentz in the year 1612, in three volumes in quarto (c).

bodie superstitum originibus, has been inserted in the first volume of Simon Schardius de scriptoribus rerum Germanicarum. Christopher Lehman (3) has censured him in the first book of his Chronicle of Spire; but an apology has been made for Heroldus. One may see how laborious he was, by consulting the preface (4), which he prefixed to the first Tome of the Treasures of Egyptus. He there promises a Collection of Stratagems, and I see in the Epitome of Gefner, that he published six chiliads of them. He composed a funeral oration upon the emperor Ferdinand, which was printed at Francfort, in the year 1564. It must not be forgot that he published (5) the writings of seventy six authors, under the title of Orthodoxographia, and a Hæresologia, seu Syntagma veterum Theologorum tam Græcorum quam Latinorum numero 18 qui grassati in Ecclesia hæreses confutaverunt, & præcipua Theologiæ capita tractarunt (6).

[B] Lezana . . . has committed a gross blunder speaking of this author.] He says under the year 1159, that St Antoninus was in the wrong to set down word for word a passage of John Heroldus, without consulting him. That passage contains a description of the original habit of the Carmelites. The Jesuit Papebroch took notice of that blunder, by saying, that St Antoninus lived a century before John Heroldus; for, adds he, St Antoninus died in the year 1459, and the Principis juventutis, which Herold dedicated to the archduke Ferdinand, was printed in the year 1557 (7). The difference is not quite a century: we have some books of Heroldus printed in the year 1540. Nevertheless, Lezana was very much mistaken. Here is a question which that Jesuit proposed to a Carmelite, who wrote against him (8): 'An Joannes Heroldus Hochstetensis, continuator belli sacri, cujus Continuationis singulos libros Catholicis Prælati dedicavit, semper cum laude etiam de religiosis mendicantibus locutus, sed in solis Carmelitis explodens enormem quem fingebant sese in Syria habuisse, monasteriorum ac Fratrum numerum; an, inquam Heroldus iste in dignus sit qui citetur, tanquam infelissimus sedis Apostolicæ hostis: esse juvenis sub nomine Heroldi Acropolitani scripserit Apologiam pro Erasmo, inter prohibitos relatum. — Whether John Heroldus of Hochstet, the continuator of the History of the Holy War, each book of which Continuation he dedicated to Catholic prelates, and who always mentions the friars, even of the mendicant orders, with honour, and only explodes the great number of monasteries and friars, which the Carmelites pretended to have in Syria; whether, I say, this Heroldus be unworthy of being quoted, as being an inveterate enemy of the holy see: to which we grant that, in his youth, he wrote an Apology for Erasmus, under the name of Heroldus Acropolitani, which is in the Index Expurgatorius.'

HERWART (JOHN GEORGE) chancellor of Bavaria, about the beginning of the XVIIth century, made himself famous by the Apology he wrote for the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, against the falsehoods of Bzovius, many other faults of whom he censured besides. Scaliger looked upon him as a bad chronologer (a).

Our Herwart was originally descended from a Patrician family of Augsburg. I will give the title of a chronological work which he composed, and that of a book published by his son [A], containing a very particular opinion concerning the first deities of Paganism; for the author asserts, that the winds, the needle touched with the load-stone, &c. were the first gods of the Egyptians, and that they were adored under mysterious names. A branch of the family of Herwart transplanted to Paris, makes there a considerable figure (b).

[A] I will give the title of a chronological work which he composed, and that of a book published by his son. Chronologia nova, vera, & ad calculum astronomicum revocata, at Munich in the year 1612. in quarto, pars prima. The other part was printed in the year 1626. Pars altera quæ est Chronologicorum seu emendatæ temporum rationis, adversus incredibiles aliorum errores, in quarto. You will see his son's Christian name in the title, which I have promised to insert. Admiranda Ethnicæ Theologiæ mysteria propalata, ubi lapidem magnetem antiquissimis passim nationibus pro Deo cultum, & artem qua navigationes magneticæ per universum orbem instituerentur à veterum sacerdotibus sub involucribus deorum dearumque, & aliarum perinde fabularum cortice summo studio occultatam esse noviter commonstratur. Accessit exacta temporum ratio adversus incredibiles Chronologiæ vulgaris errores. Opus diu desideratum. Jo. Fridericus Herwart ab Hohenburg in Schwindeck S. E. Bavarie &c. à Confiliis ex incompletis optimi parentis P. M. eruit monumentis, atque ad finem perduxit, à Munich 1626 in quarto. — The wonderful mysteries of the Pagan theology discovered; wherein is shown, that the load-stone was commonly worshipped by the ancients, and that the art of navigation by the magnet, was carefully concealed by the priests under the notions of gods and goddesses, and other fables. To which is added, an exact computation of time, in opposition to the prodigious errors of the common chronologers. A work long wished for. Completed by John Frederic Herwart of Hohenburg in Schwindeck, counsellor to the elector of Bavaria, from the unfinished labours of his deceased father, at Munich, 1626, in quarto. This book has a great deal of learning in it. There is a table before it, intitled, Tabula nauticæ & hieroglyphicæ descriptionis totius mundi vetustissima, quæ Theologiam Chaldeorum Babylonis, Hierogrammateon Egypti, & Orphei Phrygiæ, nec non Magiæ, Sophiæque Zoroastriæ & Magorum Persidis ostendit originem. — An ancient, nautical, and hieroglyphical description of the World, which shows that the Theology of the Chaldeans at Babylon, was the origin of the Hierogrammati of Egypt, of the Phrygian Orpheus, and also of Magic, and of the learning of Zoroaster, and the Persian magi. Vossius's silence about the books that I have mentioned may be well wondered at. That learned man doth not speak of them, either in his Collection of Chronologers, or in his great work of the Origin of Idolatry, where he has heaped together abundance of things concerning the load-stone, and where he has not forgotten to say, that the winds were worshipped as gods. Could he be intirely ignorant that Herwart the father, and Herwart the son, were authors? that would be wonderful in a man of so much reading. Could he have omitted to cite them, when he knew their works? that would be no less strange in an author, who was so apt to make a shew of his reading.

HESHUSIUS (TILEMANNUS), a divine of the Augsburg confession, born at Wesel [A] in the year 1526, has been famous for his restless and impetuous temper. He was very young when he had two considerable posts given him at Heidelberg, that of professor of Divinity, and that of preacher in the church of the Holy Ghost. He did not discharge them without many troubles; for there arose a violent dispute betwixt him and William Clebitius, concerning the doctrine of the Eucharist. The elector Palatine, Frederick III, being persuaded that Melanchthon's suffrage would be of great weight to terminate the dispute, consulted him upon that subject. His answer provoked Heshusius, who would not bate any thing of Luther's opinions; and as there was no appearance of seeing an end of these quarrels [B] whilst he staid at Heidelberg, he was ordered to depart. He retired into Saxony, and published some contentious writings in the university of Jena. Being called into Prussia, he taught divinity in Königsberg, till he was driven thence in the year 1577, with the ministers of his faction. He had a furious contention with Wigandus, upon controversies of small importance (a) [C]. He retired with his family to Lubec, and afterwards to Helmstadt, where he was made professor of Divinity. He died there the twenty fifth of September 1588. He strongly combated the doctrine of Ubiquity, in the conference of Quedlinburg, in the year 1583. [D].

[A] Born at Wesel.] According to Moreri he was born at Ober Wesel upon the Rhine, in the diocese of Triers; but Quenstedt (1) who says it was at Wesel in the country of Cleves, seems more worthy to be believed.

[B] There was no appearance of seeing an end of these quarrels.] Melanchthon's answer was composed in the year 1559, and was published after his death, contrary to his intention (2). Heshusius raged furiously against him, and forgot all the respect that was due to that great master. 'Heshusius itaque cum Lutheri de cena sacra sententiam mordicus retineret ac propugnaret, à principe Electore, ut finis esset conviciorum & infestationem in sua urbe, dimissus of- fensusque vehementer judicio Melanchthonis de se acerbè respondit, ac ne mortuo quidem & benè merito preceptorì pepercit (3). — Heshusius therefore being very tenacious of Luther's doctrine concerning the Eucharist, the elector, in order to put an end to quarrels and invectives in the city of his own residence, dismissed him, and he being highly offended at Melanchthon, on account of the judgment he had given against him, wrote a most bitter answer against him, and did not even spare him after his death, tho' he had been his master, and had deserved other treatment from him.' Calvin censures him for that fury against Melanchthon. 'Paulisper expendant lectores, says he (4), quam atrociter Philippum Melanchthonem suum præceptorem, ejus memoriam sanctè revereri debu- erat, fugillet ac laceret . . . Probrosi elogii, Philippum ita digito monstrat, ut videri possit data opera materiam ejus traducendi in scribendo libro cap- tasse. — Let the readers only observe how outrageously he calumniates and maltreats Philip Melanchthon, his own master, whose memory he ought to have re- vered . . . He points him out with such spiteful eulogies, that he seems on purpose to have laid hold of all occasions of traducing him in that book.'

[C] He had a furious contention with Wigandus, upon controversies of small importance.] This is the ground of the quarrel. Heshusius, in a book against Theodore Beza (5), advanced, that the flesh of JESUS CHRIST in abstracto, is adorable (6). 'Non solum in concreto dici debere, filium Dei esse adorandum, omnipotentem & vivificum, sed etiam in abstracto carnem Christi esse adorandam: quia majestas adorationis sit carni communicata. — We ought not only to maintain in the concrete, that the Son of GOD is adorable, omnipotent, and enlivening, but likewise that the flesh of CHRIST is to be adored in the abstract: because the majesty of adoration is communicated to the flesh.' His adversaries assaulted him, pretending that he taught, that the flesh of JESUS CHRIST is adorable in itself, independently on the hypostatic union: 'Quod in abstracto & in sua essentia caro Christi, etiam extra unionem considerata, sit adoranda (7). — That the flesh of CHRIST is to be adored in the abstract and it's own essence, even considered separately from the union.' He denied this to be his opinion, and explained his notion; but his adversaries were not content with it. Bishop Wigandus (8), maintained this to be a dangerous proposition: 'Humanitas Christi in abstracto est adoranda omnipotens, vivifica. — The humanity of CHRIST in the abstract is adorable, omnipotent and enlivening.'

Heshusius maintained that he had not advanced it, and explained himself once more, but got nothing by it. A synod was called, who rejected Heshusius's expression, and Wigandus would even force him to retract it publicly. Heshusius refusing to do it, was expelled the country, tho' he promised to correct any improper expressions that might have escaped him: all the ministers who sided with him, had the same treatment. The administrator of Prussia, in the year 1578, consulted the divines that met at Hertzberg, for the Formula of the Concord, and receiving an answer that was favourable to Heshusius, he ordered Wigandus to speak no more of that dispute. This was the eleventh schism of the Lutheran church (9). It is of greater use than is imagined, to know this sort of histories; we therein discover the factious spirit, which animates the authors of these disputes.

[D] He strongly combated the doctrine of the Ubiquity, in the conference of Quedlinburg in the year 1583.] This conference was held the fourteenth and sixteenth of January 1583 (10), betwixt the divines of H. E. H. of Saxony, and those of Brunswic. The latter were headed by Heshusius. The acts of this dispute were published. 'In eo (colloquio) præcipue partes de- mandata à Theologis Brunswicensibus Heshusio fuerunt, qui διαφύσιν negavit dogma illud generalis Ubiquitatis . . . in sacra scriptura canone haberi, neque inde posse demonstrari (11). — The divines of Brunswic committed the chief part of this conference to Heshusius, who positively denied that the doctrine of a general Ubiquity was to be found in scripture, or could be demonstrated from thence.' Quenstedt pretends, that Heshusius did not know the state of the question, imputing to his adversaries a doctrine which they did not hold, and which was a vain phantom of his own imagination. This is very useful in disputes of this kind. I shall set down the words of Quenstedt; they are historical, with respect to our doctor.

'Vesalia inferior vulgo Unter-Wesel . . . urbs Clivie clarissima, . . . exceptit in hanc lucem editum . . . Tilemannus Heshusius Theologum Lutheranum insignem, multisque scriptis Didacticis & Polemicis contra Calvinianos clarum, qui ante Librum Concordiæ defendit Omnipræsentiam Carnis Christi, postmodum verò non tam ipsam in Libro Concordiæ de Majestate Christi hominis doctrinam, quam præconceptum cerebri sui idolum impugnavit, talem scilicet omnipræsentiam, quæ substantia Carnis Christi sit localiter, extensive, diffusivè & objectivè in omnibus creaturis, cum qua portentosa ubiquitate nostris Ecclesiis nihil quicquam fuit commercii. — Unter-Wesel, a town of Cleves, gave birth to Tilemannus Heshusius, a Lutheran divine, famous for his many didactic and polemical writings against the Calvinists; he maintained the omnipresence of CHRIST's body before the publication of the book of Concord, but afterwards he attacked not the doctrine contained in the book of Concord, concerning the dignity of CHRIST's human nature, but rather a phantom of his own imagination, that is, such an omnipresence whereby the substance of the flesh of CHRIST is locally, extensively, diffusively, and objectively, in all creatures, which monstrous Ubiquity our churches never maintained.' Vide Concord. Concord. Hutteri cap. XLVI (12). Micrælius pretends, that Heshusius dis-

Melchior Adam, from whom I borrow what is above, has been very barren in his account of our author's adventures. I advise those who would see them more at large to consult the life of Heshusius, written by his son-in-law [E]. Heshusius was banished four times [F]. And he took care, if we may believe Calvin (b), that it should do him no prejudice. He wrote many books [G]. They who speak of the sect of the Heshusians, and impute to him the doctrine of Arius, deserve the utmost contempt [H].

(b) See the remark [F].

puted only out of spite against the doctrine of Ubiquity. An assembly met to deliberate upon the apology that was to be made for the book of the Concord, and some measures were taken that were disagreeable to Heshusius. There needed no more to exasperate his spirit of contradiction, and to engage him to take up arms against the Ubiquitarians. 'Contra Calvinianos ore & calamo omnipræsentiam carnis Christi fortiter usque ad annum Christi 1582 defendit. Tandem cum nonnulli theologorum ad conscribendam pro Formula concordie apologiam convenissent: ille suum ad arbitrium non omnia agi indignatus, majestatem Christi, libro Concordie insertam, quam ubi quitatem generalem vocant, oppugnare cepit, & cum Dan. Hoffmanno, collega, orthodoxis eam sententiam affinxit, ac si substantiam carnis Christi extensivè ac localiter in omnibus creaturis esse dicerent. Sic igitur proprii cerebri commentum impugnan, loco omnipræsentie introduxit multipræsentiam (13). — He boldly, both by word and writing, defended the omnipresence of CHRIST's body against the Calvinists till the year 1582. But some time after, some divines having assembled in order to write an apology for the form of Concord, and being piqued, because every thing was not done there according to his humour, he began to impugn the doctrine of the book of Concord concerning the majesty of CHRIST, which is called the General Ubiquity, and together with Daniel Hoffman, his colleague, misrepresented the doctrine of the orthodox, as if they maintained that the substance of the flesh of CHRIST was extensively and locally in all creatures. And thus fighting with a phantom of his own brain instead of an omnipresence he introduced a multipresence.' Daniel Hoffman vigorously seconded him, and would bate nothing in the conference of Quedlenburg (14).

We have a much fuller account of him wrote in heroic verse by his son-in-law John Olearius, which is subjoined to Heshusius's Commentaries on Isaiah: in it we find a fourth banishment of Heshusius mentioned, the history of which is greatly illustrated by what we read in the second part, under the year 1565, both in the letters of Heshusius himself, and in those of others.'

[F] Heshusius was banished four times.] This may be seen in the passage of the Journal of Leipzig, which I have just now cited. Here is a distich which confirms the same thing, and is not very honourable to that doctor's memory.

(19) That is, ad paradoxam & opinionem absurditatem.

The description which Calvin (18) gives us of Heshusius, wonderfully confirms this distich. 'Ille (19) cum rapit nature intemperies, vel quod videt in moderata docendi ratione nullum sibi laudis gradum relinqui, qui tamen ambitione totus ad insaniam usque flagret. Certe in suo libello turbulenti se ingenii hominem, præcipiti etiam audaciæ & temeritatis esse prodit. . . Concionatur de ingentibus suis periculis, qui semper non minus secure, quam laute, delicias suas coluit. Prædicat multiplices ærumnas, qui cum largos thesauros habeat domi repositos, semper amplis stipendiis suas operas vendideret, omnia tamen solus ingurgitat. Verum quidem est, quum multis locis tranquillum nidum figere voluerit, sæpius propria inquietudine fuisse excussum. Sic Glosario (20), Rostochio, Heidelbergæ, Brema pulsus, Magdeburgum nuper concessit. Ac laudi quidem danda essent exilia, si pro constanti veritatis confessione solum vertere sæpius coactus esset: sed quum homo inexplibili ambitione plenus, contentionibus & rixis deditus, immani verò ferocia ubique fuerit intolerabilis, non est cur queratur aliorum injuria fuisse vexatum, qui sua importunitate, molestias homini delicato graves exhibuit. Interè tamen providè sibi cavit, ne damnosæ essent migrationes: quin etiam divitiæ ipsum magis animosum reddunt. —

He is hurried on to this by the restlessness of his temper, or because he feels that he cannot distinguish himself by a moderate manner of teaching, which is insupportable to a man ambitious even to madness. In his book he certainly shows himself to be a person of a very turbulent spirit, and precipitate boldness. . . . He makes great boasts of the many hazards he has undergone, though he has always taken care to enjoy the pleasures of life, not only securely, but even opulently. He talks of his manifold straits, when, notwithstanding his great riches, has always sold his labours at the highest rate, and swallowed all up by himself. It is true indeed that he has endeavoured to settle in many different places, but his own restless temper has still been the cause of his disgrace. In this manner, after being banished from Glosar, Rostock, Heidelberg, and Bremen, he has lately settled at Magdeburg. His banishments indeed would be honourable, if he had suffered them on account of his constant profession of the truth: but being insatiably ambitious, contentious beyond measure, and haughty beyond all sufferance, it is in vain for him to complain of the injuries of others, who has himself by his turbulent temper raised troubles not to be born by persons of any delicacy. He has however taken care that these migrations of his should not hurt his fortune, nay his riches add to his boldness.

We might infer from this passage, that Heshusius was banished above four times; for it is not said there, that he was expelled from Jena, and afterwards from Prussia; nor could this be said, since these events were posterior to this book of Calvin (21). He was expelled from Jena in the year 1573 (22), and went thence into Prussia, where he was made bishop of Samia in Morlin's place.

[H] They who speak of the sect of the Heshusians deserve the utmost contempt.] I have given my opinion more than once (23) upon those wretched writers of catalogues of Heretics. The only authority they have here, is a dialogue of Lindanus, wherein NIFES are these words (24): 'Heshusii, à Tilmanno Heshusio quem Calvinus Servetianum infamat, Boquinus, Arrianum: Wilhelmus Cleinwitzius vero præter peccatum plurimum de fidei capitibus æculat: quibus hoc anno (25) sua respondit defensione objecta inficiatus, nisi quod illud Trinitas est unitas negat se meminisse an dixerit in lectionibus: cum ita disertè doceat de præsentia Christi corporis in cœna objectione quinta. — Heshusians, from Tilmannus Heshusius, whom Calvin accuseth of being a follower of Servetus, and Boquinus accuseth of Arianism, and William Cleinwitzius accuseth him not only of extortion, but also with respect to several articles of faith: to all these he has answered this year, by denying the whole charge, only he says that he doth not remember to have said in his lectures, that Trinity is Unity: tho' he has expressly taught this in the fifth objection, concerning the presence of Christ's body in the Eucharist. There are three things in this passage to be animadverted on. I. It is an impertinent piece of injustice to charge a man with the heresies, of which his adversaries accuse him in the heat of a dispute. Has not Hunnius, a Lutheran author, written a pretty large book, in which he boasts that he has convicted John Calvin of Judaism? Who but a madman would infer from thence that Calvin entertained Jewish notions? Thus, under pretence that Calvin, Boquin, and other such adversaries of Heshusius, exasperated by his slanders, have imputed Arian doctrines to him, a wise man will not think he has sufficient grounds to call him an Arian. He will judge that such accusations may easily be the fruits of too great leisure, which is often abused to sift all the words of an enemy and to wrest them, in order to find heresies in them, by means of far fetched consequences. II. This injustice, which would be only impertinent, if one were ignorant of Heshusius's answer, becomes wholly criminal, when one knows that he has publicly denied the things his adversaries accused him of. Now Lindanus himself confesses that he knew this. III. Though this divine should have taught some heresies, it doth not follow, that there was a sect of Heshusians in Germany. A professor, who teaches particular doctrines, has not always disciples, much less has he always some, who separate from the body, which they must do to deserve the name of a sect.

Prætolus, upon the bare authority of Lindanus, has ranked the Heshusians in the catalogue of Heretics. Father Gaultier (26) has done the same upon the sole credit of Prætolus.

HIEROCLES, author of a book intituled Φιλίστορες, The Lovers of History (a), vented a great many fables, if we may judge of his book by Tzetzes's quotations out of it. He said, that in the Torrid Zone there were men whose ears serv'd them for umbrello's, and others, whose feet did them the same service, when they lifted them up. He boasted to have seen these, and to have heard say, that there were men who wanted heads, and others who had ten heads, four hands, and four feet (b). It is not known at what time he lived, but it is not at all probable that he was the same HIEROCLES, who from a Wrestler became a Philosopher, and who was a native of Hyllarima, a town of Caria (c).

HIEROCLES, a great persecutor of the Christians, in the beginning of the IVth century, was president in Bithynia, and then governour of Alexandria. He was the chief promoter of the bloody persecution, in the reign of Dioclesian. He was not satisfied with oppressing them, by the power which his post conferred on him, but would likewise ruin them by his pen. To this end he wrote two pieces, which he addressed to them, wherein he endeavoured to shew that the scripture confuted itself by the contradictions that it contained, as he pretended. He wrote violently against the person of our LORD and his Apostles, and made a parallel betwixt the miracles of JESUS CHRIST, and those of Apollonius Tyanæus, to shew that Apollonius equalled or even excelled our Saviour in that particular (a). Two fathers of the church have confuted him [A]. 'Tis said that the holy martyr Ædelsius, animated with a strong zeal, came up

[A] Two fathers of the church have confuted him. That is to say, Lactantius and Eusebius. The first relates that at the time when he taught Rhetoric in Bithynia (1), and when the temple of the Christians was demolished there, there were two writers who wrote to insult the oppressed truth. One was a Philosopher, whose work was despised and quickly fell to the ground: the other was one of the judges, and treated that subject more maliciously. Alius eandem materiam mordaciùs scripsit, qui erat tum è numero judicum, & qui auctor in primis faciendæ præsecutionis fuit, quo scelere non contentus, etiam scriptis eos, quos affixerat, infectus est. Composuit enim libellos duos non contra Christianos, ne inimicè infestari videretur, sed ad Christianos, ut humanè, ac benignè consulere putaretur; in quibus ita falsitatem scripturæ sacræ arguere conatus est, tanquam sibi esset tota contraria; nam quædam capita, quæ repugnare sibi videbantur, exposuit, adeo multa, adeo intima enumerans, ut aliquando ex eadem disciplina fuisse videatur . . . præcipuè tamen Paulum, Petrumque laceravit, cæterosque discipulos, tanquam fallaciæ feminatores, quos eisdem tamen rudis, & indoctos fuisse testatus est: nam quosdam eorum piscatorio artificio fuisse quæstum . . . (2) Ipsum autem Christum affirmavit à Judæis fugatum, collecta novingentorum hominum manu latrociniâ fecisse . . . Item cum facta ejus mirabilia destrueret, nec tamen negaret, voluit offendere Apollonium vel paria, vel etiam majora fecisse (3). — Another writer treated the same subject in a more satirical manner. He was at that time one of the judges, and had been one of the chief advisers of the persecution, and not content with that crime he attacked those by his writings whom he had before persecuted. He composed two books, not against the Christians, lest he should be thought to fall upon them as an enemy, but to the Christians, that he might pass for a humane and benevolent counsellor; in which he endeavoured to prove the falsehood of the holy scriptures, by the contradictions of which he accuseth them; he there produceth certain chapters which seemed to him to contradict one another, and advanced so many particulars, and appears so well acquainted with them, that he seems to have some time professed Christianity. . . . Above all he inveighs bitterly against Peter and Paul, and the other disciples, as deceivers of mankind, and yet he owns that they were rude and illiterate men: some of them fishermen by trade . . . He affirms that CHRIST, being banished by the Jews, gathered together 9000 men, and lived by robbery . . . And in order to invalidate his miracles, which however he doth not deny, he pretends to shew that Apollonius performed equal, or even greater. We do not see here the name of this writer; but we need not doubt that Lactantius spoke of the same judge, whom he calls Hierocles in another book (4), and to confirm this, I observe two things: one is the title of the book of this great persecutor of Christianity, the other is the name which Eusebius gives to the author of it. Ausus est libros suos up to him, as he presided at the condemnation of the Christians in Alexandria, and confounded him with shame both by words and deeds; I mean that Ædesius, gave Hierocles a box on the ear upon the tribunal, reproaching him with his infamous barbarities [B]. We will point out some errors of Moreri and of Cardinal Baronius [C].

suos nefarios, ac Dei hostes φιλαληθείας annotare. — He had the boldness to name his impious and profane books Lovers of Truth. These are Lactantius's words (5). Now Eusebius has named Hierocles for the author of the book intitled φιλαλήθης (6). It is therefore certain that he whose name is not mentioned in the fifth book of Lactantius, is the same whom he calls Hierocles in his tract de Mortibus Persecutorum.

Note, that Eusebius, in refuting this author, insisted only on the parallel of the miracles of JESUS CHRIST, and Apollonius Tyaneus, not touching upon other points, but contenting himself with saying, that Origen had confuted them before in his book against Celsum, and that Hierocles was only a bold copier of other men's thoughts and words. Note farther, that with respect to this parallel, he contented himself with slightly running over, and criticizing the life of Apollonius wrote by Philostratus. It is certain Eusebius did no great exploits upon that subject. See what Dr Cave says of it: 'Posterioris hujus operis partem de comparatione Apollonii cum Christo refutandam in se suscepit Eusebius libro contra Hieroclem; quod & SATIS JEJUNE præstitit, cum potius Philostrati libros de vita Apollonii in eo opusculo breviter percurrit & refellit (7). — Eusebius, in his book against Hierocles, undertook to answer the latter part of this work, which contained a comparison of Apollonius with CHRIST. This he executed very indifferently, giving us only a short confutation of Philostratus's book concerning the life of Apollonius.' Note lastly, that Lactantius did not undertake a particular confutation of Hierocles, and that he is so far from following him step by step, that he never expressly answers any objections taken from the work of this enemy of our Lord. The end he proposed to himself was, to establish in general the foundations of the gospel, and to ruin those of Paganism, and he thought this was sufficient to overturn at once all that the adversaries had published, or should publish for the time to come. 'Ii ergo, de quibus dixi, cum præsentem me ac dolente, sacrilegas suas literas explicassent, & illorum superba impietate stimulatus, & veritatis ipsius conscientia, (& ut ego arbitror) Deo, suscepti hoc munus, ut omnibus ingenii mei viribus accusatores justitiæ refutarem; non ut contra hos scriberem, qui paucis verbis obteri poterant, sed ut omnes, qui ubique idem operis efficiunt, aut effecerunt, uno semel impetu profigerem. Non dubito enim, quin & alii plurimi, & multis in locis, & non modò græcis, sed etiam latinis literis monumentum injustitiæ suæ fruxerint, quibus singulis quoniam respondere non poteram, sic agendam mihi hanc causam putavi, ut & priores cum omnibus suis scriptis perverterem, & futuris omnem facultatem scribendi, aut respondendi amputarem (8). — The persons above-mentioned, having explained their impious letters in my presence, I heard them with sorrow, and being stimulated by their daring wickedness, by the consciousness of the truth, and (as I verily believe) by GOD himself, I undertook this task, to confute to the utmost of my abilities the enemies of the truth; not with a design to answer these particular persons only, who might be easily put to silence by a very few words, but that I may at one blow confound all those who have been, or are, employed in that impious cause in all parts of the world. For I do not doubt but many others, in various places, and in writings, both Greek and Latin, have left monuments of their impiety; since therefore it is impossible to answer them all particularly, I have endeavoured to handle this subject in such a manner, that I might not only confute all former writers, but likewise take away all possibility either of writing, or answering, from those who shall come after.'

[B] It is reported that Ædesius gave Hierocles a box on the ear upon the tribunal, reproaching him with his infamous barbarities. Eusebius doth not express this so clearly, but we must believe that the thing is implicitly contained in the words he makes use of. Λόγοις τε καὶ ἔργοις τὸν δικάσαν αἰσχρὸν καὶ ἀτιμία περιβαλόν. Cum verbis simul & factis illum pudore atque ignominia perdidisset (9). — When he had both by words and deed, covered him with shame and ignominy. Here is the note of Valefius upon this passage (10): 'In hoc Eusebii loco, ἀτιμία quidem designat verbera quibus iudex affectus est ab Ædesio: αἰσχρὸν verò denotat convicia, quibus Ædesius iudicem ipsum appetiit. Utrumque autem indicat Eusebius his verbis: λόγοις τε καὶ ἔργοις τὸν δικάσαν, &c. Eusebius doth not tell us the name of the judge who was thus treated, but we learn from other authors that it was Hierocles. Read these words of Metaphrastes, you will there find this, and some other particulars of the holy zeal of the martyr Ædesius; you will there find, that he boxed the governor of all Ægypt, threw him upon the ground and redoubled his blows. 'Post hanc calamitatem, incidit in Hieroclem, qui totam Ægyptum administrabat. Hunc cum in Dei martyres injuria sæviret animadvertisset, sanctasque Dei virgines tradente lenonibus, nec tantam iniquitatem perferre posset, simile fraterno facinus aggreditur. Namque Divino repletus zelo procedit, & verbis ac factis Hieroclem confundit. Manu enim sua plagas illi in os infligit, humique supinum prostermit & cædit: ac monet, ne audeat contra naturæ leges, Dei servos offendere (11). — After this calamity, he fell upon Hierocles, the governor of all Ægypt. Having observed how he raged against the martyrs of GOD, and delivered the holy virgins to panderers, not being able to suffer such wickedness, he did an action equal to that of his brother. For, being filled with a divine zeal, he confounded Hierocles both by words and deeds. He struck him on the face with his hand, and, throwing him down to the ground, beat him, admonishing him not to dare to injure the servants of GOD, against the laws of nature.' Valefius quotes the Menæum of the Greeks, where it is observed that the governor Hierocles was struck in Alexandria by Ædesius (12).

[C] We will point out some errors of Moreri and cardinal Baronius. I. He gives the title of Platonic Philosopher to our Hierocles, who was not even a Philosopher generally speaking. I have not found any author among the ancients who makes him of that profession, and I see that Dr Cave, amongst the moderns, doubts whether he should be called a philosopher (13). II. Mr Moreri speaks of another 'Hierocles, a Pagan philosopher, one of the judges of the Areopagus, who undertook to demonstrate that Apollonius Tyaneus and JESUS CHRIST, were the same man.' He adds, 'that Eusebius wrote against him.' This is to multiply beings without necessity; for the Hierocles whom Eusebius confuted, was the same that Mr Moreri mentioned in the preceding article, and called a Platonic Philosopher. III. Besides, we do not know any Hierocles that was a judge of the Areopagus. Cardinal Baronius, who missed Moreri in that, might have easily avoided that mistake: for he grounds himself upon Lactantius whose words he even sets down (14). Now Lactantius saith expressly, that the author who wrote against the Christians, was one of the judges in Bythinia. Seeing then Baronius very justly supposed, that this enemy of the Christians was called Hierocles, he might easily conceive that he was not to be placed among the judges of the Areopagus. Note, that he saith, and with reason, that Eusebius and Lactantius wrote against the same Hierocles, and yet Moreri, who copies him, has given us two Hierocles, one refuted by Lactantius and the other by Eusebius. IV. He has not well understood these words of Baronius: 'Nihil magis monstrare conatus est (Hierocles) quam Apollonium æqualem fuisse Christo (15). — Hierocles has chiefly endeavoured to prove that Apollonius was equal to CHRIST.' For he thought they meant that Hierocles pretended to prove that Apollonius was the same with JESUS CHRIST (16). What I have further to say, doth not so much concern him as the cardinal. We have seen above that Lactantius makes mention of two heathens, who wrote against the Christians. Baronius pretends, that our Hierocles is the second of those authors, and that Porphyrius is the first. Moreri mentions this without finding fault with it. It is true he declares that he in this follows the opinion of the cardinal. Let us turn then to Baronius and tell him, that he could not have found Porphyrius in that place of Lactantius, if he had had well examined things. The first of these two heathen authors was at Nicomedia at the same time with Lactantius, and there published his invective against the Christians (17). He was a man notoriously vicious, covetous, voluptuous, and very sumptuous at his table. He was very rich, and made his court to the judges very diligently, in order to grow still richer, that is to say in order to sell their sentences, and to stop the proceedings of his neighbours, whom he drove out of their possessions. The three books he published against the Christians were foolish and ridiculous; he understood nothing of the matter and knew not what he said. The Christians ridiculed him for it, and he failed miserably in his attempt (18). This is the character of that author and of his book, if we credit Lactantius. How comes it then that Baronius (19) could discover Porphyrius by such marks? Where has he found that this philosopher made a long stay at Nicomedia? Men never sollicite the favour of the judges to maintain themselves in possession of lands, which they have unjustly usurped about their country-houses: they never do this, I say, upon a journey; it is a way of acting which supposes a fixed abode and a constant settlement. Porphyrius then must have been thus established in Nicomedia, if Baronius was in the right; now this is a fact which no body hath mentioned; his abode at Rome and Sicily, took up the greatest part of his life: besides, he was never accused of having been addicted to a voluptuous life; and after all he did not write foolishly against the Christians. He has been complained of for his cavils, his malice, and his calumnies; but no body ever said that he wanted wit, or that his books were impertinent and ridiculous (20), and even exposed him to the censure of the Heathens, instead of the glory that he promised to himself. 'Verum hic pro sua inanimata contemptus est; qui & gratiam, quam speravit, non est adeptus; & gloria, quam captavit, in culpam, reprehensionemque conversa est (21). — But he was despised as his folly deserved; and did not obtain that favour, which he hoped for; and instead of the glory which he aimed at, he got only reproof and blame.' According to Baronius (22) he had been a Christian; so that he could not be so grossly ignorant of the matter he treated of, as he that is mentioned by Lactantius; for you may observe, that when this father tells us that the other writer canvassed many particular things, he adds: He seems to have been formerly a Christian, ut aliquando ex eadem disciplina fuisse videatur (23). This observation might have been of some use to Baronius, not to have found Porphyrius in the description that Lactantius has given of a Philosopher, who impertinently and ignorantly attacked the persecuted Christians.

For the rest, the preface which that philosopher prefixed to his book, may teach us the conformity between the Pagan and Christian persecutions. An interested and flattering writer never fails to use his pen against the persecuted party: he imagines it a fine opportunity of praising his prince, he takes hold of it and displays the importance of the service done to God, and shews how charitable it is to join instruction to the authority of the laws, that erring men, being thus enlightened, may be delivered from the punishments to which their obstinacy would expose them. This voluptuous Philosopher of Nicomedia forgot none of these common places: one would think that he has been the model of many French authors, who have written during the persecution of the Protestants. See what a turn he gave to things. 'Professus omnia philosophi officium esse, erroribus hominum subvenire; atque illos ad veram viam revocare, id est, ad cultus Deorum; quorum numine, ac majestate (ut ille dicebat) mundus gubernetur, nec pati homines imperitos quorundam fraudibus illici: ne simplicitas eorum præde, ac pabulo sit hominibus astutis. Itaque se suscepisse hoc munus, philosophia dignum; ut præferret non videntibus lumen sapientiæ; non modo ut susceptis Deorum cultibus resanescant, sed etiam ut pertinaci obstinatione deposita corporis cruciamenta devitent; neu sævas membrorum lacerationes frustra perpetui velint. Ut autem appareret, ejus rei gratia opus illud elaborasset; effusus est in principum laudes; quorum pietas, & providentia (ut quidem ipse dicebat) cum in cæteris rebus humanis, tum præcipue in defendendis Deorum religionibus claruisset; consultum esse tandem rebus humanis, ut cohibita impia, & anili superstitione, universi homines legitimis sacris vacarent, ac propitios sibi Deos experirentur. — Affirming that it was the chief business of a Philosopher, to assist those who err, and to bring them back into the right way, that is, to the worship of the gods; by whose power and majesty (said he) the world is governed; and not to suffer the ignorant to be deceived by the guile of a few, lest their simplicity should make them fall a prey to the crafty. That on this account he had undertaken this task worthy of a Philosopher; to hold out the light of wisdom to those who do not see, not only that by returning to the worship of the gods, they may be restored to health, but also, that, laying aside their pertinacious obstinacy, they may escape the torturing of their bodies, and that they may not without reason expose themselves to such cruel mangling of their persons. But that it might appear to what end he had composed this work, he launched out in the praise of those princes, whose piety and care (said he) had been illustrious, not only in governing in humane affairs, but especially in protecting the worship of the gods, that at length the welfare of mankind had been provided for, that a stop being put to impious and idle superstition, all men might now enjoy a lawful worship and experience the favour of the gods.' It is easier to depart from the method of the persecutor Dioclesian, than from that of his panegyrist.

HIEROCLES, the son of that Alypius who commanded in England, and whom Julian the apostate had sent to Jerusalem to rebuild the temple there, was accused jointly with his father in the reign of Valens, and so many were tortured that they could no longer tell what member to rack, in order to make him speak through the violence of his pains what they wanted him to declare (a). Order was given at last that he should be led to execution; but as he was going thither, the people in a body addressed themselves to the emperor, and so earnestly interceded for him as to obtain his pardon. This we may learn by comparing a passage of Ammianus Marcellinus with another of St Chrysostome [A]. Our Hierocles had been a disciple of Libanius and was much esteemed by him [B].

[A] He was pardoned. This we may learn by comparing a passage of Ammianus Marcellinus with a passage of Chrysostome. It is this: 'Ipse quoque Alypius post multationem bonorum exulare præceptus, filium miserabiliter ductum ad mortem, casu quodam prope revocatum excepit (1). — Alypius likewise, after being condemned to forfeit his estate, and to suffer banishment, had his son restored to him, who being led out to execution was saved from death by a singular piece of good fortune.' The passage of St Chrysostome is in the third Homily upon the incomprehensible nature of God. This father designing to shew to his hearers the force of the united prayers of a whole people, alledges an example that they had seen ten years before, when a criminal, who was led gagged to the place of punishment, obtained his pardon at the request of all the people of Antioch, who went in a body to beg it of the emperor. Valerius (2) does not doubt that this criminal was Hierocles the son of Alypius.

[B] He was much esteemed by Libanius. Libanius writing to Alypius, told him (3) that his son, though a child, shewed greater wisdom than grown up persons; and that many fathers in chiding their sons exhorted them to take example by the son of Alypius. The testimony of Ammianus Marcellinus agrees in substance with that of Libanius (4).

HIEROCLES,

HIEROCLES, a platonic Philosopher in the Vth century, taught in Alexandria with great reputation; he was admired on account of the strength of his parts, and the readiness and beauty of his expressions (a). He composed seven books upon Providence and Fate, and inscribed them to the Philosopher Olympiodorus, who by his embassies did great service to the Roman empire in the reigns of Honorius and Theodosius junior (b). Those books are not now extant, and we only know them by the extracts which we find in Photius. These extracts teach us, that Hierocles had demonstrated that there is a perfect agreement betwixt the doctrines of Plato and Aristotle, and that they who had denied it did not well understand the opinions of these two great men (c). He turned his wits a thousand ways in order to explain the difficulties of providence, fate, and free-will, and pretended that the ground or key of all these things consisted in the passage of souls from one body to another, and in the life they had led before they entered into humane bodies. He laid out all his strength on this, and had none left to furnish him with good arguments to establish the doctrine he undertook to prove (d). For which reason Photius observes, that all that great train of reasonings dwindled into meer trifles (e). There is one thing very singular in the doctrine of this Philosopher; he maintained that Plato had taught that the world was produced out of nothing [A]. He married only with a view to have children [B]. His wife happened to be possessed (f); and he employed fair words in vain to deliver her from the demon, that spirit having no regard to his compliments; but Theosebius (g) without any skill in magic, exorcised him in such a manner as forced him to retire. Jonsius, who very solidly proves our Hierocles to have lived after Eusebius, is however mistaken [C] in supposing him the

(g) He was Hierocles's disciple.

[A] He maintained that Plato had taught that the world was produced out of nothing. Hierocles (1) most solidly confuted the Platonists, who maintained that tho' God should from all eternity employ his power and wisdom, he would not be able to form a world without the concurrence of an increated matter. Therefore they said that he produced things only by co-operating with matter, whose existence did not depend upon him. All things, added they, were virtually contained in matter, and God had nothing to do but to draw them out, and set them in order. Hierocles argued with a great deal of judgment against that supposition: he said, that such a work of God would not be so much a sign of his goodness, as the effect of a superfluous diligence (2), for why should he go about to dispose and set in order what he has not made? Is not good order sufficiently found in this, that a being subsists eternally of itself? whatever happens to such a being, is it not extraneous to its nature? And is it not consequently an imperfection? Τί γὰρ δὴ μὴδὲν ἂν μὴ ὑπέστησε διατάττειν περὶ αὐτῶν, πάντας αὖ τῆς εὐταξίας αὐτοῖς ἐν τῇ ἀγενεσίᾳ τῆς αὐτῶν φύσεως κειμένους, τὸ γὰρ ἀγενετός καδ' ἐαυτὸν ὡς εἶναι εἰ τι προσλαβοί, παρὰ φύσιν προσλήψεται. τὸ δὲ παρὰ φύσιν διατείναναι, κακὸν τὸ μετατρέψαι ὥστε ἐκ ἀγαθὸν τῇ λεγομένη ὕλῃ τὸ κοσμεῖσθαι, εἴπερ ἀγενετός εἰναι μὴ ἀπὸ γένου μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸ ἀπὸ αὐτοῦ. Quorsum enim ea, quæ non condidit, digere conatur, cum omnino bona ordinatio in natura eorum ingenta consistat. Si quid enim ingenta, ac per se subsistenti addatur, præter naturam fiet. Quod autem præter naturam efficitur, vitiat: quare diſtam materiam ornari minime bonum, siquidem non solum in tempore, sed et absque causa ingenta fit (3). He concludes from hence, that God would have begun his work with an ill action (4), namely by undertaking to dispose of it's natural state, a substance that was increased as well as himself, and his own filer. These reasons are so strong (5), that whoever considers them well, and is concerned for the glory of Plato, will endeavour to shew that he did not admit two principles collateral, eternal, and independent of one another, God and matter. This doubtless was the reason of our Hierocles attributing to him the doctrine of a true creation. I believe he had read it in the Christian writings, and that being struck with the arguments that oppose the existence of an increated matter, and joining withal the idea of a creator, which carries the divine power and majesty to the highest point, he supposed, for the honour of his sect, that it's founder had known God under the idea of a nature, the simple act of whose will was sufficient for the formation of the universe.

Ὅτι δημιουργὸν θεόν, φησι, πρῶτιστον ὁ Πλάτων ἐρεῖσα παῖς ἐμφανὲς τε καὶ ἀφανὲς διακοσμήσας, ἐκ μηδενὸς ἀντικειμένην γενέμενους ἀρκύνει γὰρ τὸ ἐκείνη βέλγημα εἰς ὑπόστασιν τῶν ὄντων. Plato opifitem Deum censuit sustinere omnes aspeſtabilem et inaspeſtabilem mundum, nulla prius existente materia produſum. Sufficere enim illius voluntatem ad sustinendum uniuersum (6). But it were easy to shew, that this is an officious lie, since Plato has clearly maintained the concurrence of an independent and increated matter. We may say then, that Hierocles has here shewn his industry as much as on any other occasion, I mean the industry of giving to the expressions of dead authors such a sense as one has a mind to (7), or of finding at least two or three different systems in their works. He understood that game; for the two explications he gave of Plato's Gorgias were in nothing like one another, and yet they seemed to agree with the Platonic doctrine. These are sports of wit, but they require a very fruitful imagination. Ἀντιπαρεβαλὼν τὰ πρότερα καὶ τὰ ὕστερα εὖρεν ἄδεν τῶν αὐτῶν, ὡς ἔπος εἰπεῖν ἱκατέρᾳ δὲ ὁμῶς, ὃ καὶ παράλογον ἀκούσαι, τῆς Πλάτωνος ἐχόμενα, καθόσον οὐκ ἐπὶ σεμνότητι, τὰ μὲν ἐν ἐπιδείκνυνται. τὸ ἀδρὲς ἡλικόν ἢν ἀπὸ τῶν προτέρων πέλγῃ. Collatis prioribus cum secundis, nihil, ut sic dicam, eundem inuenit. Utraque tamen, quod sanè audisti uocum est, Platonis, quod ejus fieri poterat, institutum continebat. Hinc colligitur quanta vi illius in sententia copia (8).

[B] He married only with a view to have children. Damascius makes the same observation, speaking of Theosebius, Hierocles's scholar, which shews that the most famous Platonists were persuaded, that these were the just rules and true bounds of marriage, and that whatever went beyond these limits was an irregularity, or at least, a liberty which wise men ought not to allow themselves. This Theosebius seeing his wife was barren, made a ring of chastity and gave it her. I presented you, said he, formerly with a ring of generation (9), but now I give you a ring of continence, which will always assist you to behave chastly (10), live with me if you please, or if you can contain; but if that condition doth not suit with you, I am willing you should marry another man, and I only ask one thing, which is, that we may part good friends. She willingly accepted the condition. My author stops there, and leaves us in uncertainty, for we do not know, whether his wife accepted the first or the last. He should not have left such an ambiguity in his story.

[C] Jonsius who proves . . . our Hierocles to have lived after Eusebius is however mistaken. His first proof is taken from the mention Hierocles made of Plutarch the Athenian, who lived after Iamblicus (11). Now the latter flourished under Julian the apostate; we have still some letters which that emperor wrote to him. The second proof is taken from this, that Olympiodorus, to whom Hierocles dedicated his books, did not precede the reign of Honorius and Theodosius the younger; for he wrote a history commencing at the seventh consulship of Honorius and the second of Theodosius the younger, and he continued it to Valentinian, Honorius's successor, or as far as the year 425 (12). Jonsius had reason after this to maintain that Eusebius, who the author of a history of Apollonius Tyanæus, and that the seven books of Providence were answered by a writer named Eusebius, who was different from him who wrote the Ecclesiastical History, &c.

who was the author of the Ecclesiastical History, the Evangelical Preparation, &c. did not confute the writings of this Hierocles; but he errs in saying that another Eusebius did. The cause of his error was this. He imagined that the same Hierocles who wrote the seven books upon Fate, composed a history of Apollonius Tyanæus, intitled Philalethes, the refutation whereof we have in the works of Eusebius. This was to confound Hierocles, the persecutor of the Christians under the emperor Dioclesian, with Hierocles the philosopher of Alexandria, under Theodosius the younger.

It is a little surprizing that Jonsius, who had a vast and exact knowledge of authors who have bore the same name, did not know the president of Bithynia, and the governor of Alexandria, who did so much mischief to the Christians, and who wrote against them, and was called Hierocles. Besides, this learned man was mistaken in thinking that Eusebius refutes the opinions of one Hierocles concerning Fate. It is certain that Eusebius only confuted the opinion of Apollonius, as he found it in Philostratus (13).

(13) Note, that Dr. Grew, Hist. Literat. Script. Eccles. Part I, pag. 131, has taken notice of this error of Jonsius.

HIERO I, king of Syracuse, was the son of Dinomenes, and brother of Gelon, who after he had gained the sovereignty of Gela, had the good fortune to see the city of Syracuse submit to him, when he intended no more than to restore some inhabitants that the populace had banished out of it. He was so well pleased with this new acquisition, that he voluntarily resigned Gela to his brother Hiero, and wholly employed himself to find out the means of rendring Syracuse a most flourishing city (a). He reigned there gloriously and happily; he acquired a great reputation by his victories, and the love of his subjects by his equity and moderation (b). Hiero, who succeeded him, did not tread in his steps; he was covetous, violent, and altogether different in his conduct from the virtuous Gelon: which was the reason that many were ready for an insurrection; but the memory of his predecessor was so dear and glorious, that it kept them in their duty (c). He had a great desire to put his brother Polyzelus to death, whom he saw beloved by the Syracusans, and whom he suspected of aspiring to the crown. He would have sent him to the assistance of the Sybarites who were besieged by the Crotoniates, to the end that he might cause him to be slain in the battle; but Polyzelus who foresaw the design, refused that employ; and seeing that this furiously provoked the king, his brother, he retired to Theron who reigned in Agrigentum. They were afterwards reconciled by the mediation of Theron (d). The latter might have taken advantage of that misunderstanding, but he was a good man (e), and would do one good office for another [A]. His son Thrasyldeus succeeded him, and was unfortunate in the war that he undertook against the Syracusans. Hiero with a good army made an irruption into the country of the Agrigentines and gained a battle, whereby Thrasyldeus lost his crown (f). Observe here a difference betwixt poets and historians. The same Hiero who appears such an accomplished prince in the odes of Pindar [B], is a wicked king in the history of Diodorus Siculus. I fancy that if the poet flatters him too much, the historian treats him too severely; for he doth not say all the good of him that he might, I mean that Hiero civilized himself and reformed many of his vices, by the conversations he had with some ingenious men whom he loved and loaded with his favours [C]. He died in the town of Catana in the second year of the LXXVIIIth Olympiad

[A] Theron would do one good office for another.] Whilst Hiero was preparing to make war against Theron, to whom his brother had retired, the inhabitants of Himera sent him deputies to offer him their succours, and even to declare they would live under his government. Thrasyldeus, Theron's son, had been made their governor, and was become odious to them by his violences and cruelty. Hiero made use of that conjuncture not to push on his design of war, but to turn things towards a pacification. He informed the king of Agrigentum of the design of the inhabitants of Himera. This intelligence caused Theron to take the necessary measures to frustrate the conspiracy, and to make peace with the king of Syracuse, and to reconcile the two brothers (1). Moreri, citing the eleventh book of Diodorus Siculus, remarks, that Hiero defeated Theron the tyrant of Agrigentum who despised him. I have found nothing like this in Diodorus Siculus. Note, that the historian Timæus had related that Theron, who could not abide that his son-in-law Polyzelus should be ill used by Hiero, declared war against him; but it was immediately terminated before the hostilities were begun (2). Let us say by the way that Demarata (3), Theron's daughter, was married to king Gelon, who ordered when he died, that she should marry Polyzelus (4).

[B] Hiero appears a very accomplished prince in the odes of Pindar.] He won the prize in the horse-race in the Olympic games. He did the same at the Pythic games; and was also victor in the chariot-course. These victories were magnificently celebrated by the poet Pindar (5), and you may believe that those digressions take up more than three fourths of his odes, he forgot not to say that Hiero had all the virtues of a good and brave king. Note, that the inscription of his ex voto (6), testifies that he won the prize three times at the Olympic games, twice in the horse-race, and once in the chariot-course. John Benedictus, has fully affirmed in his Commentary on Pindar (7), that Hiero gained the prize of the horse-race at the Olympic games in the LXXIII Olympiad; for that prince was king of Syracuse when he gained that prize (8): now he did not begin to reign there till the third year of the LXXVth Olympiad (9). The same commentator pretends that he gained a like prize at the games of the LXXVIIth Olympiad. But this is to give him a reign of more than sixteen years, and groundlessly to contradict the best historians.

[C] Hiero civilized himself, and reformed many of his faults, by the conversations which he had with some ingenious men.] He was exceedingly ignorant, and as rustic as his brother Gelon; but falling sick, he spent the time which the weakness of his body gave him in the conversation of the learned, and became himself a learned man; and afterwards recovering his health he continued to love these sorts of conversation, and often discoursed with Simonides, Pindar, and Bacchiide (10). The author from whom I have this, adds, that Hiero was a great lover of learning, and very liberal, that he had a great soul, lived without jealousy with his three brothers, whom he affectionately loved, and was mutually beloved by them, and that his inclination to make noble presents, determined Simonides, tho' very old, to cross the sea to wait upon him (11). Some critics (12) pretend that Chronology will not permit us to affirm that Hiero ever saw Simonides, but they have been shewn their

Olympiad (g) in the twelfth year of his reign (b). It was a town that he had peopled anew, having driven out the inhabitants and seated there a colony of Greeks drawn out of Peloponnesus and Syracuse (i). He changed the name of Catana into that of Ætna, and would himself be surnamed Ætneus, when he was proclaimed victor in the Pythic games (k). The funeral honours that were paid to him in this new town, were like those paid to heroes (l). His brother Thraſybulus reigned after him, but his tyrannical actions moved the Syracusans to an insurrection, and reduced him to such a condition as to be forced to submit to a hard capitulation. He retired into Italy into the country of the Locrians, and there spent the rest of his days in a private life, having reigned but one year. The Syracusans having restored the Republican government, maintained it till the tyranny of Dionysius, that is for sixty years (m). For the rest, it is somewhat strange that Dinomenes, Hiero's son, did not reign after him. He survived him as we learn from the inscription of the gifts which his father had vowed to Jupiter Olympius (n). The offerings which the king of Syracuse consecrated to the temple of Delphis were magnificent (o). His first wife, who was the daughter of Anaxilaus king of Rhegium and cousin to Theron, bore him no children (p); but by his second wife daughter of Nico- cles, he had Dinomenes abovementioned (q). Some will have it that he gave him the government of the town of Catana, with the title of king of Ætna [D]. I do not know to which of his two wives we must ascribe the answer mentioned by Plutarch (r).

[D] Some will have it that he gave him the command of the city of Catana, with the title of king of Ætna. They go upon these words of Pindar (22).

vinitus fundata libertate, Doricæ libræ in legibus Hiero condidit. Benedictus makes this note upon it. Postquam poëta laudavit Hieronem ab eutrenia, & filium Dinomenem à studio in patrem: ad alias ejusdem Dino-menis laudes digreditur: quem Ætnæ regem appellat: nam illam à se conditam Hiero dedit filio administrandum:
eumque ducem Ætnæorum constituit. This increases our wonder to see Thraſybulus succeed Hiero. I believe the Syracusans favoured the brother in prejudice of the son, to do greater honour to the memory of Gelon; for Dinomenes, Hiero's son, was only Gelon's nephew, but Thraſybulus was Gelon's brother; and thus setting those upon the throne who were more nearly related to Gelon, they more plainly shewed that they looked upon him as the ground of the pretension to the crown.

CREECH.

The sickness which made our Hiero fond of learned conversation was the gravel. The scholiast on Pindar
(21) cites upon this a work of Aristotle that is lost.
Moreri is grossly out in ascribing to Hiero II what belongs to Hiero I. I mean this learning that he got upon his sick bed, &c.

HIERO II, king of Syracuse, descended from the family of Gelon, who had reigned in the same place; but because his mother was a servant, Hierocles, his father, looked upon him as a child that dishonoured his house, and abandoned him to the mercy of fortune (a). He was fed many days by bees, and as the soothsayers declared, that this was a presage that he should be king, Hierocles ordered him to be brought back to his house, and educated him with all possible care. The child improved very much by such an education, and distinguished himself many ways. He was a man of admirable beauty and strength, a graceful speaker, and he often fought with those that provoked him, and always had the victory. Pyrrhus gave him several military rewards (b). The Syracusans made him prætor [A], after the departure of Pyrrhus; and

[A] The Syracusans made him prætor. I have used the compendious expressions of Justin; but I will here clear up this matter, which is somewhat maimed in that author's narration. I say then, there was a misunderstanding betwixt the citizens of Syracuse and their army, and that the army encamping near Mergana proceeded to the creation of magistrates, and conferred that dignity upon two officers, Artemidorus and Hiero. The latter being introduced into Syracuse by the secret intrigues of his friends, surmounted the opposition of the contrary party, and behaved himself with so much humanity and greatness of soul, that the inhabitants agreed to acknowledge him for their prætor, though they looked upon those assemblies as unlawful, in which the soldiers pretended to confer magistracies (1). Polybius, who is here my author, relates two instances of Hiero's ability. The first was that he remedied a disorder which was very prejudicial to the state. The Syracusans who staid in the town, whilst the troops and the prætors were in the field, raised as he discharged that office with great wisdom, all the cities unanimously agreed to appoint him Captain-general against the Carthaginians, and afterwards to raise him to the throne (c). He soon after carried on the war vigorously against the Mamertines, whom he had already defeated in some engagements, and he resolved to drive them out of Messina, which they had seized against all right and reason. They found themselves incapable of resisting him, and therefore they had recourse, some to the Carthaginians, others to the Romans. The question whether they should be succoured, was warmly debated at Rome, it was carried in the affirmative, and this was the occasion of the first Punic war. The consul Appius Claudius being ordered to succour the Mamertines, landed his troops in Sicily in the year of Rome 490. They delivered up their town to him, and obliged the Carthaginian general, who commanded in their fortrefs, to leave it. The Carthaginians laid siege to Messina, and made a treaty of alliance with Hiero, who joined his troops with theirs. The Roman consul resolved upon giving battle, and first attacked the Syracusans: the battle was very sharp; Hiero behaved himself there valiantly, but was beaten, and thought it convenient to return to Syracuse. Appius Claudius having likewise gained a victory over the Carthaginians, found himself master of the field, and advanced as far as Syracuse, and besieged it. Hiero seeing Sicily in consternation, and the Carthaginian forces much weakened, sent proposals of peace to the Romans: They were accepted, and from that time till his death, he faithfully adhered to their interests (d), and gave them all the proofs of the most sincere friendship [B]. If he had lived only five or six years after this alliance, to judge of things raised a thousand seditions, and laboured to introduce innovations. It was therefore necessary that in the army's absence some persons should keep the citizens in their duty. Lepines was a very proper man for this, as having a great many clients, and much credit with the people. For this reason Hiero secured him, by marrying his daughter, and by that means obtained that the public tranquillity should be preserved in Syracuse whilst he was abroad at the head of the army. His second piece of policy, was his getting rid of the old foreign soldiers, who were mutinous and debauched. He took the field under pretence of engaging the Mamertines (2), and when he came in sight of the enemy, he divided his army into two parts; he placed his Syracusan soldiers on one side, and the foreigners on the other; and putting himself at the head of the former, as if to make an attack, he left the others exposed to the Mamertines, who cut them in pieces. He raised other troops, and attacked the enemy so seasonably, that he obtained a glorious victory. He was created king after that exploit (3).

[B] He gave the Romans all the proofs of a sincere friendship.] In proof of this I shall relate what he did, when the Roman affairs were in a great confusion, after the victory that Hannibal obtained over them, near the lake Thrasymenus (4). It was the third battle they had lost in Italy from the time Hannibal entered it, that is, in a year's time. Less than that now-a-days would incline a prince to quit his allies, and take the conqueror's side; a prince, I say, whose territories should be situated as Syracuse was with respect to the republic of Carthage. And yet Hiero proved a generous ally, he stood fast to the interest of the Romans, and sent them good supplies. Read these words of Livy (5): 'Per eosdem dies ab Hierone classis Hostiam cum magno comœatu accessit. Legati Syracusani in Senatum introducti nuntiaverunt, eadem C. Flamini consulis exercitusque allatam adeo ægrè tulisse regem Hieronem, ut nulla sui propria, regni-que sui clade moveri magis potuerit. Itaque, quamquam probè sciat magnitudinem populi Romani admirabiliorem propè adversus rebus, quàm secundis, esse, missa tamen à se omnia, quibus à bonis fidelibusque sociis bella juvari soleant. Quæ ne accipere abnuant, magnoperè se P. C. orare. Jam omnium primum omnis causa victoriam auream pondo CCCXX. afferre sese: acciperent eam, tenerentque & haberent propriam & perpetuam. Advexisse etiam trecenta millia modiorum tritici, ducenta hordei, ne comœatus deessent. Et quantum præterea opus esset, & quod iussissent, subvecturos. Milite atque equite scire nisi Romano Latiniq; nominis non uti populum Romanum: levium armatorum auxilia etiam externæ vidisse in castris Romanis. Itaque missis mille sagittariorum ac funditorum aptam manum adversus Baleares ac Mauros, pugnacesque alias missi telo gentes. Ad ea dona consilium quoque addebant, ut Prætor, cui provincia Sicilia enensisset, classem in Africam trajiceret, ut & hostes in terra sua bellum haberent, minisque laxamenti daretur his ad

auxilia Annibali summittenda. Ab Senatu ita responsum regi est, Virum bonum, egregiumque socium Hieronem esse, atque uno tenore, ex quo in amicitiam populi Romani venerit, fidem coluisse, ac rem Romanam omni tempore ac loco munificè adjuvisse: id, perinde ac deberet, pergratum populo Romano esse. Aurum & à civitatibus quibusdam allatum, gratia rei accepta, non accepisse populum Romanum: victoriam, omneque accipere: sedemque ei se divæ dare, dicare Capitolium, templum Jovis Optimi Maximi. In ea arce urbis Romæ sacratam, volentem propitiâque, firmam ac stabilem fore populo Romano. Funditores, sagittariique, & frumentum traditum consulibus. — About this time a fleet arrived at Ostia from Hiero, with large supplies. The Syracusan ambassadors being introduced to the senate, said that Hiero, on receiving the news of the defeat of the consul Flaminius and his army, was as sensibly touched as it was possible for him to be for his own, or his kingdom's, misfortunes. That on that account, though he well knew that the Roman greatness was rather more admirable in adverse than in prosperous circumstances, he had sent such supplies as were usual from good and faithful allies to one another, when engaged in wars: and most earnestly begged that the senate would do him the honour to accept of them. That first of all, by way of good omen, they had brought a golden Victory of 320 pound weight: wishing they would receive it, and retain it, as their peculiar property for ever. That they had likewise brought 300000 measures of wheat, and 200000 measures of barley, lest provisions should fail, and that they were ready to bring as much more as they should have occasion for, to what port the senate should please to command them. That they knew that the Romans admitted of no legionary soldiers, or cavalry, but their own and those of the Latins, but they had observed light armed auxiliaries, even of foreign nations, in the Roman camps; and for that reason Hiero had sent a thousand archers and slingers, which would be of service against the Baleares, Mauritanians, and other nations, which used missile weapons. Together with these presents, they gave the following advice, that the prætor, to whose share the province of Sicily should fall, should send a fleet to Africa, that the enemy might not only have war in their own country, but might be left at liberty to send succours to Hannibal. The senate sent the following answer to the king. That Hiero had acted like a man of honour, and a faithful ally, had shown an uninterrupted fidelity, from the time he had first joined in amity with the Roman state, and had at all times, and on all occasions, liberally assisted them in their affairs: that the Romans had such sentiments of these favours as they deserved. That gold had been brought by some other states, and had, after returning them thanks, been refused by the Romans, but that they accepted the Victory, and the omen: and had appointed the capitol, the temple of Jupiter, for the abode of that goddess. In which fortrefs of the city of Rome she would be sacred, willing, and propitious, things by the present age, we should have reason to wonder at his constancy. How great therefore ought our admiration to be, when we consider that he lived near fifty years after? This long reign was a very happy one; for Hiero's conduct was attended with so much prudence, that it preserved him secure amongst his own subjects, procured him a great reputation abroad, and gave success to all his public and private affairs. He cultivated the friendship of the Greeks, and was proud of sharing in the prizes which they bestowed on the victors in their games (e). His sons erected him a statue on horse-back, and another on foot in Olympia (f); his subjects erected others also in the same place (g). The money he gave to the Rhodians, and the presents he sent them after that great earthquake, which had made havock of their island, and over-turned their Colossus, is a very noble instance of his liberality, and magnificence (b). He ordered a ship to be built which was one of the most famous vessels in antiquity; Archimedes (i) was the director of the work. You will find the description of it in Athenæus (k), who cites a book written purely upon that subject by one Moschion. The 16th Idyl of Theocritus is addressed to this king of Syracuse, and the author seems to complain of having praised him without obtaining a recompence. Hiero composed some books of Agriculture (l), and died at the age of ninety [C], in the second year of the CXLII Olympiad, and the 539 (m) of Rome. He out-lived his son Gelon (n), who was married to Nereis, daughter of Pyrrhus (o), by whom he left a son, named Hieronymus (p). He observed that this Hieronymus was vain, and he feared lest the good condition in which he had settled his kingdom, would quickly change under such a prince. This made him desirous to restore the Syracusans to their liberty; but his daughters hindered him [D], and in his great

'tious, firm and constant to the Roman people. The slingers and archers, and the corn was delivered to the consuls.' We scarce now see so generous a conduct amongst private persons. Gelon, the son of Hiero, had not strength of mind sufficient to imitate so great an example. He forsook the vanquished party without any regard to the trouble he should thereby give his father. You will see Livy's words in this passage of Calaubon. 'Fides vera & constantia ejusdem (Hieronis) in conservanda Po. Ro. majestate laudari satis pro merito non queat; quum præsertim ea mox & deinceps perpæsecuta sint tempora, quæ ejus constantiam eximie probarent. Quot & quantas clades populus Ro. bello Punico primo, & secundi initio sit perpeffus, nemo nescit. Solent adverfa hominum voluntates, & addita mentium nudare. Hieronis propositum & constantiam in suscepta semel amicitia Romanorum, non Reguli calamitas, non Claudii naufragium, non Thrafymenus, non Trebia, postremo ne Cannensis quidem dies potuit labefactare. Mansit inconcussa illi fides, etiam tunc quum & in Italia & extra Italiam omnes Po. Ro. focii & amici ad Pænos fortunam secuti inclinabant: ne domus quidem Hieronis tota (verba sunt Livii) ab defectione abstinuit, namque Gelo maximus stirpis contempta simul senectute patris, simul post Cannensium cladem Romana societate ad Pænos defecit. Hiero tamen nihil fecius immotus stetit, ceu Marpesia quædam cautes, eique etiam tunc fides constitit: quam etiam ad extremum vitæ constantissime servavit (6). —

(6) Calaubonus, Commentar. in Polyb. pag. 151, 152.

The extraordinary fidelity and constancy of Hiero in preserving the majesty of Rome, cannot be sufficiently praised; especially if we consider that then, and frequently afterwards, there happened conjunctures, which put his constancy to very singular trials. Every body knows how great, and how many disasters the Romans suffered in the first Punic war, and in the beginning of the second. Adversity usually discovers peoples inclinations, and strips the mind of all disguises. Neither the calamity of Regulus, the shipwreck of Claudius, neither Thrafymene, nor Trebia, nor even Cannæ itself, could shake the resolution and constancy of Hiero in the alliance he had contracted with the Romans. It continued firm even when all the allies and friends of Rome, both in Italy and out of it, following fortune, inclined to the Carthaginians. Even Hiero's own family (to use the words of Livy) was not free from this defection, for his eldest son Gelo, despising at once the old age of his father, and the alliance of the Romans after the battle of Cannæ, went over to the Carthaginians. Hiero, notwithstanding, remained unmoved, and continued in that fidelity, which he constantly preserved to the end of his life. Let us add another observation. This prince's fidelity to the Romans was sometimes very burdensome to him; for sometimes the Carthaginian vessels made great ravage in his country (7). Lastly, let us observe that on his death-bed he recommended it to the tutors of his grandson, who was to be his successor, not to suffer any change in the alliance he had so faithfully kept with the Romans (8).

[C] Hiero died at the age of ninety. Livy affirms it as we shall see in the following remark. Lucian (9) cites Demetrius Calistianus, who wrote that Hiero died of sickness at ninety two years of age, having reigned seventy. Let us keep to the round number of Livy and Valerius Maximus. Siciliæ rex Hiero ad nonagesimum annum pervenit (10). — Hiero, the king of Sicily, lived ninety years. Note, by the way, a small mistake of Father Hardouin. Hieron, Siciliæ Rex, quem inter scriptores de agricultura memorant Varro, & Columella l. i. c. i. cum Attalo Philometore Pergami rege. Multa de eo præclare habet Valerius Max. l. 8. c. 13. p. 405 (11). — Hiero, king of Sicily, is mentioned by Varro and Columella, among the writers on Agriculture, together with Attalus Philometor, king of Pergamus. Valerius Maximus tells many extraordinary things concerning him. Consult Valerius Maximus in the place that Father Hardouin has quoted, and you will find nothing about Hiero but the seven words that I have set down, but you will there a great many curious things concerning Massaniassa, king of Numidia. I am persuaded that a false glance of the eye was the cause of Father Hardouin's mistake. One line skipped, made him believe that the whole page related to Hiero: that little leap eclipsed Massaniassa in the following line: this is a cause of mistakes that spreads itself farther than is imagined. A writer, who is to consult many authors, dwells upon things as little as he can; his eyes run over the pages with great swiftness; they glance sometimes too lightly upon certain lines, that the mind retains no idea of them, and then the pen joins facts together which it ought to separate. To conclude, Hiero did not reign seventy years as Lucian affirms: he was prætor seven years before he was proclaimed king (12).

[D] He desired to restore the Syracusans to their liberty, but his daughters hindered him. It was because they saw that their husbands and themselves should have the chief management of the kingdom. Livy describes this admirably well. In Siciliæ, says he, (13), Romanis omnia mutaverat mors Hieronis, regnumque ad Hieronymum nepotem ejus translatum, puerum vixdum libertatem, nedum dominationem modicè laturum. Læte id ingenium tutores atque amici ad præcipitandum in omnia vitia acceperunt. Quæ ita futura cernens Hiero, ultima senectæ voluisse dicitur liberas Syracusas relinquere, ne sub dominio puerili per ludibrium bonis artibus partum firmatumque interiret regnum. Huic consilio ejus summa ope obfistere filia: nomen regum penes puerum futurum ratæ, regimen rerum omnium penes se, virosque suos, Andronodorum, & Zoilum, nam ii tutorum primi relinquebantur. Non facile erat nonagesimum jam agenti annum, circumfesso dies noctisque muliebris blanditiis liberare animum, & convertere ad publicam privatamque curam. Itaque tutores numero quindecim puero reliquit.

(13) Tit. Livius, lib. xxiv, pag. 381.

great age he had not sufficient resolution to resist the caresses and artifices of these two women who beset him day and night. He was therefore obliged to leave the kingdom to his grandson, under the tuition of fifteen persons. What the old man forefaw happened. There was nothing but confusion in Syracuse after his death [E]. Paufanias is mistaken in saying that Dinomenes killed him (q).

(p) Paufan. lib. vi, cap. xlii, pag. 480.

'quit. — In Sicily the Roman affairs were quite changed by the death of Hiero, and the succession of his nephew Hieronymus to the crown, a boy, who was not capable of enjoying liberty with moderation, much less dominion. His guardians and friends joyfully laid bold of this disposition of his to precipitate him into all manner of vice. It has been related that Hiero, in his old age having foreseen this, intended to have left the Syracusans a free state, to prevent the kingdom which he had obtained and established by his great abilities, to be shamefully lost under the government of a boy. His daughters earnestly opposed this design, thinking that though the name of king should be with Hieronymus, yet that the authority would be lodged with them and their husbands, Andronodorus and Zoilus: for they were appointed his chief guardians. It was too hard a task for him in the ninetieth year of his age, beset night and day with their female arts, to preserve a freedom of spirit, and to employ it in public and private cares. He therefore left fifteen guardians to him.'

[E] There was nothing but confusion in Syracuse after his death.] The first thing that was done, was to present to the people Hiero's will, and Hieronymus the new king, who was but fifteen years old. Some people hired to make acclamations approved of the will: others were filled with disquiet, and considered the kingdom as an orphan who had just lost his father. A little after they proceeded to the funeral solemnity, which if it was considerable for the number of those who attended it, it ought rather to be attributed to the love of the people than to the care of Hiero's family (14). After this Andronodorus, son-in-law of the deceased, and one of Hieronymus's fifteen tutors, declared, that the king was of age to govern, and that the minority was expired. By this he assumed to himself the power of all the others. Royal equipage was introduced, and whereas Hiero always went in a common dress, his grandson appeared in purple with a diadem and guards. This outward pomp was attended with an equal pride, cruelty, and debauchery; and one would have thought that Hieronymus was at pains to make them lament the loss of his grandfather. Had he had the qualities of the best princes, he would have scarce contented the Syracusans, they so adored his predecessor. What discontent then must they have had under a successor so unlike him? I cannot sufficiently admire the dignity of the expressions that Livy makes use of to represent it. 'Vix quidem ulli bono, moderatoque regi facilis erat favor apud Syracusanos, succedenti tantæ charitati Hieronis: Verum enimvero Hieronymus, velut suis vitiis desiderabilem efficere vellet avum, primo statim conspectu omnia quàm disparia essent, ostendit. Nam qui per tot annos Hieronem, filiumque ejus Gelonem, nec vestis habitu, nec alio ullo insigni differentes à cæteris civibus vidissent, conspexere purpuram, ac diadema, ac satellites armatos, quadrigisque etiam alborum equorum interdum ex regia procedentem, more Dionysii tyranni. Hunc tam superbum apparatus, habitumque convenientes sequebantur mores; contemptus omnium hominum, superbaures, contumeliosa dicta, aditus non alienis modo, sed tutoribus etiam difficiles, libidines novæ, inhumana crudelitas (15). — It would have been no easy matter, even for a good and moderate prince, to have gained the love of the Syracusans who so adored their late king Hiero. But Hieronymus, as if he had designed by his vices to make his grandfather's memory more dear to them, all at once showed them how much every thing was altered. They who for so many years had seen Hiero and his son Gelo differing neither in dress, nor by any other marks of distinction, from the other citizens, now saw the purple, the diadem, the armed guards and chariots drawn by white horses, issuing from the palace after the manner of the tyrant Dionysius. And this pomp and gorgeous dress was attended with suitable manners: with a contempt of all men, with pride, contumelious speeches, difficulty of access, not only to strangers, but to his guardians themselves, unheard-of lusts and inhuman cruelty.'

This young king preferred the alliance of the Carthaginians to that of Rome (16); but he had not time allowed him to do them service; they conspired against him and killed him (17). Andronodorus fortified himself as well as he could in some places of Syracuse; and yet, contrary to the advice of Demarata (18) his wife, Hiero's daughter, he submitted to the new republican government, and was created prætor: but new troubles arising, he tried to make an advantage of them, being teized with the continual infatigations of his wife (19). He concerted his enterprize with Themistius, the husband of Harmonia, Gelo's daughter, and PERIANDER, trusted it to a comedian, who betrayed him: so that he and Themistius were killed as they entered the senate (20). To justify this murder, it was necessary to represent to the people the crime of these two men. The orator who was appointed to do it, said, amongst other things, that their wives had filled them with ambition. The people upon this vehemently cried out, that these two women ought to die, and the whole race of the tyrants. This was immediately decreed and executed. Livy, in relating this tragical adventure, doth not forget to make a reflexion upon the capricious and changeable temper of the populace. 'Sub hanc vocem ex omnibus partibus concionis clamor oritur, nullam eorum vivere debere, nec quenquam superesse tyrannorum stirpis. Hæc natura multitudinis est: aut servit humiliter, aut superbe dominatur; libertatem, quæ media est, nec spernere modicè, nec habere sciunt, & non ferme desunt irarum indulgentes ministri, qui avidos atque intemperantes plebeiorum animos ad sanguinem & cædes, irriterent: sicut tum extemplo Prætores rogationem promulgant. Acceptaque penè prius quàm promulgata est, ut omnis regia stirps interficretur. Missique à Prætoribus Demaratam Hieronis, & Harmoniam Gelonis filias, conjuges Andronodori & Themistii, interfecerunt (21). — Upon this a cry arose from all parts of the assembly, that neither of them ought to live, and that none of the race of the tyrants should escape. Such is the nature of the populace: they either serve meekly or command insolently: and do not know with moderation, either to despise or enjoy liberty, which is the middle betwixt these two, and there are seldom wanting those who, indulging the popular fury, stir up their eager and headstrong passions to blood and slaughter. And so it happened in this case, the prætors without delay put it to the vote. And it was decreed, almost sooner than it was proposed, that all the royal family should be put to death. Accordingly the prætors sent and slew Demarata, daughter to Hiero, and Harmonia daughter to Gelo, and the wives of Andronodorus and Themistius. There remained a daughter of Hiero named Heracles: when she knew that they were come to kill her, she shut herself up with her two daughters in the chapel of her house, and placed herself by her Penates, using the most pathetic supplications and the strongest arguments to save her life, or at least that of her daughters; but all in vain, she was dragged from the chapel and murdered. Her two daughters who had escaped from the house, were killed in the streets (22). See the margin (23).

HIERO, a great friend of Nicias, and head of the colony which rebuilt Thurium (a), pretended to be the son of Dionysius, surnamed Χαλκός [A], that is to say of brass, æneus. He was bred up at Nicias's house, who himself instructed him in Literature and Music. He in return used a great many artifices to recommend Nicias (b). I have found an error in Amiot, and in some Dictionaries (c).

[A] The son of Dionysius surnamed Χαλκός. This Dionysius was a poet. Some of his poems were still extant in Plutarch's time (1). His Elegies are cited by Athenæus (2), and by Aristotle (3). He was also an orator; for he was surnamed Χαλκός, because the Athenians, being persuaded by one of his orations, made use of brass money (4). See the margin (5).

HIEROPHILUS, a Physician of whom I can say nothing else but that he taught his art to a certain maid called Agnodice. She was obliged to disguise herself in a man's dress; for there was a law among the Athenians, which prohibited women and slaves to study Physic (a). Agnodice becoming a Midwife, gave occasion to the repeal of that law. It is too curious a piece of history not to be related in a remark [A].

[A] It is too curious, a piece of history not to be related in a remark. Hyginus relates that the ancients having no midwives, abundance of women died in travel, because shame hindered them from applying to the Physicians; and there was a law among the Athenians forbidding women to practise Physic. hereupon Agnodice, a young woman, having a great inclination for that science, disguised herself in man's apparel, and learned it. After which she used to seek out women that were in labour, and to take away all scruples, she immediately shewed them what she was, and so brought them to bed. The Physicians, observing that they lost their practice with the women, sued her, accusing her of an unlawful commerce with the sex. They complained also of I know not what collusion, and certain pretended illnesses that they had to countenance the gallant. In a word they caused her to be condemned by the Areopagites; but she shewed so plainly the proofs of her innocence in a full senate, that the Physicians were forced to change their battery, to wit, to recur to the law that prohibited women the profession of Physic. The Athenian ladies interposed, and caused the law to be reformed; so that free women were permitted to learn that art (1). The author from whom I borrow these words, makes a reflexion against Hyginus. 'There is says he (2), but little exactness in these words of Hyginus: for one might conclude from his discourse, that from the time that Agnodice laid the women, they no longer employed the Physicians in that affair, which would prove against this author's own observation, that they made use of their assistance in it before. But tho' there be no exactness in his words, we may at least save him from a contradiction, by supposing he meant that the women having been assisted in their lyings-in by Agnodice, would no longer make use of any body but her in their other indispositions, wherein they had no scruple against employing the Physicians.' This author makes another remark upon Hyginus's observation, that before Agnodice practised Midwifery, several women had died, who had not the courage to make use of a Physician (3). 'It must be confessed, says the writer of the News from the Republic of Letters (4), that shame is no less subject than other things to the caprice of the fashion. Time has been that it was the fashion to be ashamed to make use of a Man-Midwife, and we read in Louise Bourgeois a very dexterous Midwife, that Henry IV charged her to do her duty so well with queen Mary de Medicis, that it might not be necessary to have recourse to a man; for her modesty, added he, would suffer too much by it. At present it is à la mode to be void of that shame; outrage is much more enlightened than the preceding.' This railery against the present age is not well grounded; for if on one hand there is now less shame in some respects, impudence on the other hand is less than it was at Athens. Are there any virtuous women at present, who would have the assurance in a full auditory to take up their pericots, and demonstrate to the judges that they are women? Agnodice did so in the Areopagus, the gravest and most venerable tribunal that was in the world. Quod cum vidissent medici, se ad feminas non admitti, Agnodicen acculare cœperunt, quod dicerent eum glabrum esse & corruptorem earum, & illas famulare imbecillitatem. Quo cum Areopagitarum cœdissent, Agnodicen damnare cœperunt. Quibus Agnodice tunicam allevavit, & se offendit sceminam esse (5). Could there be a more consummate impudence than this? had she not before given sufficient proofs of her want of shame? could not she have discovered her sex by more modest methods than those she used to the women? Quæ cum credere se nolisset, æstimans virum esse, illa tunica sublata ostendebat se sceminam esse (6). Those prelates, who, to purge themselves of incontinency, have shewn their nakedness in full councils (7), do not come up to the impudence of this Athenian woman. I have said elsewhere, that Albertus Magnus practised Midwifery, if we may believe scandalous report (8). If this be so, it is a long time since the modesty of the Athenian women has been gone; and as the reputation of Albertus was very well established, who knows but that some women gloried in being delivered by his hand? just as Molier's precise ladies would have every thing, even their under stockings, made by the best hand. Since the first edition of this dictionary I have seen in the journalsists of Leipzig, an observation which will serve here for a supplement. It can be denied, say they, that the French are fitter than any other nation to instruct us how women may be assisted in their labour. It is not because they have a more happy genius, but because they have frequent occasions of being present at child births. It is the fashion in France, that even new married women, casting away all shame, permit themselves, without scruple, to be seen and handled by Chirurgeons, and all sorts of women desire their presence and assistance when they are ready to lie-in. A quite different custom prevails in other nations: for commonly women, and especially those who are newly married, are so scrupulous, that they can hardly be persuaded to put themselves into the hands of the midwives and their particular friends: It is only necessity brings them to it, and when the pain is so strong as to overcome their repugnance. As I do not translate this word for word, I will insert the Latin of the Leipzig Journal, to shew that I express the sense of it with all the necessary faithfulness. Non est negandum, de adjuvandis parturientibus Gallos præ cæteris nationibus nos instruere posse, non ingenio, sed occasione, qua licet ipsis quam frequentissime partui adesse, feliciores. Ita enim moris apud ipsos est, ut posito pudore, etiam recens nuptæ ad tactum atque explorationem omnem chirurgos admittant faciles, & partus tempore præsentis atque adjuvatores sceminæ qualibet eos expetant. Quod longe fit aliter apud ceteras nationes, ubi ple-rumque vix persuaderi possunt uxoreculæ, cumprimis nuper in matrimonium ductæ, ut obstericibus pro-prieque sexus amicis sui faciant copiam, nisi doloribus ac necessitate victæ (9). Thus the journalsists of Leipzig speak at the beginning of the extract of a book published by a Chirurgeon of Paris (10) in the year 1694, and intituled The Practice of Midwifery. That Chirurgeon did not print his observations, till after a long experience; he had assisted at the deliveries of four or five thousand women. Another Chirurgion of the same city (11) published another book the year following intitled, Observations upon the pregnancy and deliveries of women, &c. It contains 700 choice observations out of more than three thousand, which the author has made (12). This is enough to prove that it is the prevailing fashion at Paris, to make use of men and not of women Midwives. The time will come perhaps that the same mode will prevail over the greatest part of Europe; shame will undergo the fate of a thousand other things, which are subject to the capricious and inconstant laws of custom.

HILDEBERT, bishop of Mans, and afterwards archbishop of Tours in the beginning of the XIIth century, had led a very scandalous life before he attained the mitre [A]. It is in vain they wrangle hereupon with the Annalist of the Romish church [B], and alledge the discoveries of a critic against him. Father Maimbourg successfully produced an action of this prelate [C], to insult those few bishops, who opposed the extension

[A] He led a very irregular life before he attained the mitre. Even after his promotion to the dignity of archdeacon, he kept so many concubines, that he had bastards of both sexes in abundance. This is what Ivo bishop of Chartres writ to him (1). 'Dicunt quidam de majoribus Cenomanensis Ecclesie qui antea vitam tuam se nosse testantur, quod ultra modum laxaveris fræna pudicitie, in tantum ut post acceptum Archidiaconatum, accubante lateribus tuis plebe muliercularum multam generis plebem puerorum & puellarum. — Some of the rulers of the church of Mans, who pretend to be well acquainted with your past life, testify that you set no bounds to your lust, in so much that even after you arrived at the degree of an archdeacon, you had numberless concubines constantly with you, by whom you had many, both sons and daughters.'

(1) This letter is 277th. See Menage, Histoire de Sable, pag. 107.

(2) Notis in Epist. 277. Ivonis Carnutensis.

[B] It is in vain to wrangle hereupon with the annalist of the church of Rome. Juret (2) censures Baronius for having written in Annals upon the authority of this letter of Ivo of Chartres, that Hildebert before he was a bishop was addicted to women, pretending that this letter was written to one Aldebert, and not to Hildebert. Aldebert, Cenomanensis Ecclesia electo, it is thus this letter is intitled at the end of the manuscript letters of Ivo of Chartres in the library of St Victor.

But Father Sirmond, in his notes upon Godfrey of Vendôme, has very well justified Baronius; these are his words. 'Hildebertus vir in Episcopatu eximius, ante illum, vitæ solutioris, ut indicat Ivonis epistola 277. 'Quid quidem, qui de Hildeberto, quo de agimus, scriptam, pertinaciter neget, is, opinor, clausis oculis sibi credi velit. Ecuq; enim alia Ivonis tempore Cenomanensis Episcopio electio fuit, quam Hildeberti? Quem præterea scimus ex Archidiacono, quod Ivo notat, ad Episcopalem Cathedram evectum. Neque tamen hæc ita dissero, ut viri docti, qui contra sensu, nominis obrectem: sed quia immortalis memoriæ Cardinali Baronio me debere iudico, ut quæ rectè & verè ab eo dicta sunt, ea ut pro veris habeantur, enitar quoad possum (3). — Hildebert was a very good bishop, but before he arrived at that dignity he was guilty of many irregularities, as we learn from Ivo in his 277th epistle. They who obstinately deny that this letter was wrote to this Hildebert, would have us blindly to believe whatever they say. For what other election of a bishop of Mans was there in the days of Ivo, but that of Hildebert? we know likewise, that he was advanced from being archdeacon (as Ivo observes) to the episcopal see. I do not say this with any intention of lessening the reputation of the learned man who has maintained the contrary opinion: but because I think I owe so much to the immortal memory of cardinal Baronius as to endeavour to the utmost my power that what he has justly and truly wrote, should be acknowledged to be true.' Mr Menage adds some good things to these reasons of Father Sirmond.

(4) Ibid. pag. 108.

Hildebertus, says he (4), and Aldebertus is the same name: and Hildebert bishop of Mans calls himself Aldebertus in one of his letters printed in the thirteenth volume of the Spicilegium. Ranulfo, Dei gratia, Dunelmensis Episcopo, omni honore & gratia sublimando, ALDEBERTUS, humilis Cenomanorum Sacerdos. He is thus called in a charter of the abbey of Etival, produced by Mr Pavillon in his observations upon the life of Abrissel. Aldeberto Episcopo Cenomanensi: for thus it ought to be read, and not Alberto Episcopo Cenomanensi: there having been no Albert bishop of Mans. In a charter of Frontevaux, produced by Colnier, page 131 of his notes upon the life of Arbrissel, he is also called Aldebertus; which is the same thing as Aldebertus. Courvaissier in the life of Hildebert, confirms the letter of Ivo of Chartres by this place of the Necrologium of St Peter de La Cour of Mans: Tertio Idus Augusti, obiit Gervasius, Hildeberti Præfatus filius; matris Ecclesie Canonicus: qui vivens, ad hujus Ecclesie servitium quandam contulit Bibliothecam; cujus anima quiete fruatur æterna: On the elevenib of August died Gervasius son to bishop Hildebert; a canon of the mother church; who in his lifetime left a library for the use of this church; may his soul rest in eternal peace. Pretending that this Gervasius was the natural son of Hildebert, Bondonnet pretends he was only his spiritual son. But in the acts of the bishops of Mans, published by Dom Mabillon in the third volume of his Analecæ, the delecta juventutis of this bishop are mentioned, which farther confirms Ivo of Chartres's letter. Mr Menage mentions in his additions (5) two charters produced by Father de la Mainferme (6), in which our Hildebert is called Audebertus. Thus Juret's criticism (7) falls to the ground, together with the praises given him by Father Maimbourg. See the following remark.

[C] Father Maimbourg successfully produced an action of this prelate. He first praises this prelate. St Hildebert, says he (8), bishop of Mans, and afterwards archbishop of Tours, was one of the most holy and learned prelates that the Gallican church ever had. 'We have some epistles and some other fine works of his in the Bibliotheca Patrum. It is he whom St Bernard calls the excellent pontif, and the great pillar of the church; of whom the most famous writers speak with the greatest commendations, and whose sanctity God himself was pleased to declare and honour, by miracles wrought at his tomb. And upon this occasion I think my self obliged to say, that I may give the honour that is due to his memory, that those who have written upon the credit of an epistle of Ivo of Chartres, that when Hildebert was made bishop of Mans, he led a very scandalous life, have taken him for another, being misled by the inscription of that epistle, wherein they have found Hildebert instead of Aldebert, as it is read in the old copies, as Monsieur Juret, to whom we owe this important remark, has shewn in his learned notes upon Ivo of Chartres. After this Maimbourg says, that Hildebert was translated from the bishopric of Mans, to the archbishopric of Tours, by Pope Honorius II, in the year 1125, and that having found two canonies in his church which Lewis the Barly had filled during the vacancy of the archbishopric, he went himself to court to make his most humble remonstrances to the king (9). He was heard, but being not contented with the sentence that was pronounced, he demanded a canonical determination; his obstinacy occasioned the revenues of his archbishopric to be confiscated. Then he had only recourse to the most submissive entreaties, recommending himself to a bishop who was in the king's favour. 'I do not write to you, said he, to complain of the king's proceedings, to exasperate you by my complaints, to raise clamours, troubles, seditions, and tempests against the Lord's Anointed, and to demand the rigour and censures of the church against him. So far from that, I only desire that you would be so kind as to intercede for me, and by your good and charitable offices to prevail with the king, not to exercise his anger and indignation against a poor bishop loaded with years, who only desires to live a quiet life.'

Mr Menage does not fail to observe, that the king continued in full possession and enjoyment of his right, and that Pope Honorius, that most Holy Pontif and great protector of this archbishop, found no fault with it. Observe how this historian, in his history of Lutheranism, stuffs in an episode upon the affair of the Regale, in order to make his court to the king, by decrying the conduct of the bishop of Paris.

tion of the Regale. The remark I shall make upon this subject, will contain some things relating to our Hildebert's history. Illyricus has reckoned him among the witnesses of the truth, because of a very smart letter which he wrote against the court of Rome [D]. He was of no great birth [E].

miers and Pope Innocent XI. He took the same method with respect to all the affairs of the time, as he has been upbraided with it in the fourth and fifth letter of the General Criticism on his History of Calvinism.

[D] He wrote a very smart letter against the court of Rome. It contains a very lively description of the disorders of that court, and I do not believe that it has lost any thing of its strength in Mr du Pleffis Morin's French translation of it (10). Hildebert was only bishop of Mans when he wrote this letter, but when he wrote another to Honorius II, complaining that all causes were carried to Rome by way of appeal, he was archbishop of Tours. He made a description of Rome in verse, concluding with these words.

Vel Dominis esset turpe carere fide.*

Happy city, if it had no masters, or if those masters were ashamed of their want of faith. Coëffeteau (11) does not deny that the letter to Honorius is Hildebert's; but he does not think so of the other. It is not credible, says he, that this epistle is his, since it is not to be found among those that are printed, nor even among those that are in manuscript, which we have seen amongst other rare books of Messieurs du Puy... but also because, excepting some youthful sallies of this prelate, we find that he was always very modest, and especially very respectful to the holy see, as we shall prove by and by (12). And indeed, neither Vignier, nor Illyricus, nor du Pleffis, mention upon what occasion it was written. They have only given us a fragment of it without any title or any other marks. It is fit the reader should know what was replied to this. 'If this will serve for a reason, we shall be double gainers by it, and shall shew, by better arguments and testimonies, the baseness of his party, in forging new pieces and falsifying old ones. Illyricus finding it among others, published it according to the original, the style of which is plainly different from his. If he and others after him, publish it without any title or argument, this cannot surprise those who have seen these that are printed, amongst which there are many, which it is impossible to guess to whom they were written, and to know particularly on what occasion (13). It is Rivetus who speaks thus: a little after he observes that Gretlerus (14) cannot believe that the eighty second epistle, wherein he talks of taking away or moderating appeals, could come from Hildebert; though Coëffeteau says that is truly his. The curious may consult Father Hommey's Supplementum Patrum, where there are several pieces of Hildebert, with notes upon his epistles, together with the names of those to whom he wrote them (15).

[E] He was of no great birth. There is in the province of Maine, near Montoire, a place called Lavardin, which has given it's name to a very noble family of Vendômois... La Croix du Maine in his Bibliothèque says, in the article of James Lavardin, that Hildebert bishop of Mans, was of that family; which is not true. He was born at Lavardin, but was not of the house of Lavardin. He was a man of a great deal of learning and merit, but of no birth (16). The words of La Croix du Maine are these (17). That house of Lavardin (18) has usually produced learned men and long ago; for Hildebert, bishop of Mans, and afterwards archbishop of Tours, five hundred years ago, was of that house, and surname, and was reckoned the most famous poet and orator of his time, as his epistles and Latin poems witness.

HILTEN (JOHN) a German Franciscan pretended to ground some predictions upon the book of Daniel in the year 1485 [A]. Melanchthon, who had seen the original of that work, says, that the author foretold, that in the year 1516 the power of the Pope should begin to decay, and that afterwards it should decline more and more, till it came to it's downfall, and never should rise again; and that about the year 1600, the Turks should be masters in Italy and Germany (a) [B]. Some tell us (b) that he foretold that in the year 1600, there should be seen a man extremely cruel, and that in 1606, Gog and Magog should reign over all Europe. After having, with a great deal

[A] He grounded some predictions upon the book of Daniel in the year 1485. I have met with this date in a passage mentioned by Melchior Adam, which teaches us also where this fryar had studied. 'Ego olim juvenis, in Hilten ubi speaks (1). almæ matris Universitatis Erphurdensis alumnus, ardens philosophus: nunc senex exili solitudini deditus ab anno Christi millesimo quadringentesimo septuagesimo primo, in hunc annum millesimum quadringentesimum octogesimum quintum ejusdem Domini Jesu Christi voluntate, qui & me instigavit ex suo libro cognoscere veritatem contra vacuos errores de futuro tempore nunc volantes. Quam me solum scire amor Dei & proximi non finit, sed & aliis piis & benevolis impertiri admonet. — I studied in my youth in the university of Erfurt, and warmly pursued philosophy, but am now in my old age fond of solitude, and retirement, from the year of our Lord 1471, to this present year 1485, it being the will of my Saviour, who likewise excited me to seek the knowledge of the truth from his word, in opposition to the vain errors now propagated concerning future times. Which truth, the love of GOD, and of my neighbour, would not allow me to board up, but obligeth me to impart it to the pious and well disposed.' Notwithstanding this, Melchior Adam, a few lines before, says, that Hilten lived in the XIVth century. This want of attention is very common among writers.

[B] He foretold that the Turks should be masters in Italy and Germany. He seemed to promise that the Turks should be the instrument of a wonderful reformation by the ruin of the papacy; but they who should reform, were afterwards to abolish Mahometism; after which the Roman emperor was to resign his crown to JESUS CHRIST never to be restored. Ita digressit omnia Calchas (2). It appeared by the event that John Hilten knew no more of the matter than that diviner of the Grecian army. His words are these (3). Plures gloriantur Romanum Papam esse monarcham, quia Jesus omnia dedit Petro & ejus successoribus. Factor, verum quoad sunt ejus vicarii. Sed legantur revelationes S. Brigittæ: & videbitur querela Christi de perversione illius vicariatus. Quapropter Deus dedit gladium Mahometo, quo monarchiam illam à vicario ad ejus Dominum Jesum Christum compellit, vicariam & omnes Christianos reformando. Qui plenè reformati exurgent, & delebunt sectam Mahometi. Quo facto, ultimus Imperator Romanus resignabit cum effectu Jesu Christo coronam regalem & omne jus Imperiale; non recepturus, ut Constantinus. — Many boast that the Pope is a king, because CHRIST gave all things to Peter and his successors. I own this, but this is only while they are his vicars. Now if we read the revelations of St Bridget, we shall see CHRIST's complaints of the corruption of that Vicar. And for this reason GOD has given the sword to Mahomet, that he may take that kingdom from the vicar, and give it back to it's rightful sovereign JESUS CHRIST, by reforming his vicar, and all Christians, who being thoroughly reformed, shall destroy the Mahometan sect. After this the last Roman emperor, shall effectually resign his royal crown, and imperial title to JESUS CHRIST never to be restored, as did Constantine.

of pains, endeavoured to find the time of the end of the world (c), he placed it in the year 1651 (d). Mr du Pleffis Mornai has only taken so much of those predictions as served his purpose [C]. Hilten was persuaded that charity did not suffer him to suppress that knowledge which God had given him about things to come (e). It is said that he died in the year 1502 (f).

[C] Mr du Pleffis has taken only so much of those predictions as served his purpose.] 'John Hilten, a monk of Henac in Thuringia, beyond all human foresight, being put into prison for having reproved some monastical abuses, being very sick, sent for the Guardian and told him, I have spoke no great matter against monkery, but there shall come one in the year 1516, who shall overturn it, and they shall not be able to resist him.' And in that very year Luther began to preach (A). Du Pleffis Mornai is mistaken one year, for the Era of Lutheranism began not till 1517. I believe also that he mistakes the place, and that he should have said Eisenach instead of Henac. He should have added, that the thing happened about the year 1500 according to Melancthon (5).

HYPERIUS (ANDREW GERARD) a famous minister and professor of Divinity, was born at Ipres in Flanders the sixteenth of May 1511. He took the name he is known by from the place of his birth (a). His father, who was an advocate, and who had already made him study in several places, finding himself near his end in the year 1525, recommended it to his wife to send him to Paris to continue his studies there. This was done in the year 1528. Hyperius studied Philosophy there three years together in the college of Calvi; and after a short journey that he made to Ipres, returning to Paris in the year 1532, he studied Divinity till 1535. He afterwards went to Louvain, and made several journeys into several provinces of the Low-Countries, and into Germany, whereby the attempts his friends had made without his knowledge, to get him a benefice, proved ineffectual; for when it had been represented to Carondilet, archbishop of Palermo, and chancellor of the emperor, that Hyperius had travelled in Germany, he was so suspected of heresy, that it became necessary for him to think of a retreat. He went over into England, and lived above four years with an English gentleman a lover of learning [A]. He crossed the sea again in 1541, with a design to see the university of Straßburg, and particularly Bucer, who rendered it very famous; but going by the way of the country of Hesse, he met at Marburg with Geldenhaur, a professor of Divinity, who was one of his friends, who, to retain him, gave him hopes of an employment in the university of that city. He actually staid there, and a little while after succeeded his friend, who died in January 1542. He exercised that function somewhat more than two years without marrying; but thinking he could not live conveniently without a wife, especially his health being none of the best, (a reason which would have discouraged many others from thinking of it) he married in 1544 (b) a widow, by whom he had six sons and four daughters. He died at Marburg the first of February 1564, having exercised the professorship in Divinity above 22 years with the greatest application. He wrote several books [B], some of which were copied by a doctor of Louvain [C].

(a) The city of Ipres has been called Hyperia by several authors. Beza, in Iconibus, calls it so, and says that Andreas Gerardus a patria Hyperius fuit cognominatus.

[A] He lived with an English gentleman a lover of Learning.] He was son to William Montjoy, whom Erasmus has so much praised, and who lay under many obligations to him. 'In Carolus Montjoio, Guillelmi filium, Baronem incidit (Hyperius) quem Erasmus Roterodamus amplissime in scriptis suis ac sæpe commendat. Is amicè cum Hyperio multis ac variis de rebus colloctus cum ingenium ejus peripexisset, oblato liberali stipendio, domum suam eum invitavit, ubi annos quatuor amplius suavissime Hyperius cum Montjoio vixit in otio literario (1) — Hyperius accidentally met with Lord Charles Montjoy, son to that Lord William whom Erasmus so highly and frequently celebrates in his writings. My Lord having conversed freely with him, and various subjects, and seeing his genius, invited him to stay at his house, and offered him very handsome appointments. Here Hyperius continued above four years in the happiest condition a man of letters could desire.' Note that in Freherus's Theatrum (2) we find Monticius instead of Montjoio, and that though Erasmus dedicated his Livy to Montjoy the son, and praised him in some other places, yet those great and frequent praises mentioned here can properly belong only to the father. The son was very young when Erasmus died (3).

[B] He wrote several books.] If we may believe Verheiden, Hyperius's writings that are published would make seven volumes in Folio. Some of them concern Rhetoric, Logic, Arithmetic, Geometry, Cosmography, Astronomy, Optics, Physics, &c. The rest are either commentaries upon the Scripture, or treatises of divinity. His book de recte formando Theologiae studio, and another, de formando concionibus sacris, were so well approved by a doctor of Louvain, that he inserted them almost intire in the books he published upon the same subject at Antwerp in the year 1565.

Hyperius was but a young student, when he made an oration at Paris (4), which has been since printed and which is in praise of one of his friends (5).

[C] Which were copied by a doctor of Louvain.] Valerius Andreas owns it (6). This doctor was a Spanish monk of the order of St Augustin, named Laurentius à Villavicentio. He is often quoted for a famous plagiarist. The first author that I have found to take notice of this plagiarism, was the learned Reynolds; he mentions it in the fourth chapter of the first book of his treatise de Idolatria Romana printed at Oxford in the year 1516, and he observes that this of it, as if it were the life of Ringelberg; but he is mistaken.

Some time after Keckerman (7) mentioned this same theft, owning that Reynolds had observed it before. Voëtius (8) spoke, of it, quoting Keckerman in a thesis maintained in 1655. But he would have the work which was stolen to be Hyperius's method of divinity. Now that method contains only three books, whereas the work that Reynolds, Keckerman, and the bibliographer of the Low-Countries, say the Spanish monk adopted, contains four, and is commonly quoted by this title de ratione Studii Theologici. Certainly this last is not the same book with Hyperius's Methodus Theologiae. We must believe that Voëtius has not been altogether exact. Mr Colomiès (9) likewise mentions this theft, citing Reynolds. Mr Placius (10) mentions it only upon the credit of one of his friends who wrote to him, that Simon Oomius spoke of it in the second preface to a Dutch book; and both he and Mr König (11) will have this plagiarism to relate to the book intitled Methodus Theologiae. A modern author (12) cites con-

He laboured especially to teach the students in Divinity a good method of preaching. He had a very clear head; and besides his skill in the Languages, History, Philosophy, and Divinity, he had an excellent art of teaching. He had exercised that talent very early; for when he studied at Paris, he assisted many other scholars. He was modest at entertainments, affable and polite in conversation; and as much as he hated immoderate cups [D], and that idle buffoonry, which is too frequent in conversation, so he delighted in well ordered entertainments, and agreeable discourse. In a word, he was a man of a very elegant turn of wit, attended with virtue and zeal. Those who would know more of him, may read the writers I quote (c). There is some difference between Verheiden's and Melchior Adam's account [E]. I can scarce believe that Hyperius had been a monk [F]. Part of his books were not published till after his death [G], by the care either of Laurence Hyperius, his son, or of John Mylius (d).

cerning this plagiarism, not only Keckerman and Colomiés, but also John Heilsfeld cap. 25. Sphingis Theologica-Philosophica. It is to be observed, that none of these authors, except Valerius Andreas, speaks of the double plagiarism of the Spanish monk; they only observe that which relates to the book intitled de Studio Theologico. But, on the other hand, Nicolas Antonio does not only say, that Villaviciensis took all that he thought good in two books of Hyperius, to make two others upon the same subject; but besides, ascribes to him the same conduct with respect to two other books published by Protestants, one is de Phrasibus sacrae Scripturae; the other is, Tabulae compendiosae in Evangelia & Epistolas. Note, that he has added some faults to those of Valerius Andreas. Like him (13) he will have Hyperius to have been a Dominican: To this he has added other errors of his own. I. By giving Hyperius the name of Hisperius. II. By allowing but three books to the treatise de formando Studio Theologico. III. [D] He hated immoderate cups. See what his funeral oration says it (14); 'In colloquiis & conversationibus humanis & æquus, & quemadmodum immania illa in conviviis hominum pocula, & scurriles in colloquiis nugæ ex animo fuit averfatus, ita moderatis conviviis, jucundisque amicorum confabulationibus nonnunquam interfuit.'

[E] There is some difference between Verheiden's and Melchior Adam's account. Verheiden has given us only a very short eulogy; but the account which the other gives is more historical, and the times more distinctly marked. The latter, does not say that Hyperius travelled into Spain: he only says that he saw the provinces of Italy between the Alps and Bologna; and that he saw them during his studies in Paris, and before his journey to Louvain. Verheiden, on the contrary, pretends that Hyperius travelled into Spain and Italy, after having studied at Paris and Louvain. He makes him first teach Philosophy at Marburg, and afterwards Divinity. Melchior Adam says nothing of his professing Philosophy.

[F] I can scarce believe that Hyperius had been a monk. The extract of his funeral oration does not speak of it: we may be sure then that Wigandus Orthius has not said it; for such a fact, good Melchior Adam would not have passed over in silence, even though he had given but a short extract, and not a long relation filled with a hundred particularities. However I would not trust to that reason; I have sought and at last found Wigandus Orthius's oration, and I can see nothing in it that can give me any suspicion that Hyperius was ever of any religious order. Hence I conclude, that he never was a monk. Let it not be objected to me that this is a negative argument: I do not pretend to plead the cause of that way of arguing (15); but I dare say it appears here conclusive, both because he who composed Hyperius's funeral oration, could not be ignorant whether he had been a monk or not, and because if he knew it, all the reason in the world obliged him to observe it. No body ever thought of concealing these sort of truths concerning Musculus, Marlorat, Peter Martyr, Zanchius, and many other other pillars of the growing reformation, who came from the cloisters, and there could not be perhaps a man more incapable of silence upon things of this nature than Orthius. He who thought himself obliged to tell in a funeral oration, that Hyperius went to wait for his baggage at Marburg, because he knew he could live cheaper there than in any other place on the banks of the Rhine (16). He tells you a hundred particulars of the same importance, which Melchior Adam has faithfully copied. And therefore I do not see that Moreri could say, without being mistaken, that Hyperius was a monk of the order of St Dominick, in which he distinguished himself by his learning; but that he afterwards basely apostatized. In this he has been only the transcriber of Valerius Andreas, who had told that lie before. This bibliographer of the Low-Countries, who is besides mistaken in placing Hyperius's death in the year 1560, is not excusable for not having said at least, that Hyperius had been a minister at Marburg; and Moreri who has said this (17) ought to be blamed for his silence about his professing divinity. His want of exactness appears also in this expression. He fell into the errors of Luther which he taught. To what end is this last remark expressed in an indeterminate manner. Was it not enough for him to have given him the title of a Protestant minister in the first line of the article? Would not this sufficiently import that Hyperius taught the Protestant doctrine? Besides, it is not true that he followed the reformation of Luther: the Index of prohibited books (18) might have instructed Mr Moreri in that point.

(16) Sciebat enim minores se apud Catos interea posse vivere, quam usum ad Rheni ripas.

[G] Part of his books were not published till after his death. Consult the epitome of Geisner where you will find that several of Hyperius's works were printed in his life-time; so that I do not see that he can be alleged as an instance of that singular modesty, which makes an author defer the publication of his writings till after his death, that he may not be an ear-witness of his own praises. This ought to be observed by those who read in Mr Selden (19) what I am going to quote. 'Cujus (contemptus famæ vel gloriae propriae) illustre exemplum antehac præbuit Theologus sua ætate celeberrimus Andreas Hyperius, de quo testis est Justus Vultejus (20). quod ideo post mortem demum in lucem prodire sua voluerit, quia gloriam sibi nullam, nec vulgi applausus in captabat. Hos enim (inquit) si tanti faciendos esse putasset, utique vivo ei frui illis licuisset. — Andrew Hyperius a famous divine, in the age in which he lived, gave an illustrious example of this contempt of praise and personal honours; for, as Justus Vultejus relates, he desired that his works might be published after his death, because he did not desire any glory or popular applause that might arise from them. If (says he) he had put any value upon these things, he might have enjoyed them during his life.'

(18) The following words are to be found in it, pag. 16, of the edition in folio, 1667. Andreas Hyperius, seu Hyperius, Theologus Calvinianus, Praefectus Marburgensis, Konig, Bibliothecarius, cap. 420, calls him a Protestant Divine; who, according to the style of the German Protestants, is the same as Calvinistical Divine.

HIPPARCHIA, wife to the Philosopher Crates, was so charmed with the discourses of that Cynic, that she was resolved to marry him at any rate. She saw herself surrounded by a great many admirers, distinguished by their nobility, riches, and the gentleness of their persons. She was pressed by her family to make choice of a husband amongst those rivals; but nothing could bring her off from Crates. She declared that she valued him above all the world, and that if she had him not, she would stab herself. The family, upon this declaration, addressed themselves to Crates, intreating him to use his eloquence and authority with her, to cure her of her passion. He did all that was possible, without gaining any thing upon her obstinacy. At last when he saw all his arguments guments and counfels were of no weight, he displaid his poverty before her [A], he discovered his crooked back, he laid his staff, his wallet, and his cloak upon the ground, faying to her, See here the man that you will have, and the goods that you will find with him; consider well of it, you cannot become my wife without leading the life which our sect prescribes. He had scarce made an end of speaking, when she declared, that condition infinitely pleased her. She took the habit of the order, I mean the equipage of the Cynics, and stuck so close to Crates, that she followed him every where, went to feasts with him [B], and made no scruple to pay him the conjugal duty in the middle of the streets [C]. It was one of the tenets of that sect that we ought not to be ashamed of any bodily exercise which nature requires of us [D]. Hipparchia being at dinner one day

[A] Crates displaid his poverty before her.] No body has described this with so much exactness as Apuleius: he tells us that Hipparchia answered, that she had sufficiently considered that affair, and was persuaded it was impossible to find a handsomer or a richer husband than Crates; and that he might lead her where he pleased. He led her to the Portico. It was one of the most sumptuous public buildings, and the most frequented of all Athens, and there he consummated the marriage. All the people might have seen it, and the spouse was resolved to entertain the company with that shew; but a friend of Crates spread his cloak about them, and by that means made a sort of a curtain, which screened them from the view of the spectators. To shew that I lend nothing to my author, I will set down his words. 'Adeoque is (Crates) cupiebatur; ut virgo nobilis, spretis junioribus pro- cis, ultro cum sibi optaverit. Cumque intersepili- um Crates retexisset, quod erat aucto gibbere, peramque cum baculo & pallium humi posuisset, eamque suppellectilem sibi esse puellae profiteretur, eamque formam quam viderat: proinde sedulo con- suleret, ne post querelae causam caperet: enimvero Hipparche conditionem accipit. Jamdudum sibi provismum fatis, & satis consultum respondit: neque ditiores maritum, neque formosiores usquam gen- tium posse invenire. Proinde duceret quod liberet. Ducit Cynicus in porticum. Ibidem, in loco ce- lebris, coram luce clarissima accubuit: coramque vir- ginem imminuisset, paratam pari constantia; ni Ze- no procienda palliastri, à circumstantis coronae ob- tutu magistrum in secreto defendisset (1). Mr Men- sage (2) affirms that Clemens Alexandrinus says, that the wedding of Crates and Hipparchia was celebrated in the Portico called ποικίλη: but it is certain Clemens does not say it: We only can infer it from his words. In honour of Hipparchia, says he (3), the Cynogamia were celebrated in the Pæcile. The word Cynogamia signified, according to Mr Mensage (4), a feast which the Cynics kept to the honour and me- mory of Crates's marriage. He adds, that Mr Petit the Physician has made a fine poem upon the amours and nuptials of this Cynic. The poem is intituled, Cynogamia. Many will call to mind here a French verse, mentioned by Furetiere, Poussant chauds de reini faire notes de chien (5).

[B] She went to feasts with him.] This, and the custom of rambling about with Crates, were two things not practised by the other Grecian women. They were shut up in the remotest part of the house, and were visited by none but their relations, and never went to a feast but at the houses of their relations. Cornelius Nepos, who relates this, observes that the Romans had quite contrary customs. Women lived then at Rome, as they do now at Paris. The mode of Italy has very much changed: it has for a long time resembled that of ancient Greece. Altri tempi, altri costumi. . . . Different times, different manners. Let us see the words of Cornelius Nepos (6): 'Quem Ro- manorum pudet uxorem ducere in convivium? Aut ejus materfamilias non primum locum tenet ædium, atque in celebritate versatur? Quod multo fit aliter in Grecia. Nam neque in convivium adhibetur, nisi propinquorum: neque sedet nisi in interiore parte ædium, quæ γυναικωνίτης appellatur: quod nemo accedit nisi propinqua cognitione conjunctus. — What Roman (says he) is ashamed to carry his wife to a feast? Or whose wife doth not live in the principal apartment, and in the view of the world? In Greece it is quite otherwise. For there a wife is never carried to a feast, except in the houses of her relations: and she never sits in any other but the remotest part of the house; to which none ap- proach but near relations.'

[C] She made no scruple of paying the conjugal duty in the middle of the streets.] We shall not wonder that this philosophical lady, Hipparchia, set herself above custom, with respect to the two points I have mention- ed, when she was able to trample upon decorum with respect to the third. The contempt of custom cannot be carried farther. This was a great triumph of love, she sacrificed to it the virtue that is most natural to the fair sex, that shame, or that modesty, which is a thousand times deeper rooted in the heart of women, than chastity itself. And what is more strange, Hip- parchia was prepared for this impudence all at once; there was no need of leading her to it by degrees. Ju- venal observes that when the business is to satisfy love, nothing appears difficult to women. Are they to go on ship-board with their husbands whom they do not like, they know not how to resolve upon it; the dangers and fatigue of the sea are insupportable. But are they to embark with a gallant, they have the best stomach in the world for it, and a Tarpaulin's life is a pleasure to them.

Fortem animum præstant rebus quas turpiter audent. Si jubeat conjux durum est conscendere navim, Tunc sentina gravis, tunc summus vertitur ær: Quæ mœchum sequitur stomacho valet. Illa maritum Convomit hæc inter nautas & prandet & errat Per puppem, & duos gaudet tractare rudentes (7).

(7) Juvenal. Sat. VII, ver. 97.

Hipparchia justifies this observation; she doted upon Crates; he would have her to shake off all shame, non aliter hæc sacra constant, said he to her in all likeli- hood: she was satisfied to do it to gratify him. Ma- ny authors report the fact. Sextus Empiricus (8) and Theodoret (9) witness it; I have already cited others. But St Augustin had a very singular thought upon this subject; he believed that the Cynics used only pos- tures and vain efforts. 'Illum (Diogenem) vel illos qui hoc fecisse referuntur, potius arbitror concuben- tium motus dedidisse oculis hominum nescientium (9) Serm. XII, quid sub pallio gereretur, quam humano premente de Virtute Acti- conspectu potuisse illam peragi voluptatem. Ibi enim Philosophi non erubescere videri se velle concumbere, ubi libido ipsa erubescere surgere (10) De Civitate (10) As for Diogenes and some others, who are said to have done so, I imagine that they rather ini- tated the motions of lovers, before people who knew not what was transacted under the cloak, than that they were able really to consummate. For here Philosophers did not blush to desire to be thought to do, what lust it- self blushed to enable them to perform.' A modern has set up for a Cato against this father of the church, and has given him a severe reprimand for that thought. When St Augustin adds, says he, that he cannot be- lieve that Diogenes and those of his sect, who are re- ported to have done every thing in public, enjoyed a true and real pleasure there; he thinks they only im- itated, under the Cynic cloak, the motions of those who lye together, imposing by that means upon the eyes of the spectators. Tho' they in effect were not able to do any thing to purpose. I am ashamed to men- tion this, and I desire you to read his own words (11) Here he sets down the words of St Augustin. . . . How could so great a man allow his imagi- nation the liberty of diving into those Cynical se- crets? How could St Augustin's hand lift up Dioge- nes's cloak, to let us see some motions, which shame (tho' that Philosopher professed to have none) made him hide with his own cloak (12)?

[D] We ought not to be ashamed of any bodily exer- cise which nature requires of us.] See what was said above in the Remark [L] of the article DIOGE- NES. Some think the Cynics had their name, be- cause like dogs they lay with their wives in the streets: Nam quid ego de Cynicis loquar: quibus in pro- patula

patulo coire cum conjugibus mos fuit. Quid mirum si a canibus quorum vitam imitantur, etiam vocabulum nomenque traxerunt (13)? The Cynics pretended they acted agreeably to reason, for, said they, if it be lawful to know one's wife, it is lawful to know her in public: but it is lawful to know one's wife, therefore it is lawful to know her in public. 'Hoc illi canini Philosophi, hoc est Cynici non viderunt proferentes contra humanam verecundiam, quid aliud quam caninam hoc est immundam impudentemque sententiam, ut scilicet quoniam iustum est quod sit in uxore, palam non pudeat id agere, nec in vico, nec in platea qualibet, conjugalem concubitum devitare (14).' I have observed elsewhere (15) a like argument of Diogenes. It is the wretched sophism, a dicto simpliciter ad dictum secundum quid. It is as if one should say; it is good to drink wine, therefore it is good to drink it in a fever. These people did not know that there are many actions that are good only in certain circumstances, the omission of which may render an action evil, which with them would have been good. To lend money to a friend in order to pay his debts is a very commendable action: but to lend it him to make himself drunk, or to game, is an evil action. There are some actions essentially evil; which cannot be good under any circumstances whatsoever, but there are some things which are good or evil according to the times, and places, and other circumstances, wherein they are done. I confess that this is not sufficient to non-plus the Cynics; for they might turn their argument thus. When a thing is good and lawful in itself, one ought not to be ashamed of doing it: but the conjugal duty is in itself a thing good and lawful; and therefore one ought not to be ashamed of paying it: and consequently it may be lawfully paid in public. For if any thing could vitiate that public action, it would be only want of shame in circumstances, wherein men are obliged to have it. The difficulty then is reduced to this one question. Ought one to be ashamed of paying the conjugal duty in the face of the world? A pretty question, you will say; who doubts it? Diogenes would answer, I do, and do you prove that I am in the wrong. The answer to him would be, that shame, with relation to these actions is a natural impression, and that therefore it is to offend against nature not to be ashamed in these occurrences. But, he would reply, that if it were a natural impression, the animals, which so faithfully follow the instincts of nature, would seek shades and dark recesses for the work of generation. Now nothing is more false than this. At least all men would in the like cases seek the darkest retreats, which is likewise false; for many people in the Indies propagate in the sight of all the world. This is what the famous Pyrrhonist Sextus Empiricus observes, in order to shew, that the common practice is not grounded upon an immutable and eternal law of nature, but upon a meer custom, and the impression of education. Τὸ δημοσία γυναικὶ μίγνυσθαι καὶ τοῖς παρ' ἡμῖν αἰσχροὺς εἶναι δοκεῖν, παρὰ τοῖς τῶν Ἰνδῶν ἐν αἰσχροῖς εἶναι νομίζεται μίγνυνται ἐν ἀδιαφόρῳ δημοσία καθάπερ καὶ περὶ τῶ φιλοσόφῳ Κράτῳ ἀκηκόαμεν. Public cum uxore congressi quamvis apud nos turpe esse videtur, apud quosdam ex Indis non videtur esse turpe. Congrediuntur enim indifferenter publice, quemadmodum etiam de Cratete Philosopho accepimus (16). He might have alledged the custom of the MOSYNIANS, whose article may be seen. A modern author has observed, that some nations have made love 'even in the temples, and said, that if that action displeased the deity, he would not suffer it in other animals (17).'

This shews how many different ways human reason may lead us astray. It was given us to direct us in the right way; but it is a desultory, wavering, and supple instrument, which turned every way like a weathercock. See how the Cynics made use of it to justify their abominable impudence. I may add, for the honour and glory of the true religion, that it alone furnishes us with strong weapons against the sophistry of these people; for though we could not shew in Scripture, any formal precept, for hiding the privacies of marriage in the dark, it suffices to say, in the first place, that the spirit of the Scripture engages us to avoid whatever may weaken the impressions of shame; and secondly, that there are precise texts, forbidding us to do any thing that shocks decency, or scandalizes our neighbour. I do not know whether any of the Casuists, who have so much abused their leisure in examining many cases of conscience, in some respects metaphysical, have ever thought to what kind of crime the impudence of a Crates, or of a Diogenes, ought to be reduced. They did not believe there was any divine law about it, nor that a man was obliged to conform to municipal customs. They believed that non-conformity in such cases would at most incur the blame of rusticity, and want of complaisance to a received custom: to be incivil, ill-bred, and an ill observer of fashions, is not a criminal or evil action, morally speaking. What then can be said against the Cynics, unless they be condemned by revealed truth? I have never read any thing whatever upon this point, and I do not know whether any one has said, that at present a Cynical action would only be criminal: 1. Because of the scandal given to one's neighbour. 2. Because of the contempt of the municipal customs. 3. Because of the negligence of preserving the barriers of chastity. I suppose a man persuaded that the action in itself is not expressly forbidden in scripture, nor contrary to the law of nature. If it was contrary to it, the sentences that command a congress, would be so many crimes chargeable upon the judges.

There are, no doubt, some Casuists who will take self-pollution which Diogenes was guilty of in the public market-place (18), to be a greater crime than this congress of Crates and Hipparchia. It is a very strange and scandalous thing, to see Chrypsippus, that celebrated and rigid Stoic, praise that infamous action of Diogenes. Ἐπαινέει τὸν Διογένην τὸ αἰδοῖον ἀποτελεῖσθαι ἐν παντὶ, καὶ λέγοντα πρὸς τοὺς παρόντας, εἶδε καὶ τὸν λιμὸν ἔως ἀποτρέφασθαι τῆς γαστρὸς ἡδονήμην. Diogenem laudat qui in publico masturbasset, dixissetque adstantibus, utinam liceret sic etiam famem attrito ventre pellere (19). That Cynic could not have justified himself by his sophism, It is lawful to pay the conjugal debt, therefore it is lawful to pay it in the street; for his action is bad both in public and private. Sextus Empiricus owns, that it was looked upon as detestable, though Zeno, the founder of the Stoics, had approved it, and many others had recourse to it as a good action. Τότε αἰσχρουργεῖν ἐπὶ δεξιῶν ἐν παρ' ἡμῖν, ὁ Ζήνων ἐκ ἀποδοκιμαζέει καὶ ἄλλος δὲ ὡς ἀγαθὸν τινὶ τέτρω χρεῖσθαι τῷ κακῷ συνδανόμεθα. Quum præterea detestabile sit apud nos αἰσχρουργεῖν, Zeno approbat & alios quosdam ut bono quodam hoc usque malo accipimus (20). Diogenes made use of another sophism; he took what is done by some fish for a dictate of nature (21): but the sophism is no better than what one might draw from the practice of the Lydians. For the rest, the Cynics in vain sought out arguments to colour their abominable impudence. They durst not continue in it. The public indignation was probably a stronger bridle for them, than the ideas of virtue. St Augustin observes, that at last natural modesty got the better of this sort of people. 'Vicit tamen pudor naturalis opinionem huius erroris, nam essi perhibent, hoc aliquando gloriabundum fecisse Diogenem, ita putantem sectam suam nobiliorem futuram, si in hominum memoriam insignior ejus impudentia fingeretur, postea tamen à Cynicis fieri cessatum est: plique valuit pudor ut erubescerent homines hominibus, quam error, ut homines canibus esse similes affectarent (22). — But at last natural modesty got the better of this error, for though we are told that Diogenes sometimes ostentatiously did so, thinking that his which he gave no verbal answer [E], but had recourse to his hands, and whatever he could do and say afterwards, he found a woman very resolute, and afraid of nothing (a). She wrote some books, which are not come to us [F]. Mr Moreri has committed some faults in her article [G]; and so has Lorenzo Craffo [H]. I forgot to say, that Hipparchia

'set would be more famous by fixing this extraordinary impudence of his in mens memoirs, yet afterwards the Cynics laid aside this practice. And shame was of more force to make men blush in the presence of men, than error, to make men affect to be like dogs.' But as there are always some exceptions to the most general rules, we see, in Lucian, the Cynic Peregrinus coming near the conduct of Diogenes. 'Εν πολλῷ δὲ τῶν περιεσώτων δῆμῳ ἀναγλῶν τὸ αἰδοῖον, καὶ τὸ ἀδιδόχον δὴ τὸ το καλύμενον ἐπιδείκνυνται. Multa autem in corona populi pudenda conturbabat, & hæc indifferentia vocari ostendat (23).

AN Observation
may be offended at what I have now related.

They who may think it strange, that I should mention such horrible obscenities, ought to be reminded of the privileges or duties of an historian. Whoever at present writes the history, either of an ancient philosopher, or of any other person who has acquired a name in preceding ages, has a right to relate whatever he finds in books concerning them, whether it deserves the praise, or the horror and execration of the reader; and if he should be contented to collect only what is commendable, he would very ill discharge the duties which the nature of his work requires of him. In writing the life of a modern, there is more liberty allowed; for if he has committed filthy actions, which are unknown to the world, they may be passed over in silence, according as one thinks it necessary to prevent some inconveniences, that might arise from the publication of such things. But when the question is about a fact mentioned by a hundred authors, we are no longer masters of the like caution; and if one chooses to suppress it, it is an useless scruple, since the readers will easily find some other way, what you are so industrious to conceal from them. The impudence of Diogenes the Cynic, is so well known in the world, that some jests go about of him, which are not founded on the testimony of any ancient writer. 'Du Moutier put me in mind of a book of the same Orleans, intitled, The human plant to the Queen: it is a ridiculous title, which makes me remember Diogenes's Planto Hominem (24). These words are cardinal du Perron's. Abundance of people tell the same thing in their common conversations. It is found in several books, where it is said, that Diogenes embracing a woman in the middle of the streets, being asked what he did? answered, φύτεύω ἄνθρωπον, I plant a man. No ancient that I know of, tells this story, and Mr du Rondel, whom I have consulted upon it, answered me, that he had never found it but in modern authors. Now when a story so ill grounded, about the impudence of this ancient Philosopher is so generally known; it is not likely that people should be ignorant of what has been said of him by the authors whom I quote. To what end then should I suppress these facts? You ought at least, you will say, to make use of expressions which may veil these infamous actions. I answer, that this would be the way to diminish the horror they deserve; for these delicate and disguised phrases which are now commonly used in speaking of impurities, do not give so much disgust as more natural and strong expressions, and thereby more apt to raise our indignation, would do; let not an author therefore amuse himself with inventing ambiguous expressions, which, properly speaking, are only a covering to the deformity of these actions. I add, that it is more useful and important than people are aware of, to mention the horrible abominations which the Pagan Philosophers approved. This may humble and mortify human reason, and convince us of the infinite corruption of the heart of man, and teach us a truth, of which we should be always mindful, namely, that man wanted a revealed light to supply the defect of the philosophical; for you see, that the Stoics (25), who cultivated morality beyond the other Philosophers, and had very sublime ideas of it, did nevertheless approve of the impudent obscenities of Diogenes. To them we may particularly apply the general declaration of St Paul against the Heathens, Thinking themselves wise, they became fools (26).

[E] Hipparchia made an objection to which the Apostle Theodorus gave no verbal answer. It was a so-

phism easy to be resolved and retorted. If I did, said she, the same action which you could justly do, I could not be accused of having done an unjust action: Now if you should beat yourself, you would do justly; therefore if I beat you, I cannot be accused of having done an unjust action. Theodorus did not stand to answer her as a Logician; he threw himself upon her, and untied her gown. According to the present way of dressing and speaking, we might say, he took up her coat. This is the explication which Mr Menage (27) gives of these words of Diogenes Laërtius, ἀνέσυρε δ' αὐτῆς στοματίον. Here is a brisk and gallant way of answering the sophistry of a woman. Hipparchia was not out of countenance, and Theodorus having cited a verse of a tragedy, describing a woman who had quitted the spindle and the distaff, she answered him, *I see my own character there, I am that woman; but do you think I have made an ill choice, rather to spend my time in philosophizing, than in spinning? Let us now see what Theodorus might have answered her, if he would have given himself the trouble. Answering directly, he might have said, that the action of Theodorus beating himself, and that of Hipparchia beating Theodorus, were two different actions, and not one action of the same species. There were therefore four terms in Hipparchia's syllogism. To the end that two actions may be alike, it is requisite there should be the same relation in both, betwixt the agent and the patient; but such a relation was not to be found in Hipparchia's hypothesis. If Theodorus had chosen to answer by way of retortion, and puzzle Crates's wife he might have done it thus: If I do the same action which your husband might lawfully do, I cannot be accused of an unjust action. But your husband acts lawfully when he kisses you, &c. therefore if I kiss you, &c. I cannot be accused of doing an unjust action. One might have seen whether Hipparchia, who was a brazen faced woman, durst have answered him, before witnesses, Concedo totum.*

[F] She wrote some books: which are not now extant. Suidas says she composed Hypotheses Philosophicas: Epibremata quadam, & Questiones ad Theodorum cognomento Atheum. Mr Menage's conjecture is very probable, that we must read in Diogenes Laërtius (28), not φέρεται δὲ τῷ Κράτητι βιβλίον ἐπιστολαί, but φέρεται δὲ πρὸς τὸν Κράτητα βιβλίον ἐπιστολαί. According to this conjecture, we are told, that Hipparchia published some letters which she had written to her husband, in which the philosophized nobly, and in a stile resembling Plato's. We must likewise say, that she writ some tragedies, in which she employed the elevated philosophical stile. It would be very strange, that Diogenes Laërtius, who wrote the life of Crates, should speak of his writings in the life of Hipparchia. To clear him from such an incongruity, Mr Menage has made the conjecture above mentioned.

(28) In Hip-
n. 93.

[G] Mr Moreri has committed some faults. He should not have said, that Hipparchia's love for learning made her prefer Crates before all her other suitors. It was Crates's person she was in love with, and it was her love for him that made her a Philosopher. It is true, he had charmed her by his fine and learned discourses; but we cannot from this conclude, that her preference of this Philosopher, before any other man, was founded upon her love of learning. There have been maids and women, who have fallen in love with ministers in hearing them preach, and have married them, preferably to more advantageous matches. The learning and eloquence of these ministers was indeed the cause of those womens falling in love with them, but it was not the love of sciences or books that made them marry these gentlemen. If Moreri had spoke of the correction (29) of the passage in Laërtius, he might have said, that according to that historian, Hipparchia's stile resembled Plato's, and that she wrote tragedies; but not having said that, he had no reason to say the rest.

That disputing with Theodorus, who denied a providence, she convinced him by most solid proofs, and incontestable arguments (31). Read the text of this article, and you will find, that Lorenzo Craffo has taken Laërtius quite wrong.

The riches, beauty, and nobility, which Laërtius speaks of, belong only to her galants. She did not dress herself as a man that she might follow Crates, but because he declared he would not marry any wife, who would not submit to the Cynical institutes. Lastly, in the dispute with Theodorus, we have seen, that neither providence nor any point of religion was concerned. It is not to be imagined how much authors deceive their readers.

HIPPARCHUS, a great Astronomer, a native of Nicea in Bithynia (a), flourished between the CLIVth and CLXIIIrd Olympiad [A]. We have still one of his works; it is his commentary upon the phenomena of Aratus [B]. Mr Rohault has committed a great mistake in saying, that this Astronomer did not know the particular motion of the fixed stars, from the west to the east, which varies their longitude. Pliny makes frequent and very honourable mention of Hipparchus. He places him

(a) Suidas, pag. 1264.

[A] He flourished between the CLIVth and CLXIIIrd Olympiad. We have the strongest argument that can be for it, since it is drawn from the astronomical observations which he made in that interval of time. Ptolemy has related some of them (1). Vossius had reason to place Hipparchus under the reigns of Ptolemy Philometor, and Ptolemy Evergetes, and to censure Suidas, who contented himself to say, that this Astronomer lived in the time of the Roman consuls; he should have denoted a more determinate time; that of the third Punic war, and that of the war of Numantia. So far Vossius goes on sure grounds; but when he says he agrees with Suidas, as to the time of Hipparchus (2), he forgets himself, and says what is not true; for Suidas no more agrees with Vossius upon that point, than with an author who should place Hipparchus at the beginning of the IVth century of Rome, or at the end of the Vth. Calvisius (3) erred in saying, that Suidas has placed Hipparchus 130 years after the first of the Ptolemies. A French author (4) is no less mistaken in affirming, that Hipparchus lived in the time of Plato. Moreri, who had no other resource but Vossius upon this article, ought not he to have found there an infallible preservative against the mistakes he has made? He has placed Hipparchus in the year 570, and 80 of Rome, under the reigns of Ptolemy and Philometor Evergetes, kings of Egypt. Ought he not to have made time betwixt the 589th year of Rome, and the 625th, correspond to the Olympiads set down by Vossius (5). Besides, when one says barely Ptolemy, it is a sign one speaks of the first prince of that name who reigned in Egypt; and there are few exact writers, who do not more precisely denote him. It is therefore a gross fault to use the word Ptolemy simply, and absolutely, when one doth not mean that Ptolemy who had Egypt to his share, after the death of Alexander. It is plain, Moreri does not speak of him, or if he doth, he commits a great blunder; for a man who lived in the 570th, and 80th year of Rome, could not possibly flourish under the first Ptolemy, who died in the 468th year of Rome. He is mistaken in another thing; he supposes there was a king of Egypt, called Philometor Evergetes.

[B] His commentary upon the phenomena of Aratus is still extant. It is properly a criticism on Aratus; for Hipparchus accuses him of having stole from Eudoxus's writings, and even in those things wherein Eudoxus was mistaken. He finds the same fault with Aratus the grammarian, who had wrote a commentary upon Aratus. The first publisher of Hipparchus's commentary was Peter Victorius. Petavius has given us a more correct edition of it, and has added to it a Latin translation of his own (6). The other works of Hipparchus were de Constitutione stellarum inerrantium, & statione immota, deque mensura lune motu secundum latitudinem &c (7).

[C] Mr Rohault has committed a great mistake. Great Mathematicians, like him, are not commonly well versed in the knowledge of matters of fact, and historical blunders frequently escape them (8). However, let us see what this learned Cartesian says, who by the sole orthography of the word Hipparchus, shews that he did not understand Greek.

Hyparchus, says he (9), lived the greatest part of his life, without making any other observation about the fixed stars, than that they had a motion from east to west, in circles, which he thought exactly parallel to the equator; which made him conclude, that they were all inhaled in one and the same solid heaven, (which is called the firmament) which he placed above all the planets: and because he did not think it was necessary that the heaven should borrow this simple motion from any other heaven above it; he maintained that it was the last of all the heavens, and that it served to draw all the others the way that it turned, and so was the Primum Mobile. Hipparchus being then of this opinion, that the fixed stars did not change their places in the heaven, he thought they might serve to determine the course of the planets, just as rocks in the sea may serve to point out the courses of ships, which leave no footsteps of their passage behind them. He employed therefore his industry in measuring the distance betwixt every fixed star, and the sun's ecliptic; which is called the latitude of a star; then to determine the number of degrees, and minutes of the ecliptic, which are reckoned from west to east, from the first point of Aries to the point over against which every star corresponds, which is called it's longitude; but death having prevented him, posterity only could execute his designs. Ptolemy, who lived about two hundred years after Hyparchus, proposed to settle the motions of the planets; and having had the curiosity to observe, whether his predecessor had been exact in observing the longitudes and latitudes of the fixed stars, he found that their latitudes was just as Hipparchus had observed it, but that their longitude was augmented two degrees. He concluded from thence, that besides the motion the fixed stars had from east to west in twenty four hours, they had another from west to east in circles parallel to the ecliptic, by which being advanced two degrees in two hundred years, they would accomplish their entire revolution in thirty six thousand years. And whereas the firmament could have but one motion, which was properly it's own, he attributed to it that motion of thirty six thousand years, and maintained, that it borrowed it's diurnal motion from east to west, from a heaven beyond it. And thus people began to believe, that the Primum Mobile was a heaven, which had no star in it, and which embraced the firmament.

WHAT the longitude and the latitude of the stars are.

Mr Regis (10), another great Cartesian, advanceth the same thing in fewer words; but Mr Gadroys, another excellent Cartesian, well knew that the discovery of the particular motion of the fixed stars towards the east, ought to be ascribed to Hipparchus (11). Probably he had given greater attention than others to a thing which Gassendus has related. It is this. The Chaldeans, Egyptians, and Greeks, believed that all the fixed stars were placed in the concavity of the highest heaven, and consequently of the Primum Mobile, and therefore had no motion, but from east to west upon the poles of the equator. But at last, Hipparchus, 130 years before JESUS CHRIST, found that this hypothesis could not subsist; for having considered in the number of those sublime genius's, who by the prediction of the eclipses showed that men ought not to be surprized at these phenomena [D], and that the gods themselves were subjected to some laws [E]. He admires him for having taken a review of the stars, for having counted them, and observed their situation and magnitudes, which put his posterity in a capacity of discovering not only whether they are born and die, but also whether they change their place, and increase or decrease. We learn from this passage of Pliny, that Hipparchus a scribed to our souls a celestial original [F].

that according to Timocharis's observation, made 200 years before, there were eight degrees betwixt the Virgin's Spike towards the west, and the point of the autumnal equinox, and that he could find but six degrees distance betwixt that star, and that point of the firmament, he concluded, that the stars must have a proper motion from west to east upon the poles of the ecliptic; and that, if the observation of Timocharis was just, the progress of the fixed stars, by that particular motion, was one degree every hundred years. He wrote some treatises upon this new doctrine. 'Quare & intellexit si Timocharis quidem ritè observasset, ac Stellæ moveri sic perseverarent, peragî hoc motu unum gradum intra annos proximè centum. Intellexit præterea debere hunc motum fieri secundum Zodiacum, seu super Eclipticæ Polis, idque prodidit tam in Tractatu, quem inscripsit de transgressu Equinoctialium Solstitialiumque punctorum, quam in eo, quem conscripsit de Anni magnitudine, ut apud Ptolomæum habetur (12). Note that Gassendus doth not observe exactly the age of Timocharis; for that Astronomer flourished about the CXXIX Olympiad, 130 years only before the first observations of Hipparchus, of which Ptolomy makes mention. This mistake of Gassendus is much more tolerable than that of Mr Gaddroy's (13).

[D] Pliny places him in the number of those who, by the prediction of eclipses, showed that men ought not to be surprized at these phenomena. Thales was the first among the Greeks, who could foretell the time of eclipses. Sulpitius Gallus among the Romans, began to be successful in that sort of predictions, and he made a very seasonable trial thereof the night before the battle, in which Perseus was overcome (14). Hipparchus, after these two, extended this science much farther, for he made Ephemerides for six hundred years. 'Post eos utriusque sideris cursum in sexcentos annos præcinit Hipparchus, menses gentium, dielque & horas, ac fitas locorum & visus populorum complexus, ævo teste haud alio modo quam consiliorum naturæ participes (15). After them, Hipparchus calculated the motions of both these luminaries for 600 years to come, being thoroughly acquainted with the different computations of the months, days, and hours, situations of places, and the different aspects in the several nations, in such a manner as if he had been of nature's council. Pliny calls him, on this account, the confident of nature: the elegies he bestows upon the Astronomers on that occasion seem to be very well grounded. 'Viri ingenites supragæ mortalium naturam, tantorum numinum læge deprehensa, & misera hominum mente absoluta in defectibus stellarum scelera, aut mortem aliquam siderum pavente Maci ingenio este cœli interpretes, rerumque naturæ capaces, argumenti repletos, quo Deos hominesque vicistis. Quis enim hæc cernens, & statos siderum (quoniam ita placuit appellare) labores, non suæ necessitati mortalis genitrus ignoscat (16)? — Illustrious men, nay more than men, who first discovered the laws by which these great divinities are governed, and first set free the minds of men who used before to tremble at eclipses, fearing that they should occasion terrible calamities, or the extinction of these glorious luminaries. . . . Hail! ye interpreters of heaven, learned in the nature of all things, and discoverers of a subject whereby you have overcome both gods and men. For what mortal, seeing these things, and the stated labours of the stars (since we are pleased to call them labours) will not be content with the necessity to which his own nature is subjected. This elegy in prose is full as good as that which here follows in verse.

Inque domos superas scandere cura fuit!
Credibile est illos pariter vitisque lotisque

Sic petitur cælum: non ut ferat Offan Olympus;

Summaque Peliculus sidera tangat apex (17).

(17) Ovid Fast. lib. i, ver. 297, & seq.

Hipparchus did so carefully observe what concerns eclipses, that he found out the proportions of their intervals (18). He observed that the eclipses of the moon might return at five months end, and the eclipses of the sun at seven, and that the sun might be eclipsed twice in the space of thirty days with respect to different parts of the earth. Intra ducentos annos Hipparchi sagacitate compertum est & lunæ defectum aliquando quinto mense à priori fieri, solis vero septimo: eundem bis in triginta diebus supra terras occultari, sed ab aliis atque aliis hoc cerni. These words of Pliny have been misunderstood by some. There is a very learned man, who thought that by intra ducentos annos, was meant that two ages must intervene to the end, that an eclipse of the moon may succeed another, at five months end. This is not Pliny's meaning (19): his meaning is that Hipparchus had discovered that proportion two hundred years before. Pliny is right in his Chronology, there were two centuries betwixt Pliny and that famous Astronomer.

[E] That the gods themselves were subjected to some laws. There is no inconveniency in saying that God loves order, and good, by a necessary and indispensable law; for, on the contrary, it would be an imperfection to be able to violate this law. But it is doubtless an imperfection to be subject to an order which retards or weakens our functions; and therefore they who pretended the stars were gods, were obliged to say, if they argued consistently, that the Astronomers had discovered the weakness of the divine nature, and it's dependance on a very burdesome law, which subjected it to a sort of death, fainting, or slavery. To this it may be objected, that the sun is no less luminous in itself at the time of an eclipse, than before, or after; but may not I answer, that a courier who is stopped, loses nothing of his vigour, and health? It is nevertheless, a proof of his submission to a burdensome law; it is, in a word, a sign of weakness to see that he cannot continue his journey. Apply this to the sun, and you will find that his eclipses are a sign of imperfection. They hinder him from enlightening the earth; he is a prince, whose couriers are stopped, and whose functions are interrupted. If Pliny had purposed to reason, he had not drawn the consequence, which he has drawn from that phenomenon: he would not have said that this ought to comfort men on account of their mortality (20), he would have said, that this proves that the stars are not of a divine nature.

[F] We learn from a passage of Pliny, that Hipparchus attributed a heavenly original to our souls. It is so fine, that in giving it intire, I am sure to please those, who love not to change books, in order fully to satisfy their curiosity. Idem Hipparchus nunquam satis laudatus, ut quo nemo magis approbaverit: cognitionem cum homine siderum, animæque nostras partem esse cœli: novam stellam & aliam in ævo suo genitam deprehendit: ejusque motu, qua die fulsit, ad dubitationem est adductus, anne hoc sæpius fieret, moverenturque & cæ, quas putamus æfixas. ventus esset (22). — The same Hipparchus can never be sufficiently praised, for no body more clearly proved that men are allied to the stars, and that our souls are a part of heaven. He, I say, discovered a new star which was produced in his days; and by it's motion, at it's first appearance, he began to doubt whether this did not frequently happen, and whether those stars which we call fixed do not likewise move. He also first undertook to number the stars for the use of posterity, a task hard even to the gods, and reduced them to rule, having invented instruments by which he marked their places in the heavens and their magnitudes: so that by means of them it might be easily observed, not only whether they die and are born, but likewise whether they pass by one another or move; and whether they increase or decrease, leaving the heavens as an inheritance to all, if any should be found able to fathom these mysteries.

HIPPOMANES. There is in the Project of this Dictionary a long article upon Hippomanes. I do not place it here, having changed the design which I had of giving promiscuously, real, and personal articles; but I will place this article at the end of this work by way of dissertation.

(b) Suidas, in Ἰππώναξ.

HIPPONAX, a Greek poet, born at Ephesus, lived not in the XXIII^d Olympiad, as Eusebius says [A], but in the LXth, as we are assured by Pliny (a). Being banished from Ephesus, by the tyrants Athenagoras and Comas (b), he went and settled at Clazomenæ [B]. He was deformed, little, and slender (c), but his deformity has by accident been the cause of his immortality; for he is scarce known but by the satirical verses which he made against two Statuaries [C], who had carved him in the most ridiculous figures imaginable (d). He discharged upon them a thundering legion of Iambic verses which so vexed them, that it has been reported they hanged themselves. Pliny maintains that this is false, and proves it by a great number of statues which they made after that time in the adjacent islands. Some authors have written, that they only obliged them to leave Ephesus where Hipponax lived (e). However it be, the humour and satirical vein of this poet distinguished him [D], and do so still in a very particular manner. His satire did not even spare those to whom he owed his life (f). There are some who pretend that he died of hunger [E]. It is observed that though he was little and slender,

[A] He did not live in the XXIII^d Olympiad, as Eusebius says. Scalliger (1) confutes him by the passage of Pliny; he believed therefore that Pliny was in the right. So far it is well: but he adds, that Eusebius followed Tatian, and he refers us to his notes number 908, in which we find nothing that relates to Hipponax. In this there is no great exactness. Eusebius may also be refuted by the testimony of Proclus (2), who says that Hipponax flourished under the reign of Darius. He means doubtless the son of Hytaspes, whose reign began in the LXIVth Olympiad.

[B] He settled at Clazomenæ. Hence the poetess Sulpicia describes him in this manner:

Fortiter irasci discit duce Clazomenio (3).

Nor in that verse Iambic-like engage,
Taught by the Clazomenian bard to rage,
In daring numbers, thro' the manly page.

If what Tanaquillus Faber says be true, namely, that Hipponax lived at Ephesus, when he revenged himself on those who had insulted him upon his deformity; he must either have returned into his country, or else his banishment did not precede that adventure. I have seen nothing in Pliny that shews that Hipponax was or was not born at Ephesus, or whether he, and the Statuaries whom he satirized, lived there or not. And yet Mr Dacier (4) assures us, that Pliny is of their opinion, who say that our poet's verses made his enemies quit Ephesus. Lloyd and Hofman say that Bupalus lived at Clazomenæ (5). I believe this is a discovery made by reasoning: they saw, on one hand, that Hipponax retired into that city; and, on the other, that Bupalus represented him in a grotesque manner, and from these two facts they concluded, that Bupalus lived at Clazomenæ.

[C] Against two Statuaries. They were two brothers, one called Bupalus and other Athenis, they were of the tribe of Chios, the sons of Anthemus, whose father's name was Micades, and the grandfather's Malas. All these were Sculptors from father to son in that island; so that this profession might be as ancient there as the Olympiads (6). Pausanias (7) speaks of Bupalus with praise, on occasion of the statue of Fortune, and that of the Graces, which were at Smyrna of his carving. He makes him to have lived before Pindar. Two witnesses such as he and Pliny, deserve to be preferred to the scholiast upon Horace (8), who says Bupalus was a Painter, and who has been followed in this by Tanaquillus Faber (9) and Mr Dacier (10), and almost all the dictionaries (11). Suidas says these two brothers were Statuaries; and because he has given the last the name of Athenis, he has occasioned Father Hardouin to think the passage of Pliny is corrupted, where this Statuary is called Anthemus. He has therefore put Athenis in the room of that word. See the remark [E] and the article B U P A L U S.

[D] His humour and satirical vein distinguished him. Hence come those proverbs we find made use of by Cicero (12). Eum additum jam tum puto esse Calvi Licinii Hipponacteo præconio. Horace names Hipponax and Archilochus as the two greatest satirists (13). Pliny says as follows. Hipponacti notabilis vultus scædita erat: quamobrem imaginem ejus lascivia jocorum ii proposuere ridendum circulis. Quod Hipponax indignatus amaritudinem carminum distinxit in tantum ut credatur aliquibus ad laqueum eos impulsisse: quod falsum est. — Hipponax was remarkably ugly; they therefore made a statue of him, which they set up for the diversion of the public. See also Cicero, Hipponax revenged this affront by such severe satires, that some have wrote, that his enemies hanged themselves: but there is no ground for that report. There is in the Antologia (14) three or four epigrams, which represent Hipponax still terrible after his death. Passengers are there advised to keep far from his tomb, as being a place that sends out dreadful hail: φειδ' ὅς τὸν καλὰς τὴν τάφον, τὸν φειδ' ὅς τὸν, fuge grandinatem tumulum borrendum (15).

[E] Some pretend that he died of hunger. I believe all the foundation they have for it are these two verses:

Invisus pereas, deficiente cibo (16).

Hated by all, may famine be thy fate,
Like his, whose satire last'd in Athens state.

Some critics pretend that Ovid did not say Athenas, but Atbenin, whence it would follow, that he speaks here of

of Hipponax: ' Qui primus jambum claudicare fecit & scæzonta in Bupalum & Athenin composuit, ut est apud Suidam, ut recte Ovidius, parum stabile, id est claudum carmen ei tribuat.' These are Alciatus's words in the eighteenth chapter of the fifth book of his Parerga. Turnebus comes pretty near the same thought: ' Videtur, says he (17), de Hipponactis hoc intelligi qui claudicante & parum stabili versa, id est scæzonte in Bupalum & Athenin inuestus est Athenienis: quo in crimine ne Athenis quidem pepercit. Quid tamen fi pro Athenas, Athenin scribamus, quem ab eo probris oneratum accepimus! Ne hanc quidem lectionem improbarem, etiam alteram delere non ausifm.'

Mr. de Boissieu (18) who mentions these two passages, observes that Sanctius and Valerius approve of them. As for him, he is wholly for that conjecture, and finds it very probable, that Ovid has mentioned the two inventors of Iambic verses one after the other. Now he had been speaking of Archilochus, and we know from Dionysius Halicarnassensis (19), Clemens Alexandrinus (20), Rufinus (21), and the poetess Sulpitia (22), that Hipponax was the inventor of the scazons. Mr. de Boissieu might have criticised Turnebus for saying that Hipponax's enemies were Athenians; for Pliny says expressly they were of the isle of Chios, and that they expressed it so in their works: 'Qui'bus subjecerunt carmen non vitibus tantum celeri-
' Chium, sed et operibus Anthermi filiorum (23). —
To which they added a poem wherein they said that 'Chios was not only famous for vines, but likewise for
'the works of the sons of Anthermus.' There is no ground for what Turnebus says, that Hipponax did not spare the city of Athens in the verses he made against these two Statuaries; it is a random guess. A German minister (24), after applying to Hipponax the two verses of Ovid, goes on thus: 'Ex Plinio nimirum compertum est Atheniæ vel Athenam sculptorem in Hipponactis scripta incurresse, carmina ejus sustulisse maledica, aethorem verò lethali inedia fuisse confectum. — We learn from Pliny, that the 'Statuary Athenis, or Athenæ, fell under the lash of 'Hipponax's pen, that he bore with his satirical verses,
'but that the author of them died of hunger.' Pliny says nothing like it.

[F] He was neither the first nor the only person who have forced people to make away with themselves by their invectives. Before him Archilochus wrote satires which forced two or three persons to hang themselves (25). Poligrius being abused in a comedy did the like (26). We need not wonder that a satire should cast men into despair, since a meer censure has sometimes had that fatal effect. Pythagoras having reprimanded one of his disciples somewhat harshly in a great company, cast him into so black a melancholy as made him strangle himself, and ever after that great Philosopher took care to censure only in private. Πυθαγόρας δὲ τρυφήν ἐν πολλοῖς γνώριμῳ προσέχευ' ἔχεντος, ἀπ' αὐτῶν τὸν Πυθαγόραν αὖτις ἄλλα παρόντος ἄλλου ρυθιπῆαι. Ferunt, adolescentulum quendam a Pythagora, cui operam dabat, multis praefentibus compellatum asperius suspensio vitam finisse, atque ab eo tempore Pythagoram nunquam alio praesente quenquam corripuisse (27). Diodorus Cronus died with vexation for having been insulted by a king of Egypt, upon his not being able to solve some logical difficulties, which Stilpo had propounded to him at that king's table (28). Some censures, without causing the death of the censured persons, have touched them so sensibly, as to make them attempt upon the life of the person who made the censure. The architect Apollodorus lost his life, for observing to the emperor Hadrian some faults of a temple that prince had built (29). The last ages furnish us with examples of all these different effects of censure. Muretus knew a man, who fell into folly to deperate a melancholy on account of some verses made against him, that he died of it. And on that occasion that writer cites Plato, who advised all those who loved their reputation to take heed of provoking the poets. Λαέσιτοι (Poetae) ἴτα σε υλκίζονται, αὐτῶν δὲ ἐμὸν εὖς ἰς quibus offensus erant, ad mortem adegressi narrentur. Nam praeter id quod de Archilochō accipimus, novi ego qui hac cetera tantum veribus suis inimico dolorem iniecerit, ut ex eo ille sit mortuus.

‘ bone famæ studiosi sunt, ut diligenter caveant, ne
‘ cum poëis inimicitias suscipiant (30). — Poetis,
‘ when provoked, revenge themselves in such a manner, ‘ that sometimes they have occasioned the death of those ‘ who had offended them. For besides the story we have ‘ concerning Archilochus, I know a person, in the age
‘ in which we live, who by his verses stung his enemy
‘ so to the quick, that he died of it For this ‘ reason Plato, in his Minos, advised those who love ‘ their reputation, to take care not to provoke the poets.’
It is said that George Trapezuntius died with melancholy, upon seeing the errors in his translation of Pro-tomey criticised by Regiomontanus, and that the sons of the deceased poisoned the critic (31). I have said in another place (32) that it was thought that Jason Denores would have died with grief, upon reading Gua-rini’s reply, if he had lived long enough to have seen that book out of the press. Some zealous Calvinists

that that doctor being too sensible of it, took his bed upon reading it, and never rose again (33). He had made speech in the name of the clergy in the assembly of the states of the kingdom in the year 1560, it was the criticisms upon his speech which occasioned his death. Gregory de Valencia having read a passage of St Austin, otherwise than he should, before Clement VIII (34), was convicted of a falsification, upon which the Pope said to him (35). Is it thus you pretend to deceive the church of GOD? These words, like a thunderbolt, struck down Valencia, he fainted away in the presence of the Pope, and died two days after. See in the article CERA SI another blow of the same Pope. 'Mr de l'Etoile reprehended strongly, and boldly, and with a strange sort of severity, what did not please him in things submitted to his judgment. He is accused for having caused a young man that came from Languedoc to die with grief and vexation, who brought him a comedy which he thought a master-piece, in which he clearly shewed him a thousand faults.' I take these words from Mr Pellisson (36). Philip II king of Spain censured in as murdering a manner as the king of Egypt before mentioned. 'Cardinal Espinosa died on having heard this reproof uttered by that prince, Cardenal yo soy el Presidente. Cardinal I am the president. And the same king saying to a secretary who had poured ink upon some dispatch instead of sand, Este es el tintero, y esto es la fundadora. — That is the ink-born, and this is the sand-box. So pierced him with these two or three words that he immediately retired from the king's preference to his death-bed (38). We have examples which prove that some authors have assinated their critics. Murtola, enraged to see his reputation ruined by a satire of the cavalier Marini, fired a pistol at him in the middle of the streets of Turin; he missed him, tho' he had five bullets in his pistol, and shot at him very near; he confessed that his design was not to wound but to kill Marini (39). We find in Mr Baillet (40) that, Francis Robortellus having censured some books of Baptist Egnatius, a Venetian, had very near lost his life, by a stab in his belly, which this Egnatius gave him in answer to his criticisms.' He cites Joh. Imperial. Musæi biflor. pag 61. & Theophr. Spizel. de scilicet. literat. comment. 4. p. 485. These the words of Imperialis: 'Cum Alciato pariter, aliisque clarissimis ejus ævi luminibus, internecinas prope simulates exercevit (Robortellus) quo factum ut semel Venetiæ Baptistæ Egnatius optimus ac doctissimus vir crebris ab eo laceratis injuriis, educto fenili gladiolo in eum impetum facere non dubitavit. — Robortellus had mortal quarrels with Alciato, and other learned men of that age, to such a degree, that Baptistæ Egnatius, a good and learned man, whom he had frequently abused, meeting him once at Venice, attacked him sword in hand, tho' then far advanced in years.'

If I had dispersed this in several places of my work, I might have avoided their censures who will call this remark, meer troef, and a trifling collection. But as I feel more the advantage of my readers than my own, I am willing, tho' at the expence of censure, to save them the trouble of gathering together what I might have dispersed.

I add,

I add a fresh example to the foregoing. A poet having presumed to present to Pope Urban VIII a work, whereof the subject, the disposition, and the verse, were unbecoming a Christian, he reproached him for his impudence, with so much passion, that the poor wretch died with confusion and grief. You will find these words in the third page of a book published by Father Menétrier at Paris 1681, intituled Des Représentations en Musique anciennes & modernes.

HIPSIPYLE, or HYPHIPYLE, the daughter of Thoas, king of the isle of Lemnos, saved her father's life when the women of the island made a general massacre of all the men that inhabited it (a). She did not do it openly; but was forced to make people believe that she had made away with him; upon which supposition, the other women chose her for their queen (b). The Argonauts some time after landed in the isle of Lemnos, and were received there with all the testimonies of the strictest friendship; for the women of the island had not killed the men out of any indifference for the male sex [A], but rather out of a spirit of revenge, which shewed they were very sensible of the soft pleasures of love. The Argonauts refreshed themselves from the fatigues of the sea in the arms of these widows as long as they pleased; neither did Hypsipyle forget herself: She applied herself to their leader, and was quickly with child of two boys. If her fate in that respect was not like Dido's [B], it was in this, that Jason was no less inconstant than Æneas [C]. See in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary what became of Hypsipyle, when her subjects understood that she had not killed her father.

[A] The women of the isle of Lemnos, had not killed the men out of any indifference for the male sex. They were induced to that massacre, only because the men no longer caressed them, and diverted themselves only with the slaves which they had brought from Thrace (1). The men used this practice because their wives were grown so stinking, that they could not come near them without the greatest disgust (2). This stench was an effect of the anger of Venus; either because this goddess was offended at their neglect of sacrificing to her for some years (3), or because she conceived an aversion for the isle of Lemnos, for having been caught there in the fact (4), for there it was that Medea being jealous of Hypsipyle, threw into that island some drugs, which caused the women to stink so. It is added, that in after ages they smelt so strong upon a certain day every year, that their husbands and even their own children could not abide to come near them. It is disputed whether this stink was from their breath, or their arm-pits. Eustathius (6) is for the first opinion, and Dion Chrysostome (7) for the second. Here follow some verses of Statius in which Hypsipyle represents the horrible state of the island in the interregnum of love:

Motus Hymen, versæque faces, & frigida justæ
Cura tori: nullæ redeunt in gaudia noctes, Nullus in amplexu sopor est: odia aspera ubique
Et furor, & medio recubat discordia lecto (8).

With torch inverted, Hymen took his flight —
The rites of wedlock, with the loves, are fled,
And hate and discord fill the marriage-bed.

That interregnum seemed so intolerable, that it moved them to the massacre before mentioned.

[B] Her fate in that respect was not like Dido's. For the amours of poor Dido with Æneas were barren, and it was that which grieved her. I have elsewhere

(9) observed the difference betwixt her taste, and that of the women of these later ages. The ladies nowadays when they are deserted by their gallants at the opening of a campaign, are over-joyed that the pleasures of the winter quarters are passed over without propagation, I make use of this example without excluding those that concern persons of other conditions: I use it, I say, because the stay of the Argonauts in the isle of Lemnos, may well be compared to a long winter quarter. I must add that Hypsipyle protests in the work of a Latin poet, that she married the lovely Jason against her will.

Cinerem, sariaque meorum

Virginibus dare vincla novis (10).

Neither by choice, nor passion, was I led (The gods can witness) to this foreign bed;
Thou lovely Jason boasts the pleasing art
To captivate each wishing virgin's heart.

But a Greek poet represents her so much in love with him at first sight, as to offer him her kingdom.

Ναῖετ' αὖτ' ἰδὼν, καὶ τοὶ ἄδ' οἱ, ἢ δ' ἀνέριτα
Πατὴρ ἐμὸς Θάνατος ἔχ' οἷς γέρας.

Augearis præmio Thoantis genitoris mei (11).

Thoas, my sire, shall give thee here to reign.

Valerius Flaccus in like manner represents her touched to the quick with the charms of this Hero, and ready to marry him as soon as she saw him:

Alloquio, & blandos paulatim, colligit ignes,
Jam non dura thoris, Veneri nec iniqua reverse (12):
Fast, as he speaks, with kindled love she burns,
And Hymen to her conquer'd heart returns.

[C] Jason was no less inconstant than Æneas. He forsook her and his two children, and pursued his voyage: so that she is one of the heroines of Ovid, who sung their sad complaints, and tender sighs, upon seeing themselves forsaken by the gallants, to whom they had refused nothing. Ariadne, grandmother to Hypsipyle (13), experienced the same fate. See in Ovid her complaints against Theseus. I make a reflexion upon this matter. The mythological authors and modern writers of romances have taken two different roads. The first come too near history; the latter keep too far from it. Only consider the description of manners, or the character which they give a hero. In Mythology the heroines are not only too amorous, but also too lavish of their favours: the heroes are inconstant; they get the heroines with child, or do what is necessary to it, and then they laugh at them. This looks too much like history, and affords an ill example to both sexes (14). It is better to take the opposite extreme, as our writers of romances do, and in spite of probability to seign heroines and heroines quite faultless.

HIRPINI,

HIRPINI, a people of Italy in the country of the Samnites. They were so called from a wolf (a), that conducted them when they went to settle a colony. Some say that upon a certain solemn day, they trod upon fire without being burned [A]: but it is probable that this is attributing to them what belonged only to the Hirpi [B], who lived

[A] Some say they trod upon fire without being burnt. Varro, who opposes superstition as much as he could, having mentioned an ointment, immediately adds this reflexion; the Hirpini rub the bottoms of their feet with it, when they are to walk upon fire. Varro ubique expugnator religionis, ait, cum quoddam medicamentum describeret: eo uti solent Hirpini ambulaturi per ignem, medicamento plantas ungunt (1). These words give us no light concerning the situation of these Hirpini; so that we cannot tell, whether Varro speaks of a people who were part of the Samnites, or whether with Servius he gives the name of Hirpini to the people who lived near mount Soracte in Tuscany, and who were properly called Hirpi. Many imagine that Varro meant the Samnites called Hirpini, and if so, it is probable that the likeness of names misled him. They who walked upon fire were distinct from the Samnites, and lived at a good distance from them. They were called Hirpi and not Hirpini; the commentator Servius is mistaken in the name, and that first mistake has led him into some others concerning the situation of those who walked upon fire, upon the festival of mount Soracte, as we shall see in what follows.

[B] ... what belonged only to the Hirpi. Virgil does not name those who walked on fire; he only gives us to understand that they bordered on mount Soracte.

Whom first we serve, whose woods of ancient pine
Are sell'd for thee, and to thy glory shine.
By thee protected, with our naked soles,
Thro' flames unsung'd we march, and tread the kindled coals,
Give me propitious power to wash away
The stains of this dishonourable day.

But Servius names them Hirpini; Soractis, says he, in commenting on this passage of Virgil, mons est Hirpinorum in Flaminia collocatus. He adds, that this mountain is consecrated to the infernal gods, and that one day whilst they were offering a sacrifice to Pluto, wolves came upon them which snatched the entrails of the victim out of the fire: the shepherds pursued them, and engaged them in a den, whence proceeded a mortal vapour. This caused a great pestilence, which the oracle promised a stop to, provided they should imitate the wolves, that is, should live by rapine. They did so, and were thence called Hirpini Soracti, that is, Pluto's Wolves; for in the Sabine language Hirpus signifies a Wolf, and Soranus is the name of Pluto. If we consult Strabo and Pliny, we cannot doubt but Servius has here committed a great blunder. He has confounded the names and history of two different people. Strabo (3) relates, that because a Wolf in the language of the Samnites is called Hirpus, and because a wolf was a guide to a colony that came to settle among the Samnites, this people were called Hirpini. As for Pliny, he affirms that in the country of the Hirpini there was a place that could not be entered without present death. In Hirpinis Amfancti ad Mephitis adem, locum quem qui intraverit moriuntur (4). Virgil gives a larger description of this execrable place, and observes not only that it sent out a cursed vapour, but also that it was a breathing hole of hell.

Amfancti valles.

Hic specus horrendum, & savi spiracula Ditis
Monstrantur: ruptoque ingens Acheronte vorago Pelliferas aperit fauces - - - (5).

(5) Æneid. lib. vii, ver. 563.

In midst of Italy well known to fame,
There lies a lake, Amfanctus is the name.

Full in the center of the sacred wood,
An arm arises of the Stygian flood,
Which, breaking from beneath with bellowing sound,
Whirls the black waves, and rattling stones around.
Here Pluto pants for breath from out his cell,
And opens wide the grinning jaws of hell.

Mount Soracte had nothing of this nature; the vapour that proceeded from it was only fatal to birds, as Pliny expressly assures us: Alibi volucris tantum ut Soracte vicino urbi tractu (6). It is plain then that Servius made this mountain a place consecrated to Pluto, and placed it in the neighbourhood of the cave which killed men, because he confounded what concerned the Hirpini, with what related to the Hirpi. See Salmassius upon Solinus page 85.

Any one that has a mind to know what ancient authors say of the Hirpi may be quickly satisfied. The Hirpi were a small number of families in the country of the Falisci near Rome, who walked upon fire without harm. This spectacle was seen every year on mount Soracte, on the day on which they offered a solemn sacrifice to Apollo. The Hirpi walked upon burning piles of wood without being burnt, and on that account obtained many privileges. Haud procul urbe Roma in Faliscorum agro Familia sunt parva quæ vocantur Hirpi: hæc sacrificio annuo quod fit ad montem Soractem Apollini, super ambustam ligni struem ambulantes non aduruntur, Et ob id perpetuo Senatus consulto militiæ omniumque aliorum munerum vacationem habent (7). Solinus thought he faithfully copied this, and did not perceive that he changed a notable circumstance. He expresses himself in a way that signifies, that the Hirpi walked a cross the flames; Impune insulant ardentibus signorum struibus in bonorum divina rei flammis percentibus (8). And yet Pliny has not said this, but plainly insinuates, that they walked only upon the burning embers, and it cannot be doubted but that they confined themselves to this; since Varro alledged, that they rubbed the soles of their feet with an ointment. Consider also the multa premimus vestigia pruna of Virgil, and the expressions of the authors we shall quote, and you will agree that Salmassius justly blames Solinus (9). A poet later than Virgil tells us, that they who walked on the fire were three times put to this trial, loaded with the entrails of the sacrifices, which they afterwards laid on Apollo's altars; aliquando autem ex hostiis eis vana novis equis equum soletur, patrio cui ritus in arvo, Cum pius arcitenens accensis gaudet acervis, Extæ ter innocuos late portare per ignes; Sic in Apollinea semper vestigia pruna. Inviolata tæxæ, victorque vaporis ad aras: Dona serenato referas solemnia Phœbo (10).

(10) Silius Italicus, lib. v.

Equum nolescent, patrio cui ritus in arvo,
Cum pius arcitenens accensis gaudet acervis,
Extæ ter innocuos late portare per ignes;
Sic in Apollinea semper vestigia pruna.
Inviolata tæxæ, victorque vaporis ad aras:
Dona serenato referas solemnia Phœbo (10).

Knowing Equum from Soracte sprung,
For strength renew'd, and hardy deeds of arms,
Who, on Apollo's feast, the entrails bears
Thro' harmless flames: so may'st thou ever tread
The burning coal, and, victor o'er the bear, Offer the solemn gift at Phœbus' shrine.

lived in another place of Italy. There were antiently other feasts, wherein the same spectacle was seen [C].

We have seen that the feast of mount Soracte, where the walkers on fire plaid their part so well was dedicated to Apollo; we now shall see it consecrated to another deity. Strabo (11) observes that at the foot of this mountain there was a town called Feronia. This was also the name of a goddess who was mightily worshipped in that district, they celebrated an admirable sacrifice in the lucus or grove of this goddess. Some men who were seized with the spirit of that divinity, walked bare-foot upon a heap of burning coals and were not harmed by it. Ἡς (ἑρῶνιδος) τέμενος ἔστιν ἐν τῇ τόπῳ δαυμάσιν ἱεροπολίαν ἔχον γυμνοὺς γὰρ ποσὶ διστάσιν ἀνδραγαθίαν καὶ σποδὶαν μεγάλην οἱ κατεχόμενοι ὑπὸ τῆς δαίμονος ταύτης ἀπαθείς. Ἰβὶ ἐστὶν ἡ Feronia, in quo sacrificium perpetratur mirabile: correpti enim ejus numinis afflata homines nudis pedibus prunarum ardentium struem illepsi perambulant (12). There was every year a solemn assembly in that place, wherein people were diverted with that sight. It is not for the glory of the ancients to see them so little consistent one with another upon matters of fact, which must have been known to all people.

[C] There were antiently other feasts wherein the same spectacle was seen. There was at Castabala in Cappadocia a temple of Diana called Pefasia. The priestesses of it walked bare-foot upon burning coals without being hurt. Strabo speaks of it by hear-say. Ὅπου παρὰ τὰς ἱερέας γυμνοὺς τοῖς ποσὶ δὲ ἀνδραγαθίαν βασιλεὺς ἀπαθείς. Ubi aiant sacrificas mulieres illepsi pedibus per prunas ambulare (13). There have been mountebanks in these latter ages, who have done things much more surprising (14), than what is told of the Hirpi and these priestesses. But the better to show the great conformity of the ancient and modern abuses in religion, I will here set down what I have heard related by the late Mr Fremont d'Ablandcourt, who being a zealous Huguenot, during his stay at Lisbon, was a most exact observer of the tricks of the monks. He told me that there is a certain convent in Spain (15) that every year furnishes a monk, who shuts himself up in a hot oven, and continues there some hours, being only clothed with linnen. He comes out in the sight of a multitude of people who look upon it as a great miracle. This show brings in a good income to the convent, and makes it worth while to harden a monk by degrees to bear the heat. I do not reckon all the artifices that may be used in it.

HOBBS, (THOMAS) one of the greatest genius's of the XVIIth century, was born at Malmesbury in England the fifth of April 1588 [A]. He had made great progress in the languages [B], when at fourteen years of age he was sent to Oxford, where he studied Aristotle's Philosophy five years. Afterwards he went to William Cavendish, baron of Hardwic, who a little after was made earl of Devonshire, in order to be governor to his eldest son. He travelled into France and Italy with his pupil; and finding that he remembered but little, either of his Greek or Latin, and that Aristotle's Philosophy, in which he had made a great progress, was despised by the wisest heads, he applied himself wholly to Literature when he returned into his own country. Thucydides appearing to him to be preferable to all the Greek historians, he translated him into English, and published his translation in the year 1628, in order to shew the English, in the history of the Athenians, the disorders and confusions of a democratical government [C]. In [A] Was born at Malmesbury. . . the fifth of April 1588. His mother, frightened with the reports that were current of the approach of the Spanish Armada, was delivered of him before her time; it is a wonder therefore that he lived so long. Hobbes's father was a minister (1).

[B] He had made great progress in the languages. Before he went from Malmesbury school to Oxford, he translated Euripides's Medea into Latin verse: Tanta tot autem jam adhibe in ludo literario degens in litera tam Latine quam Græce progressus fecit, ut Euripidis Medæam simili metro Latinis versibus eleganter expressisset (2).

[C] The disorders and confusions of a democratical government. I have known men of sense who have wondered, that in kingdoms where the authority of the prince is almost boundless, the instructors of youth are suffered to read the antient Greek and Latin authors, which contain so many examples of the love of liberty, and so many antimonarchical maxims. But this is no more surprizing, than to see republican states suffer the professors of Law to explain the Code and the Digests, where there are so many principles which suppose the supreme and inviolable authority of the emperor. Here are therefore two things which seem equally surprizing, and which at the bottom ought to be no matter of surprize; for setting aside many reasons that might be offered, may we not say that the same works which contain the poison, either with respect to monarchies or republics, contain also the antidote? If you see on one hand the great maxims of liberty, and the noble examples of courage, with which it has been maintained or recovered; you see on the other, factions, seditions, and tumultuous feuds, that have troubled and at last ruined innumerable little states, which showed so great an aversion to tyranny in antient Greece. Does it not seem that this picture is a lesson very capable of undeceiving those, who are seized at the bare idea of monarchy? Hobbes believed so (3), since he, with that view, published a translation of an Athenian historian. Turn the tables; and you will find that this picture will give a very different instruction from that before, and fortify the aversion to monarchy: for it will be asked, whence comes it that the Greeks and Romans chose rather to be exposed to these confusions than to live under a monarch? Was it not from the hard condition to which tyrants had reduced them? And must it not be a very severe, intolerable, and deplorable evil, which they would deliver themselves from at so high a price? It is certain, that the description which history gives us of the conduct of several monarchs, frights us and makes our hair stand an end. Object not to me that generally speaking, more confusion has been occasioned by the conspiracies which have put an end to tyranny, than there would have been by patiently enduring it. Do not urge what I have said above in the article of HIERO II (4). The Syracusans, who had enjoyed a wonderful happiness under the long reign of that prince, quickly lost patience under his successor, who governed tyrannically. They killed him at the beginning of the second year of his reign; and a little after they put to death the two daughters of Hiero, and his three grand-daughters. Of these five ladies, there were three, against whom they had not the least ground of complaint, and who took sanctuary, as we may say, at the foot of the altars. Was not this destroying one tyranny to establish a greater (5)? Has not Livy (6) justly observed upon this subject, that the populace is unable to keep within bounds; being humble even to baseness, when they obey, and insolent to the highest degree when they command? The massacre of these five ladies was not the rash action of some private men; it was commanded by the senate and the people of Syracuse, even whilst the memory of Hiero was still fresh in their minds, a prince whom they had so tenderly and so justly loved. The iniquity of their barbarous decree was so visible, that they quickly perceived it, and revoked it; but to no purpose; it was already executed. Tandem vulneribus confectæ, cum omnia repleissent sanguine, exanimis corruerunt, eademque per se miserabilem, miserabilem casus fecit; quod paulo post nuntius venit, mutatis repente
